INTRODUCTION.

The history of Franklin and Pickaway counties makes a volume of generous magnitude. The publishers place the book in the hands of its readers with the belief that it will be found to be a valuable contribution to local historical literature. That every statement it makes is free from error, and that there can be found in the book no typographical, or as to the spelling of names of individuals, no orthographical mistakes, is not claimed. But we have aimed at accuracy, and believe we have been successful, so far as success is possible in a work of this nature. A large part of the material for the history had to be gathered from the early pioneers or their descendants, who, for the most part, were dependent upon their memories for dates and events, and conflicting testimony was oftentimes furnished, puzzling the historian, who could do nothing better than to adopt that statement which seemed to him the most probable and trustworthy.

The following named writers have contributed to the production of this book—all experienced and able in this special field of literary labor: Rev. C. S. Percival, Mrs. C. S. Percival, A. F. Mathews, Henry A. Ford, H. Z. Williams, A. R. Wildman, and J. H. SeCheverell. How successfully and faithfully they have arranged and presented the mass of local information which comprises the history of these two important counties of Ohio, must be left to the judgment of the reader.

Valuable information and assistance have been obtained from the following works, to the authors of which we acknowledge our obligation with pleasure: Squier and Davis' Ancient Monuments of the Mississippi Valley, Charles Whittlesey's Essays, Chief Justice Chase's History of Ohio, James W. Taylor's History of Ohio, Henry Howe's History of Ohio, Caleb Atwater's History of Ohio, Caleb Atwater's Antiquities, John S. C. Abbott's History of Ohio, James R. Albach's Annals of the West, Isaac Smucker's Contributions to the Secretary of State's Reports, Land Laws of Ohio, Land Laws of the United States, The Virginia Military District, Studer's History of Columbus, Martin's History of Franklin County, Legislative Proceedings, Railroad Commissioner's Report—1874 and 1877, Pioneer Address of Joseph Sullivant, Centennial Address of Henry C. Noble, esq., Geological Report, United States Census, Ohio Gazetteer—1829, Hildreth's History of Ohio, Washington's and Crawford's Letters—C. W. Butterfield, The American Pioneer, The Archaelogia Americana, Drake's Indian Biography, Sherman Day's Historical Collections of Pennsylvania, etc., etc.

Our thanks are due to the following gentlemen for valuable assistance rendered: At Columbus, to Ex-Governor Dennison; to J. H. Studer for the free use of his able and elaborate History of Columbus; to B. F. Martin, esq., for permission to make use of his father's valuable History of Franklin County; to Joseph Sullivant for verbal information, and the privilege of using his very interesting Family Memorial; and to W. A. Post & Co., and Brown Brothers, abstracters of titles, for access to records. At Circleville, to W. Marshall Anderson; to P. H. Smith, esq.; to Judge Henry F. Hedges; to William Renick; to the several editors of the Circleville papers; to O. Ballard, jr., William Doane, and G. F. Wittich, esq.; to Mrs. Carper, librarian; and to the clergy of the several churches.

There are many others, residents of the several townships of the two counties to whom we feel indebted. To make mention of all would require a larger list of names than we have space to publish; to mention a few would be to slight others equally entitled to our thanks. We must, therefore, content ourselves with thanking one and all in a general way, which we do, with great sincerity and with gratitude.

PREFACE TO GENERAL HISTORY.

IT has been our endeavor in the following pages to preserve, so far as possible, a chronological order. Thus we present, first, a chapter upon the Mound Builders, followed by matter relating to the Indian tribes, and then an account is given of the advent of the third race that has dwelt in the land. The chapter upon pioneer life is followed by those showing facts of early settlement, peculiarities of population, description of land titles, the first survey, civil organization, etc. These, in turn, are followed by the history and description of some of the institutions and improvements of civilization; and then comes the department of city, village and township history, in which all of the foregoing is particularized and a detailed account given of the pioneers and early settlers, of the material progress made, and of the churches, schools, societies, manufacturing interests and other concomitants of the civilization which has, in the past three score years and ten, worked such a marvel in the wilderness, and flourished to such full fruition upon the very ground which, within the recollection of men now living, was covered with the trackless forest, the abode of wild beasts and savage men. The view is a comprehensive one. It extends from the scene of plenty and of peace, of well ordered society, of education and good morals, back to the time when all these things were not; from the scene of mental, moral and material affluence; from the cultivated landscape, dotted with farm house, villa and town, busy and bustling with an hundred industries, back to the time of the lonely log cabin, and farther, to the savagery and wildness of the periods which preceded the white man's occupancy. The lines and coloring in the foreground of the picture—the present—are clearly and sharply defined, the details plainly visible. In the middle distance the lights and shades are less clearly discernible and the objects that appear are less definitely defined. The vistas grow dimmer and darker and forms more and more indistinct until the lines are lost and color confused in the vague shadow of the vast and sombre background beyond which all is night.

HISTORY OF
FRANKLIN AND PICKAWAY COUNTIES.

CHAPTER I.

THE PRE-HISTORIC RACE.

ONLY the earth monuments enclosing a few relics of rude art and the last lingering remains of mortality—crumbling skeletons which literally turn to dust as the places of their sepulture are invaded—have endured to silently and solemnly attest in the nineteenth century the existence of a vast and vanished race, a people whose origin, nature, progress and ultimate destiny are shrouded in a gloom that cannot be dispelled, and only feebly pierced by a few faint rays of light.

Strive as we may by what little there is of the accumulated light of study, we can know but little of the people who occupied this continent prior to the age at which its written history begins. The race to which we ascribe the name of Mound Builders is one of which no chapter of history can be produced. No record has been left; no misty legends or traditions have been handed down to give us an idea of the character and condition of the ancient race. We can only gain an uncertain and unsatisfying glance behind the great black curtain of oblivion, and upon the vastest questions concerning the people, can obtain no absolute knowledge. We may search the silent monuments that stud a thousand landscapes of the Mississippi valley, and deduce conclusions from the facts discovered, in regard to the magnitude of the ancient population, and to some extent of its degree of civilization; but as to the greater questions, whence did it come? and whither did it go? we can only indulge in speculations, fanciful, fascinating and—futile.

It shall be our endeavor in this chapter to convey to the reader general ideas of the extent and nature of the antiquities abounding in Ohio, and without advancing speculations of our own, or attempting to indicate the probable origin of their builders or the cause of their disappearance, to briefly summarize the deductions and the theories of some of those students who have given this great subject the most careful consideration.

GEOGRAPHICAL DISTRIBUTION.

The ancient works commonly attributed to the Mound Builders are spread over a large extent of country. They dot the valleys from the Alleghenies to the far northwest and extend from the lakes to the Gulf of Mexico. They are to be found upon the Missouri, a thousand miles from its junction with the Mississippi; upon the Kansas and Platte, and on other remote western rivers. They spread over the valley of the Mississippi, and line the shore of the gulf from Texas to Florida, and extend in diminished numbers into South Carolina. They occur in great numbers in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Missouri, Arkansas, Kentucky, Tennessee, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, Florida and Texas, and are less numerously distributed through the western parts of New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia and North and South Carolina, as also in Michigan, Iowa and the Mexican possessions. That the earthworks are distributed evenly over this territory should not be imagined. They are confined principally to the valleys of the rivers and large streams and those discovered elsewhere have been small.

Many points of resemblance exist between the works in various parts of the country, which go to establish a kindred origin, but notwithstanding this fact they may be properly separated into three great greographical divisions. In the region bordering the upper lakes, in Wisconsin and, in a lesser degree, in Michigan, Iowa and Missouri, are found a succession of very peculiar remains, which bear only a slight analogy to those found in the other groups. These are great basso relievos upon the face of the earth, bearing the forms of beasts, birds, reptiles and occasionally of men. They have been discovered in great numbers, and usually in ranges which seem to have some connection or relation to each other. They extend across Wisconsin in a southwestern direction from Fond-du-lac to the Mississippi, and are found also in other parts of this State and those heretofore mentioned. What may be called the second geographical division, includes the Sciota valley earthworks, which will be more specifically considered in this chapter than those of the country at large. This division may be described as lying mostly within the valley of the Ohio and its tributaries. The third division may be defined as embracing the States along the Gulf of Mexico and the Southern Mississippi. The mounds in this division are of increased size and regularity of form and they seem more closely allied to the Teocalli-shaped structures that abound in Mexico, while the enclosures, on the other hand, which are numerous farther north, are diminished in size and importance. Here, too, traces of bricks are found in the mounds and in the walls of the enclosures.

It is not within the province of this chapter to give an extended account of the southern or far northern and western groups of earthworks, but to dwell more particularly upon those of the great central division, and in conclusion to present some theories and speculations upon the race of people by whom they were built.

"The number of tumuli in the State of Ohio may be safely estimated at ten thousand, and the number of enclosures at from one thousand to fifteen hundred."* They are most numerous, as heretofore stated, along the larger streams, and the seats of the most dense population of the ancient people seem to have been along the Ohio, the Scioto and the Miamis, although they are scattered more or less numerously over almost the whole State. Not far from one hundred enclosures and five hundred mounds are found in Ross county, and along the fertile valley of the Scioto from the Ohio to Columbus it is safe to say there were at least three times this number of ancient remains.

Surprising as their number, their extent is equally a matter to excite the wonder of all who give this subject any study. Lines of embankment, varying in height from five to thirty feet, and enclosing areas of from one to fifty acres, are common, and enclosures of from one to two hundred acres are not unfrequently to be seen. Occasionally even this great size is exceeded. The mounds are of all sizes, from those but a few feet in height and a few yards in diameter, to the size of the great mound at Miamisburgh, Montgomery county, Ohio, which is sixty-eight feet in perpendicular height and eight hundred and fifty-two in circumference at the base, containing over three hundred thousand cubic feet of earth. Mounds of this size are most common in the South, and the usual dimensions of those in the section of country represented in this work are considerably less than those of the mounds above mentioned. The greater number are from six to thirty feet in height by forty to one hundred in diameter at the base. Flint, in his geography, says: "We have seen mounds which would require the labor of a thousand men employed upon our canals, with all of their mechanical aids and the improved implements of their labor, for months." Lewis and Clark describe an enclosure on the Missouri river which they estimated to contain six hundred acres.

All of these constructions are composed of earth or stone, and sometimes these materials are mixed, though rarely. In some instances the earth and stone composing these works are foreign in the locality, and must have been brought a considerable distance, but in the greater number of cases it has been removed from the surrounding plain. Deep pits often exist near the embankments or mounds. These are the wells of Caleb Atwater and other early writers on American antiquities. It is possible that a few were wells, or that the earth having been removed to be used in the erection of an elevation, they may have been secondarily designed for cisterns, reservoirs, or wells.

The larger portion of the enclosures are regular in outline, and the forms of the square and circle most often occur, either singly or in combination. Some are parallelograms, some ellipses, others polygons, regular or irregular. The irregular works are those which partake most of the character of defences, and are usually made to conform to the nature of the ground upon which they are situated, running along the brows of hills or cutting off the approaches to strong natural positions. The regular works, on the contrary, are found upon the level river terraces, great care having evidently been taken to select those least broken. It is in such localities that the combination of the square and circle is found, sometimes communicating with irregular modifications of these forms by avenues consisting of parallel lines of embankment. Detached parallels are also numerous.

The mounds are usually simple cones, sometimes truncated and occasionally terraced with graded or winding ascents to the summits. Some are elliptical and some pear-shaped, and others squares or parallelograms, with flanking terraces.

Another variety of remains are the causeways or roads and the graded descents to rivers. The alluvial terraces or river bottoms, as has been already remarked, were the favorite locality with the builders. The principal remains are found where the bottom is the widest and the soil most fertile. Some of the largest and most singular are at the junction of streams, as at Marietta, the mouths of Grave creek, of the Muskingum, Scioto, and Great Miami and other places. "It is worthy of remark," say Messrs. Squier and Davis, in their admirable work, "that the sites selected for settlements, towns and cities by the invading Europeans are often those which were the especial favorites of the Mound Builders and the seats of their heaviest population." In confirmation of this remark may be mentioned the towns of Marietta, Newark, Portsmouth, Chillicothe, Circleville and Cincinnati, in Ohio; Frankfort, in Kentucky, and St. Louis, in Missouri. "The centers of population are now where they were at the period when the mysterious race of the mounds flourished."

The earth and stone works may be divided into two classes—Enclosures and Tumuli, or Mounds. These constitute a single system of works, but for obvious reasons it is proper to classify them as above. The two great classes may again be divided into minor classes, viz.: Enclosures for Defence, Sacred and Miscellaneous Enclosures, Mounds of Sacrifice, Temple Mounds, Mounds of Sepulture, etc.

The general character of these aboriginal monuments having been briefly indicated, we shall endeavor to give the reader a more particular description of each of the several classes of remains.

DEFENSIVE WORKS.

A large and interesting class of the Mound Builders' works are of such a nature that the object for which they were constructed is indisputable. This kind of enclosures, or "forts," as they are commonly called, are to be found throughout the length and breadth of the Mississippi valley, from the Alleghanies to the ranges of the

* Squier and Davis' "Ancient Monuments of the Mississippi Valley."

Rocky mountains. The rivers that flow through this vast basin have worn their valleys deep into what was originally a plain, leaving broad terraces. The sides of these terraces are generally steep and difficult of access, and sometimes absolutely inaccessible. These are the very points that would naturally be selected by any people as the sites of defensive works, and hence it is not a matter of surprise that these heights are found to be occupied by strong and complicated works. The locations have evidently been chosen with great care. They occupy the highest points of land, are never commanded from neighboring positions, and while rugged and steep on most sides, have one or more points of easy approach, in the protection of which the builders seem to have exerted their skill to its utmost.

The usual defence is a simple embankment thrown up along and a little below the brow of the hill, varying in height and substantiability according to the degree of protection afforded by the natural declivity. Upon the side where the peninsula or promontory merges with the main land of the terrace or plateau, the enclosure is usually found to be guarded by double or overlapping walls, or a series of them, having sometimes an accompanying mound, designed, it may be, for a lookout, and corresponding to the barbican in the system of defence of the Britons of the middle ages. Works have been found which must originally have been by the side of streams, but from which the latter have receded in some cases half a mile. There is no instance of any fortification, enclosure, tumulus or other relic of the race of Mound Builders, having been found upon the lower or latest formed river terraces or bottoms. This is an important fact, and in connection with the one which precedes it affords strong evidence of the remoteness of the age in which the valley of the Ohio was the abiding place of this pre-historic people. Works of defence are found at Bourneville, Ross county, where the top of a high hill, having an area of one hundred and forty acres, is enclosed by a stone wall; in Butler and Highland counties upon the Little and Great Miami rivers; in Licking county, Greene, Warren and Preble counties, and a great many other places, that might be mentioned.

These works considered in a military point of view as forts, are in well chosen localities invariably, are well guarded, and with an adequate force, it seems rational to surmise, may have been absolutely impregnable to any mode of attack practiced by a rude or semi-civilized people. As natural strongholds they could not be excelled, and the amount of labor and skill expended in the artificial strengthening of the positions can not but arouse the admiration of the most stolid, and cause surprise to every student of our American antiquities. Some of these works are enclosed by miles of wall from ten to fifteen feet in height, measuring from the bottom of the ditch. With all of the facilities and labor-saving appliances of the present age, the construction of such extensive works would be a large undertaking; and when we reflect how comparatively rude, at the best, must have been the means in the possession of the people who raised the defensive works that abound in the valleys of the Ohio and Mississippi and their tributaries, we have some means of judging of the number of inhabitants the country must have had in the pre-historic era, and of the character of these people. Some of the "forts" have "dug holes" which contain at the present day large quantities of water, and which, it is not improbable, may have been designed as reservoirs from which a vast number of people, in a state of siege, may have drawn their water supply. All of the details of construction in the more important of these works point conclusively to the character of the works. That they were intended for military defence does not admit a doubt. The fact that the walls following the angles of the hill formed strong natural bastions, that the embankments are highest where the natural defence was slightest, and that the gateways where ascent was practicable are guarded by double walls or successive series of walls, go to sustain the conclusion. Every avenue is strongly guarded; the principal approaches, at the only points of easy access, are rendered doubly secure, often by the most intricate arrangement of fortifications. In or near almost all of these enclosures of a defensive nature there is a mound which may have been a watch or signal tower.

Some of the remains of fortifications show large numbers of openings which it has been surmised by various students of archæology were not all intended for places of ingress and egress, but were for the most part occupied by block-houses or bastions, composed of timber, which has long since, perhaps many centuries ago, decayed. A notable enclosure in which this peculiarity occurs is "Fort Ancient" in Warren county, Ohio. Here, too, is shown a strong evidence of the skill of the ancient race, and of their design. Across an isthmus connecting a singular peninsular-like hill with a large plateau the artificial wall is not less than twenty feet in height, or twice as high as that which skirts along the top of the precipitous descent. From the many manifestations that these works afford of the military judgment of their builders it is safe to conclude that the fortifications were in all particulars the best to secure the objects they sought, and that what may seem to us evidences of weakness or insufficiency might appear very differently had we a knowledge of the Mound Builders' system of warfare, and of the nature of the people who were their opponents.

One great principle may be laid down, from an examination of the ancient remains, viz.: those works that were primarily and principally intended for defence were situated upon the best natural sites, and they were irregular in form.

What scenes of slaughter, deeds of bravery and heroism, may have been enacted upon and within these walls on which the grass has been growing for centuries; upon which great monarchs of the forest have slowly developed and rotted away, we can only imagine. But that here was felt the awful shock of war we cannot doubt. Such vast works were not raised because of any groundless fears; they were for defence against a known and powerful enemy; they were constructed through the exercise of a wonderful industry and steadfastness of purpose. It is safe to suppose that the race who toiled to rear these almost imperishable walls of earth had the hardihood and the courage to fight to the last against any foe to conquer if they could, die if they must.

In regard to the military works and the people by whom they were built, an eminent writer upon that subject* has advanced a theory from which we shall quote. After speaking of the small defensive works that form a line through the northern part of the State from Conneaut to Toledo, this archæologist says: "The most natural inference in respect to this cordon of works is that they were constructed either to protect the advance of a nation landing from the lake and moving southward for conquest, or that they formed a line of resistance for a people inhabiting these shores and pressed upon by their southern neighbors." Nearly all of the works at the north are comparatively small, and they are indisputably works of defense. At the south, on the other hand, agriculture and religion seem to have chiefly occupied the attention of the ancient people. "In view of these facts," continues the writer, "we may venture to suggest a hypothesis without undertaking to assign to it any more than a basis of probability. Upon the assumption that two distinct nations occupied the State—that the northern were warlike and the southern peaceful and agricultural in their habits—may we not suppose that the latter were overcome by their northern neighbors, who built the military works to be observed upon the Ohio and its tributaries, while the more regular structures are the remains of the conquered people."

Messrs. Squier and Davis in their work upon the Mound Builders combat this theory. They say: "The differences pointed out are not greater than would naturally be exhibited between the structures of a sparse frontier population and those erected by more central and dense communities. The vast amount of work necessary to the construction of these forts precludes the notion that they were hastily constructed to repel a single or unexpected invasion. On the contrary there seems to have been a system of defences extending from the sources of the Susquehanna and Allegheny, in New York, diagonally across the country through central and northern Ohio to the Wabash. Within this range the works that are regarded as defensive are largest and most numerous. It may be inferred from the facts above stated that the pressure was from the northwest or that if the tide of emigration flowed from the south it was checked by this line. If, on the other hand, we suppose that in this region originated a semi-civilization which subsequently spread southward, constantly developing itself in its progress until it attained its culmination in Mexico, we may draw the inference that the savage hordes before whom the less warlike Mound Builders gradually retreated, or under whose onslaughts those who occupied the frontier entirely disappeared, came from the north. The contest was in either case a protracted one, the immense change a slow one. The resemblances between the defences of the Mound Builders and those exhibited in Mexico and Peru are numerous, and point to the conclusion that they were the work of the same class of people, though in different eras of the progress of civilization. The consideration of other classes of monuments, especially the sacred enclosures, will show equally strong resemblances, but we shall not just here enlarge upon this branch of our subject, reserving it for consideration in another part of this chapter.

*Charles Whittlesey, Esq., of Cleveland.

SACRED ENCLOSURES.

The existence through southern Ohio, and particularly in the Scioto valley, of a class of works very different in form and position from the military works, has been one of the most interesting facts that the students of archæology have had to claim their attention, and has been one of the most important as a source of light by which to study the nature of the ancient race. Evidences of a very satisfactory nature are afforded by this class of remains, that the Mound Builders were a religious race, for it has been demonstrated beyond a doubt, by those who have delved for secrets in some of these earth remains, that they were intended and used for sacred purposes. The small dimensions of most of the works, their regularity of construction, the occurrence of the ditch, interior to the embankment and the fact that many of them are completely commanded by adjacent heights, are circumstances which combine to show that the works were not intended solely or principally for defence. It being evident that this class of remains were not built for military purposes, the above conclusion is inevitable.

In general character these works offer an appearance very different from those which have already been described. They are most commonly to be found on the low, level, broad river bottoms, and seldom occur upon the table lands, or where the surface of the earth is broken or undulating. They are usually square or circular in form, and often these forms are found in combination. Very frequently they are to be seen in groups, though many instances are known of their being isolated. The greater number of the circles are of small size, with a nearly uniform diameter of two hundred and fifty or three hundred feet, and the ditch or fosse invariably appears interior to the wall. These circles have one gateway, which usually, though not always, opens toward the east. Mounds occur within them which are called sacrificial mounds. The small circles usually occur within larger works of a different character. Numerous little circles, from thirty to fifty feet in diameter, are found in proximity to larger works, and it is conjectured that they were intended for the foundations of lodges or structures of some kind, perhaps the habitations of the chiefs or priests. The larger circles are oftenest found in connection with squares; some of them embrace as many as fifty acres. They seldom have a ditch, but where they do, it is within the wall. As in the case of the rectangular works with which they are combined (and which it is believed never have a ditch), their walls appear to have been constructed of material brought from a distance, or removed evenly from the surface enclosed.

It is apparent that care has been taken in the construction of these works to leave the surface of the land enclosed by and adjacent to the structures as unbroken as possible. As it has been shown that the builders of these works displayed in the construction of their military fortifications a knowledge of the value of the exterior fosse, this fact alone affords almost positive proof against the hypothesis of military design. The walls usually have been found to be slight, not exceeding a height of from three to seven feet, though in some cases, as in the great circle at Newark and in the works at Circleville, they were much higher, being at the first-named place thirty feet and at the latter from fifteen to twenty.

The square or rectangular works found in combination with the circles are of various dimensions, but it has been noticed that certain groups are marked by a great uniformity in size. Quite a number are exact squares and measure exactly one thousand and eighty feet across. This uniformity could not possibly be accidental, and it clearly establishes the fact that the builders had some standard of measurement. The square enclosures have almost invariably eight gateways, at the angles and midway between upon each side, all of which are covered by small mounds. In some of the larger enclosures the openings are more numerous. A few remains, probably constructed for the same purpose or purposes as the squares and circles, have been discovered which are of an octagonal form. Near Chillicothe there is one of this character. The parallels, consisting of slight embankments, seven or eight hundred feet in length, and sixty or eighty feet apart, are considered as belonging to the general division denominate sacred enclosures.

The works are so varied in the forms exhibited and combinations effected that it is impossible to convey an adequate idea by description. If they were intended as the temples and consecrated grounds of the ancient race, how great must have been the religious zeal and enthusiasm that led to their erection. The magnitude of these works affords perhaps the greatest objection to the theory that they were formed entirely for the purpose which we have here supposed. Is it not more probable that the largest of these works, such as that at Newark, which includes within its walls a little less than four square miles, or even those which existed at Circleville, may have subserved several different purposes—that they may, in addition to having been places for worship, have been the theaters where games were indulged in, where marriages may have been celebrated, and great councils held? May they not have been occupied with the tents or houses or temples of the priesthood, or of those among the people who were great in authority, and, lastly, is it improbable that they were intended, also, in case of necessity to serve as places of refuge from an enemy? With the possibility, however, that the large and sometimes complicated enclosures were used for the several purposes above indicated, there remains the probability that they were more expressly designed for the celebration of religious or superstitious rites, and upon a colossal scale. There is reason to believe that the religious system of the Mound Builders, like that of the Aztecs, wielded among them a vast and probably controlling influence.

Their government may have been a government of the priesthood, one in which their religious leaders exercised also the civil authority, and through its strong sway secured the erection of these monuments, which challenge the wonder of men, as the temples of an unknown God. Messers. Squier and Davis, in their work, say that these works "were probably like the great circles of England and the squares of India, Peru and Mexico, the sacred enclosures, within which were erected the shrines of the gods of the ancient worship and the altars of the ancient religion. They may have embraced consecrated groves." We know that it has been a practice common to almost every people in every time to enclose their shrines, their places of worship, that they might be guarded from the profanation of man and the desecration of animals. We may reason, therefore, from analogy that the class of remains which we have been considering were sacred enclosures. But it may be inquired, what has become of the enclosed shrines? It must be conceded that any edifices not composed of stone or other imperishable material must have long ago disappeared and left no trace of existence. Nevertheless, within these enclosures are and have been found the sacrificial altars upon which human beings have undoubtedly been immolated, and pyramidal structures are to be seen which, except that they are composed of earth instead of stone, and have winding, graded ways leading to their summits instead of broad flights of steps, are similar to those found in Mexico. If these sustained edifices for worship they were doubtless composed of wood, which ages ago crumbled into dust.

This class of works has been found and carefully surveyed and examined, at various localities in Ross county; at Newark, Licking county; at Circleville; in Athens county; Pike county; at Marietta; at the mouth of the Scioto; in Montgomery county; in Franklin county, and at various other localities in Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky, and along the Mississippi valley.

SACRIFICIAL, SEPULCHRAL, TEMPLE AND MEMORIAL MOUNDS.

Stately marble palaces and temples have fallen into shapeless masses of ruins, while the simple mounds erected by a more rude and primitive people have withstood the elements and retained almost perfectly their original forms and proportions. Therefore we find scattered throughout a wide country the mound monuments raised by an ancient race. These were among nearly all races, in their infancy, the first objects of which ambition and adoration prompted the erection, the primitive memorials of all peoples. They are the principal storehouses of ancient art; they enclose the sacred altars reared in the name of a lost religion; they hold in sepulture the bones of the distinguished dead. As disclosed by the pick and spade these mounds and their contents serve to give the investigating archæologist the most extensive knowledge he can obtain in regard to the customs of their builders and the condition of the arts and sciences among them.

The mounds found in Ohio and elsewhere are most commonly divided by the students of this class of antiquities into several classes, viz.: Sepulchral, Sacrificial, Temple, Memorial or Monumental, Anomalous Mounds and Mounds of Observation. There is also a class of Effigies (which seldom occur except in the northwest) that are variously styled Animal, Emblematic or Symbolical mounds. Like the enclosures elsewhere described, these mounds are usually composed of earth, though stone mounds are by no means rare. It occasionally happens that a mound of stone occurs in a group of those composed of earth, as is the case of those which were within the limits of the city of Chillicothe. In respect to the positions of the mounds it may be said that those in Ohio occur mostly within or near enclosures; sometimes in groups but oftener isolated. Such is believed to be the case generally throughout the Mississippi valley. Messrs. Squier and Davis examined with especial reference to this point the works along the Ohio, from the Scioto to the Guyandotte, and found none of large dimensions in the form of enclosures, though mounds, chiefly small ones, were found in abundance. They were placed sometimes in lines as if by design. On the tops of the hills bordering the valleys in which earthworks are found, mounds occur in considerable numbers, the most elevated and commanding positions being frequently crowned with them. It is conjectured, and upon grounds of the strongest probability, that the mounds of this class were used for the same purpose as the cairns of the ancient Celts, that is as signal or alarm posts, and they have consequently been denominated signal mounds or mounds of observation. Colonel W. Marshall Anderson, of Circleville, an enthusiastic student of American antiquities, who has devoted much time to the examination of the Mound Builders' remains, holds to the above theory and has demonstrated by actual survey, made at his own expense, that these signal posts or watch towers which occur in the Scioto valley, formed a regular chain or system, and that by means of fires upon them signals could be sent up or down the country, to give warning of the approach of an enemy or to convey other intelligence. It is by no means improbable that centuries ago stirring information of danger, of defeat or of victory may have been flashed from station to station by means of beacon fires, the whole length of the Scioto and that messages of vast import may have been almost as quickly sent by this means in the pre-historic age, as they now are by electricity. It is an astounding but in every respect a reasonable conclusion that before the discovery of America by Columbus or by the Norse adventurers intelligence may have been sent from the Ohio river to the interior of what is now the State of Ohio with at least as great rapidity as in the present age by the steam-driven mail train that sweeps up the valley from Portsmouth to the Capitol!

On the eastern border of the Scioto valley, from Chillicothe to Columbus, about twenty mounds of the class commonly called mounds of observation, occur, so placed in respect to each other that were the forest of the country somewhat modified, signals of fire might be transmitted along the whole line. There is one upon the hill nearly six hundred feet high, called Mount Logan, near Chillicothe, which includes in its range the Circleville works and others up and down the Scioto valley. These mounds vary in size according to the height of the natural eminences upon which they are placed. Sometimes they are found so far back from the crests of the hills as to be invisible from the valleys—a fact which, while it does not harm the hypothesis that many of the mounds were intended, primarily, for signal posts, clearly indicates that others were intended for different purposes. Some bear upon their summits the traces of intense heat, whether of fires kindled to serve as signals, or for the celebration of some religious rite, it is not always safe to conjecture. The lines of classification can never be rigidly drawn. There are many mounds that must be regarded as anomalous.

The altar or sacrificial mounds have several distinctive characteristics. They occur only within or near the enclosures of that class commonly considered as the sacred places of the ancient race; they are usually stratified, and they contain symmetrically formed altars upon which are found various remains, all of which have been subjected to the action of fire. The altars are usually of stone or burnt clay, evidently brought from a distance; are of regular form, and rest upon the surface of the original earth at the center of the mound. Upon these altars have been found calcined bones, ashes, charcoal, igneous stones, beads, stone implements and pottery. Sacrifices of animals were, without doubt, here offered to propitiate the gods, and it is probable that human sacrifices also occurred. Although the altars are symmetrical, they are by no means uniform in shape or size. Some are round, some oblong, others square, and they vary from two to fifty feet in length, the usual dimensions being from five to eight feet. The remains found in the sacrificial mounds are, in numerous cases, such as to indicate that the altars had been covered up before the fires upon them were extinguished.

The stratification of the mounds is not horizontal, but conforms to the convexity of their shape, and consists of alternate layers of sand, gravel and pebbles. Why the altars were covered is a question that cannot be answered. It may have been in conformance to some religious law, or to preserve them from the profane gaze of the people of another faith than that of these builders.

Sepulchral mounds are more numerous than any of the other classes of tumuli. They are generally of conical form, and vary in size from six to eighty or ninety feet in height, the average altitude being perhaps twenty feet. They usually stand outside of the walls of enclosures, and often occur in localities remote from any other monuments, though there are many cases in which they are found in groups, exhibiting a dependence that probably has some meaning. These mounds invariably cover a skeleton, and in rare instances, more than one. The skeletons most commonly have evidences of having been enveloped at the time of their interment in bark, or coarse matting, of which the traces and casts sometimes remain. Occasionally a rude chamber of stone or timber surrounded the human remains. Burial by fire seems to have been frequently practiced by the Mound Builders in Ohio and the other Northern States, and urn burial undoubtedly prevailed in the Southern States. With the skeletons are found various remains of art, rude utensils of different kinds, ornaments and weapons. The fact that such articles are always found in close proximity to the human remains indicates that the Mound Builders, like the North American Indians, had the superstitious and delusive notion that the implements and weapons would be useful to the deceased in the future state. It is vulgarly believed that the ancient race reared mounds over the resting places of all their dead, an idea which is readily dispelled by reflection upon the immensity of their population and the comparatively small number of mounds. A people so numerous as the Mound Builders must have been, and living in the country, as there is evidence they did, for a long period, must have had vast cemeteries. The conclusion to which all archæologists have come in regard to this matter, is, that only the illustrious chieftains or priests of the race were honored by the rearing of mounds over their places of sepulture, and that the greater number, the common people of the race, were buried by the simple process of interment.

Day after day, and year after year, since the present race pushed westward into the valleys of the Ohio and Mississippi, the ploughshare has uncovered remains which have well-nigh returned "to the dust whence they came." So common has been the occurrence of unearthing human remains in some parts of the country that the discovery scarcely elicits remark. The wasting banks of the rivers occasionally display vast cemeteries, and names have been given to several localities from such exposures. At various places thousands of graves are said to occur, placed in ranges parallel with each other, and extensive ancient burial places are well known in Missouri and Tennessee. It is not to be wondered at that when the bones in the mounds have so nearly crumbled into shapeless fragments, those buried in the common plain, and which are necessarily less protected from moisture, should in many cases have passed to that condition nearly or quite indistinguishable from the mould that surrounds them.

There are doubtless grand depositories of the dead who thronged our valleys and raised the silent monuments of their toil all about us. We know not when we tread the earth of our village streets or the green turf of the fields, but that we walk over the remains of thousands of forms, which an age ago were pregnant with the same life and spirit of which we are possessed.

By some students it is maintained that the size of the sepulchral mounds bears some relation to the rank and importance, when living, of the personages over whom they have been erected. It is conjectured that where several tumuli are found in juxtaposition, the largest covers the remains of some hero or chief among the people and the small ones those of members of his family, or perhaps those who were his counsellors and aids. In many instances the remains of Indians have been found in the mounds, usually interred near the surface. The comparatively recent date of their entombment is established by the fact that with the remains have been discovered silver ornaments, objects such as have never been found in the lower depths of the tumuli, and clearly of such origin as would point to their manufacture or introduction by the early French or English explorers. In instances where large numbers of human remains have been unearthed in the digging down of mounds, the verdict of those qualified by research to judge, has been that they were the skeletons of Indians. It is probable that the ceremonies of interment among the Mound Builders were conducted with great regularity of system, and that they were deliberate and solemn observances, regulated by religious customs and celebrated with all of the pomp and dignity that have characterized similar ceremonies among most superstitious races. It is not improbable that in certain cases a special practice may have been observed. The presence or absence of charcoal layers and also the evidences of incremation or of simple inhumation may be accounted for upon this hypothesis. The greatest of the mounds of this class is at the mouth of Grave creek, upon the Ohio, twelve miles below Wheeling, in the State of Virginia. Its height is about seventy feet, and its circumference at the base about one thousand. When excavated, in 1838, it was found to contain two chambers, one upon the level of the surrounding plain, containing two skeletons, and another thirty feet above, which contained but one skeleton. It is conjectured that the latter was placed upon the top of the mound as first erected, and that earth was then piled upon it until the mound reached its present proportions. With the remains in this great mound were found between three and four thousand shell beads, a number of ornaments of mica, bracelets of copper, and various articles carved from stone. Small mounds, of the kind which has here been described, abound along the valley of the Ohio and the Scioto.

The Temple mounds are not numerous in Ohio, and it is believed only occur at Marietta, Newark, Portsmouth, and in the vicinity of Chillicothe. They are usually in the form of truncated cones, and when of other form than the cone have invariably flattened or level tops. Some have a large area and slight elevation, and are called platforms. Some are terraced, and some have graded ways or spiral ascents to their summits. The object for which the mounds of this class were reared was, it is conjectured, to furnish sites for temples or "high places" for the performance of the religious rites of the people. Along the Mississippi river the further southward investigations have been carried the larger and more perfect are tumuli of this kind found to be. They constantly increase in size until they merge by imperceptible degrees of improvement into the form and magnitude of the Teocalli of Mexico. Some remarkable temple mounds occur in Kentucky, on the Cumberland river, and elsewhere. In Whiteby county is one three hundred and sixty feet long, one hundred and fifty wide and twelve high, with graded ascents; and at Hopkinsville, Christian county, is one of great size, upon which the court house is built."* These mounds, whether found in the north or south, are generally of large base and small altitude. "The supposition is that the summits of these temple mounds were crowned with structures of wood that served the purpose of temples, all traces of which, owing to the perishable nature of the material used in their construction, have disappeared."*

Memorial or monumental mounds belong to the class of tumuli that were constructed to perpetuate the memory of some important event, or in honor of some great personage. Many of the mounds found along the Ohio, and in fact throughout the country from the lakes southward, are believed to be of this class. The practice of raising mounds of stone or earth among the ancient Hebrews and other nations of antiquity is a well authenticated matter of history—religious and profane. It is supposed that the Mound Builders, like those races, and like the civilized people of the present age, reared many of their mounds to serve simply as monuments or memorials of great deeds accomplished.

Beside the classes of tumuli already described are many others of various construction and characteristics, as the stone heaps, for instance, which occur in connection with the works and sometimes alone, and the mounds composed of what appear to be ashes and portions of charcoal. By far the most striking and peculiar constructions, however, are the animal mounds of the northwest. The field in which this class of remains occur is embraced within the southern part of Wisconsin and extends from east to west about one hundred and fifty miles. The effigies or animal mounds are simply raised figures or great basso relievas of beasts, birds, reptiles and sometimes of men. They are from a foot to six feet in height. The belief has been expressed by some good authorities that these works were intended to be heraldic symbols, or symbolical mounds, which may have been erected as objects of worship or as altars upon which sacrifices were offered, or that perhaps they "served some other purposes connected with the religious worship of their idolatrous and superstitious constructors." "Of the three most notable examples of effigies in our State," says Mr. Smucker, of Newark, "two are situated in Licking county. One of these is near the center of an ancient work commonly called 'The Old Fort,' which is an enclosure of high banks, within a mile of Newark, containing within its embankments nearly thirty acres. It is called Eagle mound from its supposed resemblance to an eagle on the wing. At all events it represents a bird of immense proportions with its wings outspread. * * * * Its length is, approximately, two hundred feet and it measures about the same from tip to tip of wings. Excavations into the middle of this effigy brought to light an altar which gave indications of the action of fire upon the earth and stones composing it, while the presence of ashes and charcoal strongly suggested sacrificial offerings." The other, called Alligator mound, is situated upon the summit of a hill about six miles west of Newark. The shape and form are distinctly represented. Near Brush creek, in Adams county, is the most extensive and remarkable effigy mound in Ohio. "It is in the form of a serpent [we quote from Mr. Smucker] of more than a thousand feet in length, his body forming graceful curves and his tail terminating in triple coils. The embankment which constitutes the main body of the serpent is about five feet in height, measures thirty feet in width and diminishes in size both toward the head and tail." The mouth is widely open, as if in the act of swallowing or ejecting an oval figure, which rests partly within the distended jaws. "The combined figure has been regarded by some as a representation of the oriental cosmological idea of the serpent and the egg."

A singular class of remains is found in Missouri. They consist of small tumuli having, as a general thing, the form of an ellipse, and measure about twenty-five by eighteen feet. They are very numerous in some localities, always occur near the streams, and are arranged in straight lines, with regular streets between them, as if they were the remains of mud houses, or the foundations upon which some kind of structures had once stood.

THE ART REMAINS

found in the various earth works of the Mound Builders consist mostly of articles of pottery and implements, weapons and ornaments made of flint, bone, ivory, shell, stone and metal. No traces of wooden utensils are found. If the ancient race had such they have perished completely. But few and faint evidences have been found of materials which formed articles of dress. The Mound Builders seem to have attained a considerable degree of skill in the art of making pottery, and the various specimens that have been found exhibit a delicacy of modeling and finish which compare favorably with the ancient Mexican and Peruvian pottery, which they resemble in many particulars. They are superior to anything of known Indian origin. The material of which they are composed is a fire clay, usually worked nearly pure, though sometimes containing an admixture of sand, pulverized quartz, or mica. The articles found have been urns, bowls, vases, pipes, and rude sculptures, probably idols, representing men and animals. But comparatively few of these specimens have been found in Ohio. They are more numerous, and of finer and larger proportions, in the South.

Articles of metal have been discovered in considerable numbers. They are of such appearance as to indicate that the makers had no knowledge of the art of reducing metals from the ores or of forming them by the aid of fire. Most of the implements and ornaments appear to have been shaped by hammering. Copper is among the metals that occur most commonly, and of it axes, breast-plates and various ornaments are composed. Silver only occurs as the plating or covering of other metals. It is laid on with great delicacy, over copper, in thin leaves. Copper axes and drills or chisels, hammered from rods of this metal, have been found at various places in Ohio—in the Scioto valley and other sections of the State. Ornaments of copper have been found encircling the arms of skeletons in the sepulchral mounds and are not unfrequently discovered upon the altars enclosed in the sacrificial mounds. Gorgets or breast-plates of the same metal frequently occur, as do also discs, tubes, beads, etc. These articles, like the axes, have not only been found in the tumuli of the Southern States, but in those of the Northern, and specimens of all have been picked up at Chillicothe, Circleville, and other places in the vicinity of the Scioto. Implements of stone, flint arrow and spear heads, and axes of obsidian greenstone, porphyry and granite are among the articles found in the largest quantity and variety. The axes vary in size from two to ten inches in length, and from slight weight up to that of a dozen pounds. They were evidently intended, in most cases, to be attached to handles, and were designed for various uses, as battle axes, or simple cutting or crusting instruments, of value in the arts of peace and industry. Awl and needle shaped instruments made of polished bone, and horn, are of frequent occurrence

The immense quantities in which these pipes have been unearthed would indicate that the Mound Builders were great smokers. They are of an almost infinite variety of forms, sizes and substance, some simple and others very elaborate in design. Most are worked in porphyry and display a finish which would indicate that their makers were considerably advanced in the arts. A large proportion of the articles found in the mounds may be classed as ornaments. Beads may be counted in some instances by hundreds, and even thousands, each one of such appearance as to indicate no inconsiderable labor of production. They are formed of metal, bone, ivory, shells and other materials. Pendants of quite elaborate workmanship are common. Many of the beads, pendants, gorgets and nameless ornaments are of peculiar and oft-recurring form, a fact that leads to the conclusion that they had a conventional significance and were worn as insignia or badges of distinction. Mica seems to have been much regarded by the Mound Builders, and has frequently been found in the sepulchral mounds and elsewhere, both in its crude state and in the form of various ornaments.

The sculptures from the mounds belong to the highest grade of remains left by the ancient race. There is nothing imposing about them, but they are remarkable for the faithfulness with which they represent animals and birds of other climes than those in which they are found, and they thus are of value as indicating the emigration, extensive communication, or a cotemporaneous existence of the same race over a vast extent of country. The sculptures, like all the other remains, are more numerous toward the gulf of Mexico than in the north. Representations of the human head have been found under such circumstances as to leave little doubt that they belonged to the mound era. Images of animals are much more common than those of the human head or figure. Their leading characteristics are such as to point to an identity between them and the larger and more elaborate sculptures found in Mexico. The art remains are immeasurably beyond anything that the North American Indians are known to have produced, even at this day, with all of the suggestions of European art and the advantages afforded by steel instruments." *

REMAINS IN PICKAWAY AND FRANKLIN COUNTIES.

The ancient remains in Pickaway and Franklin counties number at least a hundred distinct works, and there are doubtless even more. The larger portion of them are in Pickaway county, and the most important are to be found in the vicinity of Circleville, which was unquestionably a densely settle center of population, as was evidenced by the extensive works which give the present town its name and which are fully described elsewhere in this volume. (See history of Circleville.)

There is upon the place of D. M. Pontious, within the Circleville incorporation limits, a small mound, partially destroyed by excavation. Just outside of the corporation is a lookout or signal mound upon the land of N. Julien, upon the Lancaster pike. There is also upon Edward Smith's property, a mound upon a natural eminence corresponding to that which stood where the Episcopal church now is, and perhaps belonging to the same system. It was opened a number of years ago by Col. W. Marshall Anderson, who removed from it some small articles of copper and a finely preserved skull, which is mentioned by Prof. Wilson in his work on Pre-historic Man. There is upon John J. Lindsey's place, near the river, a small mound which may, however, be of natural formation. In Washington township there is a simple tumulus upon the farm of Jacob Hitler, and in Pickaway there are several tumuli, among the most important being those upon the farms of S. H. Evans and James Rader, and one in the forty-fourth section, the latter probably as large as any tumulus in the county. That upon the farm of Mr. Rader is upon a natural elevation and is about twenty feet high.

In Jackson township there is a conical mound about thirty-five feet high, near John Renick's house, on Darby creek. It corresponds to the signal mounds in Circleville and Wayne townships, and commands a view of several of them. Another mound in this township is upon the river, on land owned by W. B. Caldwell. It is a regular conical shaped tumulus, about twenty-five feet high, and was doubtless, like most of the other mounds in this vicinity, used as a signal station. Upon land owned by Washington McLean and situated upon Darby creek, is another large mound, and not far away the washing of the creek has disclosed large quantities of human bones, buried at a depth of only two or three feet. It is conjectured, from the manner of burial, that the beings whose bones were laid here perished in battle and were hastily interred.

In Wayne township there is an enclosure on the William Fleming farm. The walls were about ten or twelve feet in height and the area enclosed not far from fifty acres. It is known as the "Old Fort." Another enclosure is upon the Scioto river about two miles north of Yellow Bud and crossed by the old Franklinton road. It consists of a single wall and ditch cutting off a high promontory, formed by the declivity of the table land and the bank of a wide and deep ravine. The banks are not far from one hundred feet in height, and in most places absolutely inaccessible. It has a single gateway opening towards a spring. The wall is four feet high, and the ditch of corresponding depth. There are no mounds within this enclosure nor in its immediate vicinity. The enclosure was undoubtedly designed for defence. Mounds occur upon the farms of John Kirkindall, James Westenhaver and George Bartelmas. There is a tradition that an inscribed stone was found near the enclosure last described, but it does not have the credence of those who have made the mounds a study.

In Scioto township, near what is known as "Mound riffle," is a mound, now half washed away, upon the land of George Hall. Immediately above, on the farm of David Williams, upon a bluff bank, is what was once a vast cemetery. Many of the bones have been washed from their burial place by the high water. There is a tumulus upon the farm of V. I. Williams. In this township, near the north line of the county and upon the right bank of the Scioto is an enclosure evidently for defensive purpose. It is only remarkable for possessing three lines of embankments, with the corresponding ditches.

In Muhlenburgh township is one of the most perfect mounds to be found in the county. It is upon the level bottom of Darby creek, on the farm of Jesse Gulick. Another is to be seen upon the property of Milton M. Thomas, a mile and a half south of that first mentioned.

Walnut township contains several ancient remains. Those at Ringold are the most noteworthy. A small circle is visible still, and three mounds, composed principally of red stone, are near by. In Salt Creek there is a small mound of stone which may possibly have been formed by the Indians. It is near Adelphi, upon the farm of Mrs. Susannah Shoemaker, and upon one of the highest elevations in Pickaway county. The mound itself is about thirty feet high.

Near Tarlton, in the narrow valley of Salt creek, is a remarkable specimen of the ancient remains in the form of a Greek cross. It occupies a narrow spur of land at a prominent point in the valley. It is ninety feet between the ends, and elevated about three feet above the adjacent surface. It is surrounded by a slight ditch. In the center is a circular depression, twenty feet across and about as many inches deep. The sides of the cross correspond very nearly with the cardinal points. Immediately back of it is a small circular elevation of stone and earth, denominated an altar. Several small mounds occur near by, and upon the high hill are several large ones. Mounds are quite numerous in this little valley and upon the hills bordering it, but it is not known to contain any enclosures. *

One of the most notable of the ancient remains in Franklin county is a defensive fortification four and a half miles north of Worthington, on the left bank of Olentangy creek. The artificial defence consists of a wall, which is now about three feet in height, with an exterior ditch. The natural defence is a bluff of slate one hundred feet in height. This work was surveyed, many years ago, by Charles Whittlesey, esq.

The same archæologist and antiquarian, in a contribution to the Smithsonian publications, (volume III), has a brief description, with an accompanying plate, of some ancient remains about three miles southwest of Columbus, on the Harrisburg turnpike. There were here plainly visible, a few years ago, two almost exact circular enclosures, one about eight hundred, and the other about five hundred feet in diameter. The walls were only slight elevations, and measuring from the bottom of the ditch (which in this case was exterior) to the top of the embankment, the distance was nowhere found to be more than three feet. No evidence was discovered that palings had ever crowned this low embankment.

Mr. Joseph Sullivant, who, at his own expense, a number of years ago, had surveys made of many works in Ohio, has drawings of an oblong enclosure on William Vining's land, on the Olentangy, at a point where a small run comes in. A truncated mound is represented upon the southern embankment, and there is a small circular enclosure with an opening to the east, near by, and another with three openings, in a northwesterly direction from the large enclosure. None of the embankments were more than three feet high when the examination was made, and maps drawn, which Mr. Sullivant has in his possession. The purpose for which this enclosure was intended is not clearly revealed. Its location gives some indication that it might have been for defence, but the conformation of the embankment tends to controvert that theory. The walls were not of sufficient height to have formed a defence of any value, unless they had been surmounted by palings.

A small work at the mouth of a run which empties into the Olentangy, above Worthington, shows a conformation which would indicate that it was for defensive purposes. It is simply a low embankment in the form of an arc of a circle, and running from the river bank to that of the creek. It is marked in the drawing as situated upon the DeWolf lot.

Mr. Sullivant, at an early day, observed many small and irregular elevations and enclosures about Franklinton, which have since, of course, been entirely obliterated. Parallel lines of embankment occurred in several places.

The observations of the gentleman whom we have named have extended over a wide field and a long period, and his conclusions have, therefore, the weight of a most excellent authority. It is interresting to note that upon one important matter, at least, his investigations have led to the same discovery that another careful student—W. Marshall Anderson, of Circleville—has made. We refer to the evident location of the mounds along the river in such places as made signaling from one to another possible. Mr. Sullivant found small tumuli all along the Scioto, from Dublin southward, each of which commanded a view of the next immediately above or below, and that their location was so fixed intentionally he has no doubt. These tumuli, which have usually been called signal mounds, or mounds of observation, are usually not of large size. There is a noticeable increase in their elevation and general dimensions the farther south they occur in the valley of the Scioto, as, in fact, there is in other valleys, and as has been heretofore stated, in the great valley of the Mississippi.

* Squier and Davis.

We may add here that Mr. Sullivant believes that a race of men existed here anterior to the age of the Mound Builders, and he cites, as one evidence of this theory, shell heaps mingled with charcoal, which he has discovered under many feet of earth by the side of the river and laid bare by its washings. The shells are those of a mussel, but different from that which is at present found in our streams.

The more common classes of earthworks—the tumuli known as mounds of observation, and as sepulchral or commemorative mounds — were, and are still, very numerous in Franklin county, though many have been obliterated by the plowshare or dug away by seekers after curiosities. They occur in greatest number along the Scioto, the Olentangy, and other streams, and many may still be seen in Washington, Norwich, Perry, Sharon, Clinton, Blendon, Mifflin, Montgomery, Franklin, Hamilton, and Jackson townships. They are, or were, most numerous in the vicinity of Columbus (giving evidence again that the centers of the old population were in the same vicinities as the present) and upon the east side of the river.

There was a mound in Franklinton made of clay, and the brick of which the old court house, the first in the county, was constructed, were made of the clay which the ancient people had handled and reared into a memorial or monument. Another mound stood upon ground now covered by the penitentiary, and was demolished at an early day.

The location of one mound in Columbus, which was long since destroyed, is imperishably fixed by the naming of a street. The tumulus which stood where the court house now is, at the corner of Mound and High streets, was found to contain, when it was demolished, many human bones and some remains of rude art. There is an object of the latter class, taken from this mound, in possession of Joseph Sullivant, esq., which is quite unique. It is the figure of an owl, carved in stone, and is about seven and a half inches long and five inches in height. There is a funnel-shaped cavity in the back, communicating with another, drilled at nearly a right angle, and it is conjectured that the figure may have been used as the bowl of a pipe. The old State House was partly constructed of bricks manufactured from the clay of this mound. The following lines called forth by the razing of this mound, published in one of the city papers at the time, well reflect the regrets that many felt when the interesting monument was demolished. They were written by Thomas Backus, of Columbus, and appeared over the signature of "Fabius."

"Oh, Town! consecrated before
The white man's foot ere trod our shore,
To battle's strife and valor's grave,
Spare! oh spare, the buried brave.

"A thousand winters passed away,
And yet demolished not the clay,
Which on yon hillock held in trust,
The quick of the warrior's dust.

"The Indian came and went,
He hunted through the lengthened plain;
And from the mound he oft beheld
The present silent battle field.

"But did the Indian e'er presume,
To violate that ancient tomb?
Ah, no! he had the soldier grace
Which spares the soldier's resting place.

"It is alone for Christian hand
To sever that sepulchral band,
Which ever to the view is spread,
To bind the living to the dead."

DEDUCTIONS AND SPECULATIONS.

The reader, taking into consideration the general facts which have been presented in this chapter, will be able to deduce his own conclusions in regard to the probable number and nature of the ancient population. In regard to the numerical strength of the race, it is safe to conclude that it was great and widespread, and in customs, government and religion was homogeneous. But whether the Mound Builders were ever at one time spread over the entire country in which we find their works, or whether they migrated slowly from one part to another, seeking a more genial climate, or pressed by another and hostile people, we cannot know, nor does such questions effect the correctness of the conclusion above stated. The differences pointed out between the works in the northern, middle and southern divisions are not sufficient to indicate that they were the works of different nations. The features common to all are numerous and authorize the belief that they belong to one grand system. The immensity of many of the remains, and the great number of the smaller ones, point to the conclusion that the race was one of vast number. Caleb Atwater, in his contribution to the Archæologia Americanna, published in 1819, says: "The State of Ohio was probably once much more thickly settled than it now is, when it contains a population of about seven hundred thousand inhabitants"—a conclusion which has been assented to by nearly every student of western antiquities. Some parts of the State were doubtless uninhabited, but the dense population in the localities of Circleville, Chillicothe, along Paint creek, at the mouth of the Scioto, and in other places along the valleys of the Ohio and its tributaries, must have made the population as large as that claimed by Mr. Atwater, and in the localities named above very likely as large or larger than it is at present. Beside the evidence afforded by the size of the works and their elaborate character, the immense number of human bones found in the earth all through Southern Ohio and along the valley of the Mississippi attest the fact that there was a dense population resident for a long period. That this people were under a single and strong government seems highly probable, because under any other the performance of such an immense amount of labor could not have been secured. Very likely some sort of servitude or vassalage prevailed.*

It follows of necessity that if the Mound Builders were a numerous people, they were also an agricultural people. The population was much too large to have been sustained by the spontaneous yieldings of the earth, by the products of the streams and lakes, or to live by the chase.

They were not savages or barbarians, but attained to that condition of life best described as semi-civilized. The general features of the works prove this. They had some military skill, as is shown by the construction of their fortresses, and some knowledge of mathematics or of something analagous to modern methods of surveying, as is evidenced by the regularity of the geometrically formed enclosures, many of which are absolutely perfect circles, squares or octagons, as the case may be, and uniform in size. They had, as has been shown, some skill in constructive art, and in the working of metals.

Undoubtedly the ancient people had great regard for their religion, as is shown by the great number and size of those works which were incontestably constructed for religious observances. The sacrificial character of their religion is beyond doubt. Some of the wisest students of ancient remains have not hesitated to say that the Mound Builders worshipped the elements, also the sun, moon and stars, and that they offered up human sacrifices to the gods whom they worshipped. This latter conclusion has been deduced from the fact that calcined human bones have been often found upon the altars unearthed in various parts of the country. Incremation may, however, have been practiced, and the remains thus left have afforded grounds for the foregoing supposition.

When and from whence came the Mound Builders, and when and whither did they go? These are questions to which there comes no answering voice. Only the smallest evidence, and that of the apochryphal kind, has been received that the ancient race had a written language. The two or three tablets that have been discovered, even if genuine, may have been only trophies that the Mound Builders secured from some other race, and which, perhaps, were handed down for ages as precious heirlooms. Were it possible to decipher them there is but little reason to believe that any knowledge of the origin of the people in whose works they were found could be gained. It is improbable that any discoveries will ever be made which will settle this mooted question. Those who do not argue that the Mound Builders were an aboriginal race, generally agree that they had their origin in the Orient, traveled eastward across Asia, finally crossed the Pacific Ocean or Behrings Straits, and then passing southward and eastward, increasing as they went, reached the middle region of the northern United States, and from thence, by slow process of migration, made their way southward through the Mississippi valley and ultimately into Mexico. The resemblances between the tumuli of the United States and the Teocalli of Mexico suggest some connection between the people whom we know as the Mound Builders and the semi-civilized races that formerly dwelt in the latter country, in Central America and Peru, and who erected the vast structures which lend such an absorbing interest to those regions. Another theory is that the race, instead of journeying southward, improving constantly in condition and increasing largely in population, had their origin in Mexico, or some other part of tropical or semi-tropical South or North America, and migrated northward, gradually retrograding in civilization until they reached the lake region and became so barbarian in their habits of life as to have lost their early habits of industry, their civilized customs, and their government. This theory has but little support, its opposite—previously stated—being, as has been heretofore said, the one which most archæologists have favored.

Beside the fact that the similarity between the ancient works in the northern part of the United States, those along the Mississippi and those in Mexico, points to their creation by the same race, the history and traditions of the early Mexican people, which extend back to the seventh century, afford something of a corroboratory nature. The people of Montezuma, as that unhappy ruler informed Cortez, knew by their looks that they "were not natives, but strangers who came from a great distance." Thus it will be seen, if the Mound Builders were the progenitors of the race to which Montezuma belonged, they must have arrived in Mexico prior to the close of the seventh century. The Aztecs are said by Mexican authorities to have arrived in the year 648. To that race they ascribe the Teocalli with which their country abounds.

If we allow ourselves to be influenced by the above date, supposing, indeed, that the Aztecs were the descendents of the Mound Builders, we must necessarily regard the ancient remains of our country as belonging to a period prior to the date given. The same or a greater degree of antiquity is indicated by other evidence. The exceedingly decayed condition of the skeletons in the mounds, the amount of vegetable accumulation in the excavations, the age of trees standing upon embankments, the shifting of the river channels and the facts that none of the Mound Builders' works stand upon the latest terraces or river bottoms or north of the northernmost lake ridges, all lead to the conclusion that a great time has elapsed since the ancient race inhabited the country. Some of the trees are positively known to have an age of from six to eight hundred years, and they are surrounded by the mouldering trunks of others undoubtedly of equal original size. Allowance must be made for a reasonable time for the encroachment of the forest after the works were abandoned by the builders, and then how great seems the antiquity of these remains when we reflect that they have been covered by at least the second full growth of forest.

Speculating upon a people of a less remote age, we might exclaim with Halleck,

> "What tales if there be tongues in trees,
> These giant oaks could tell
> Of beings born and buried here!"

But the hoary antiquity of the stateliest monarchs of the wood cannot carry us back to the time when the builders of the enduring earth monuments dwelt in our land. We can only know that a vast population filled our valleys and passed away; that a nation existed and is gone, leaving no page of history to carry through the ages the story of its origin and destiny. All that the student desires to know, that for which he has anxiously but vainly sought, has been engulfed in the illimitable oblivion that holds so much more of the history of human life—how much we cannot tell. And here another thought arises —the conception of a possibility so stupendous and awe-inspiring as to render the subject of our former speculation, large though it is and fraught with mysterious interest, dwarfed by the comparison. Vast as may have been the age that has elapsed since our land was the theater of this unknown race, it is but a brief period in the cycles of time that have swept by since the first day dawn of the world, and ancient as we are accustomed to regard the Mound Builders of America, they may have been only the last in a series of vanished races of men—the blood of the earth that has gone forth at every pulse beat of creation, every heart throb of the Infinite.

CHAPTER II.

THE INDIANS.

THE next race of men occupying our land after the disappearance of the immense semi-civilized population which reared the countless earth memorials of their existence, was the savage Indian race, vastly weaker in numbers than their mysterious predecessors, and, unlike them, having less prominent habitations and subsisting chiefly upon the spontaneous yieldings of earth and stream, and following the chase for their simple food and other necessities.

The history of the Indian tribes of the territory that now constitutes the State of Ohio, begins at about the middle of the eighteenth century. Knowledge concerning them before 1750 is meagre, and consists almost wholly of their vague traditions. Indian traders and explorers began, a little before the middle of the last century, to contribute some accurate information in regard to the tribes among whom they made their journeys, and Colonel Boquet's expedition to the villages on the Tuscarawas and Muskingum rivers resulted in the attainment of the most definite and authentic knowledge that had, up to that time, been secured. The principal tribes were the Wyandots, called Hurons by the French, the Delawares and the Shawanoes or Shawnees, both of the Algonquin group, the Miamis, the Mingos, an offshoot from the Iroquis or a fragment of the Six Nations, and the Ottawas and Chippewas. The Wyandots occupied the country about the Sandusky river; the Delawares the valleys of the Tuscarawas and Muskingum; the Miamis the valleys of the Great and Little Miami; the Mingos were in greatest number on the Ohio river about Mingo bottom, below Steubenville, and also on the Scioto river; the Ottawas had their headquarters in the valleys of the Maumee and Sandusky; the Chippewas were confined principally to the south shore of Lake Erie, and the Shawnees, who are most properly the subject of this chapter, had their greatest strength in the valleys of the Scioto and Mad rivers. All of the different tribes, however, frequented, more or less, lands lying outside of their regular divisions of territory. They commingled, more or less, with each other, and so it occurred that in the Scioto valley and elsewhere, at the period when the first definite knowledge of the Ohio Indians was obtained, numbers of them belonging to the Wyandot, Delaware, Mingo, and Miami divisions were found.

The Wyandots, or Hurons, according to the greatest weight of authority, were among the earliest red men who dwelt within the territory at present included in Ohio. Then came the Delawares, who claimed to be the elder branch of the Lenni-Lenape, and called themselves the grandfathers of the kindred tribes, but recognizing the superiority of the Wyandots. This division has been awarded a high rank by nearly all writers upon the Indians. The Ottawas lived originally upon the banks of the Canadian river which bears their name, remaining there until driven away by the Five Nations. They were then scattered through Ohio and Canada along the shores of Lake Erie. The Ohio Indians, as a rule, were fine specimens of their race. None were more so than the Shawnees, Shawanese, Shawnoes or Shawanoese.* They were the only tribe among the Indians of the northwest who had a tradition of foreign origin,† and for some time after the whites became acquainted with them held a yearly festival to celebrate the safe arrival in this country of their ancestors. There is considerable conflicting testimony in regard to them. It is generally conceded that they, at an early date, separated from the other Lenape tribes and established themselves in the southern States, through which part of the country they migrated and roamed from Florida to Kentucky. The main body of the tribe, encouraged by their friends, the Miamis is supposed to have crossed the Ohio and, pushing northward up the fertile and beautiful valley of the Scioto, made an extensive village and there remained until the war with the Five Nations, when, with their allies, they were dispersed. After a period of nomadic life they formed a kind of an alliance with the Wyandots and again concentrated in the Scioto valley, consummating what was, undoubtedly, a long cherished plan. The nation was here again re-united by the arrival of that part of the tribe which, when dispersed by the Five Nations, had made forcible settlements on the head waters of the Carolina and in the Creek country. It is conjectured by some students that this southern party lived upon the Suwanee river, and that that well known name was derived from them, being a corruption of the tribe name. Tecumseh, whose name and fame add lustre to the annals of this tribe, is said to have been born of a Creek woman whom his father married during the southern migration. It was about the year 1750 that this nation became reunited in Ohio, and for forty years thereafter they were engaged in almost constant warfare against the whites. They were among the most active allies of the French, and after the conquest of Canada, continued, in concert with the Delawares, hostilities which were only terminated after the successful campaign of Colonel Boquet. The first permanent settlers in Ohio were annoyed and harrassed by the Shawnees until 1794. They took an active part against the Americans in the war for Independence and in the Indian war which followed and which was terminated in 1795 by the treaty of Greenville. A part of them, under the leadership of Tecumseh, joined the British in the war of 1812. A title commonly applied to the Shawnees was "the Spartans of the race," and their constancy in braving danger and enduring the consequences of defeat seems to have made them deserving of the appellation. They have also been styled the "Bedouins of the American wilderness," which, considering their extensive and almost constant wanderings, is not inappropriate.

The Shawnees upon the Scioto had, in 1764, according to Colonel Boquet, five hundred warriors. Their principal villages were "Old Chillicothe," "Cornstalk's Town" and "Grenadier Squaw Town," and a number of others, all of which, situated upon or near the vicinity of the "Pickaway Plains," we shall have eccasion to speak of more fully in the succeeding chapter. There was another town called Chillicothe upon the north fork of Paint creek, in Ross county, the present site of Frankfort. At these villages, of which "Old Chillicothe" was the principal one and the residence of Logan, the Shawnees were congregated in considerable force. The loveliness of the surroundings, the fertility of the plains and of the bottoms upon which they raised corn, and the strong ties of association and of tradition, all made this spot a desirable one, and it is not strange that the red men contended to the last for this their place of residence, in which were combined so many favorable conditions.

The interest which attaches to a section of country embracing these old Indian towns is not exceeded by that of any locality in the State. It is emphatically "the classic ground of Ohio." Lying in what may appropriately be called the garden of the State, embracing lands which, when the first white settlers came into the country, produced a hundred bushels of corn or fifty bushels of wheat to the acre, blooming and beautiful with nature's most mild and tranquil expression, a benizon seems to have been breathed upon it by the great Author. As it lies to-day, in summer, covered with the russet yellow of ripening grains, its broad expanse bathed in sunshine, an undulating, shimmering, golden sea, in which, like great green islands, fields of waving corn appear, there is certainly nothing to suggest the turmoils of savage war or the wild scenes that have been enacted here. Yet its present people are of the third race of men who have dwelt here, and they plow from their fields the relics left by their predecessors, the ancient, pre-historic people, and the red men. Here burned the council fire of the Indian, at which the affairs of the nation were discussed and peace or war decided upon. On these plains, at the old Indian villages, prisoners of war were put to death by horrible processes of torture. It was here that the tribes of Indians marched forth, fierce in their war paint, to meet General Lewis; it was here that Logan made his famous speech, full of burning eloquence, and here that the campaign of Lord Dunmore was brought to a close by the truce at Camp Charlotte.

It has been commonly remarked that it was at Grenadier Squaw-town that Slover underwent the terrible ordeal of apprehending his death torture, and made his famous escape. An investigation, in which, among other authorities, Slover's own thrilling but simple account of his capture and escape, has been consulted, shows no ground on which this supposition can be reasonably based, but that terrible tortures were here inflicted upon others there is not the slightest reason to doubt.

There are traditions that the Indians have practiced the horrible custom of burning at the stake their prisoners of war, and elevated situations in the vicinity of Grenadier Squaw-town, Old Chillicothe, and Cornstalks-town, are pointed out as the probable scenes of the savage, inhuman orgies.

The Black Mountain, a ridge-shaped hill, near the sites of the old Indian villages, was used as a look-out. It is about eighty or one hundred feet in height, and from its summit a clear view could have been had over a large extent of country. No foe could approach in the day time without being seen at a great distance. There were, and are now, but few trees upon the lands called Pickaway plains, and as the Indians were accustomed to burn over the ground and thus destroy the tall, thick grass, the advantage afforded by the lookout was greater than, upon first consideration, it might appear.

The Shawnees were divided into four tribes, the Piqua, Kiskapocke, Mequachuke and Chillicothe. According to a poetical Indian legend, the Piqua tribe had its origin in a man who sprang from the fire and ashes. As their old men used to tell the whites who first came in contact with them, the chief warriors and wise men were once sitting around the smouldering embers of what had been a council fire, when they were startled by a great puffing of fire and smoke, and from the ashes and coals there sprang into being a man of splendid form and mein, the original of the tribe of Piqua—named Piqua as signifiying the man born of ashes.* This legend of the origin of the tribe of Piqua, truly beautiful in its simplicity, has been commented upon by leading writers upon the red race, as showing, in a marked degree, their capabilities for imaginative inventiveness, and as a proof of their romantic susceptibility.

Mequachuke signifies a fat man filled—a man made perfect, so that nothing is wanting. This tribe had the priesthood. Its leaders were endowed with the privilege of celebrating the religious rites of the nation. The Kiskapocke tribe was inclined to war, and its braves were among the most fierce and crafty of the Indian tribes of the Northwest. The celebrated prophet Elsquataway, and Tecumseh his brother, were members of this tribe.

Chillicothe is not known to have been interpreted save as meaning a dwelling place.†

Famous among the members of the Shawnee division who lived at the Pickaway towns was Cornstalk and his sister, the Grenadier squaw, who, like him, was of large

*Pickaway is a corruption of the Indian name Piqua, and was first applied to the plains now having that appellation, and afterwards to the county.

† The information in regard to tribal divisions of the Shawnees is derived from a letter of John Johnston, Agent for Indian Affairs, written from Piqua in 1819, and published in the "Archælogia Americanna."

stature and of unusual mental development. Cornstalk was great in war but foremost in making peace, and his character was one which showed much true nobility. His eloquence was remarkable, and his influence over his tribe wonderful. If he led in battle, his voice, sounding from the front, "Be strong, be strong," incited the warriors to their utmost efforts, and if he counseled peace, his words were equally potent. When he made the peace speech before Lord Dunmore, Col. Wilson, one of the staff, was deeply impressed. He said afterwards, "I have heard many celebrated orators, but never one whose powers of delivery surpassed those of Cornstalk on this occasion."

Cornstalk was the leading chieftain of the Scioto Shawnees; "a man whose energy, courage, and good sense placed him among the very foremost of the native heroes of this land. This truly great man, who was himself for peace, but who found all his neighbors and men there, of his own tribe, stirred up to war by the agents of England, went over to the American fort at Point Pleasant, at the mouth of the Great Kanawha, to talk the matter over with Captain Arbuckle, who was in command there and with whom he was acquainted. This was in the early summer of 1777, and the Americans, knowing that the Shawnees were inclining to the enemy, thought it would be a good plan to detain Cornstalk and a younger chief, Red Hawk, who was with him, and make them hostages. The old chief finding himself entrapped, calmly awaited the result. Ellinipsco, the son of Cornstalk, who came the next morning to see his father, was also detained. Toward night, one of the white hunters having been shot by an unknown Indian, the soldiers raised a cry, "Kill the red dogs in the fort," and immediately carried their bloody thought into execution, the commander endeavoring, though almost unheeded, to dissuade them from their purpose. Cornstalk fell pierced by seven musket balls, and his son and Red Hawk met the same fate. Cornstalk saw his assassinators coming and met them at the door of the hut in which he was confined, his arms folded upon his massive chest, and his whole mien expressing a magnificent stoicism. This was by no means the only shameful act of treachery on the part of the whites. The murder very naturally aroused an intense feeling of hatred for the whites throughout the Shawnee division, and was the cause of much future bloodshed.

Cornplanter was another chief noted for courage in battle, and for the burning eloquence he displayed in several speeches, made on different occasions, in council and treaty.

Logan was a Mingo, or Mohican, son of Shikellimus, or Shikellamy, a celebrated chief of the Cuyagas, who lived on the Sesquehanna. His real name was Tah-gah-jute, and he was named in English after James Logan, secretary of Pennsylvania, of whom his father was a personal friend. Logan removed to Ohio about 1770, having been driven from his home in Pennsylvania, and took up his residence with some of his followers, in the Shawnee country, where we find him in 1774, at the time of the Lord Dunmore war.

The Indians in the territory of what is now Franklin county were, at the time the whites came among them, mostly Wyandots, though there was a sprinkling of other tribes.

On the site of Columbus they had a large village, and they cultivated extensively the plains upon the opposite side of the river, raising corn, and, at times, though in small quantity, other crops. Jeremiah Armstrong, for many years a resident of Columbus, was captured, when a boy, by some Indians of this tribe, and brought from his home in Pennsylvania, nearly opposite Blannerhasset's island, to Ohio, accompanying his captors in their wanderings through the State, and becoming familiar with their mode of life. He was adopted into the Deer tribe, and his brother into that of the Turtle. The Indians encamped upon the site of Franklinton, below the milldam, where there was a deep hole called Billy's hole, from Billy Wyandot. He witnessed a war dance upon the ground where the penitentiary now stands. Armstrong was at the battle of the Maumee, and it was there that his friend and adopter, the Indian who saved his life when his mother, two sisters and a brother were massacred, was killed by one of Wayne's soldiers. After this battle a party of the Indians, with whom was Armstrong, returned to Franklinton. Armstrong, who when captured in the spring of 1794 was nine years of age, was released by the Indians to a brother, who went after him to Detroit about two years later. He went to Franklinton, where he grew up, and, in 1813, purchased a lot on High street, where he afterward kept hotel.

Robert Armstrong, also of Pennsylvania, when a boy was taken prisoner upon the Allegheny river by a party of Wyandots and Senecas, who killed his employer. He was brought to the Indian town on the site of what was aftewards Franklinton, and lived, married and died among the red men. He was occasionally an interpreter for the United States.

John Brickell, who became a resident where Columbus now is, in 1797, one of the first three or four settlers, was taken from his home on the Youghiogeny river in February, 1791, and remained with his captors (Delawares) for about four years, during which time he traveled over and became familiar with the country which is now included in the limits of Franklin county. Mr. Brickell died in Columbus in 1844.

The Wyandots, who had principal possession of the northern part of the Scioto valley, and, as has been already stated, of the lands now included in Franklin county, were a superior tribe of red men. General Harrison says of the Wyandot: "He was trained to die for the interest or honor of his tribe, and to consider submission to an enemy the lowest degradation." The highest type of the tribe was undoubtedly Tahre, or the Crane, their great sachem. Historians very generally have held him up as an example of high moral character and good intellectual ability.

There is one particularly painful incident in the later history of Indian affairs in this region—the cruel execution of an old Wyandot chief, Leatherlips, on the charge of witchcraft. We find an account in Drake's Life of Tecumseh. There has been a great variety of opinions as to who was responsible for the old man's murder, though General Harrison and a correspondent of Mr. Heckewelder's, quoted in his History of the Indian Nations, writes in the supposition that the order came directly from Tecumseh and his brother, the prophet. Tahre, the Crane, and Roundhead, a leading chief, are each claimed by different authorities to have led the party that executed the order for the old chief's assassination. It is supposed that the party went directly from Tippecanoe to the Scioto, where Leatherlips was found encamped, about fourteen miles north of Columbus. A council was held for two or three hours, the accusing Wyandots, six in number, speaking with a great deal of passion and bitterness, and Leatherlips answering as calmly as if the question to be decided was not of his life or death, but one of very slight importance. The sentence of death, which had been pronounced with the accusation, was re-affirmed and Leatherlips was commanded to make ready for death. Some whites, who were present, made an effort to dissuade the Wyandots from their purpose of putting the accused to death, but the pleas for his life were unavailing. The prisoner "walked slowly to his camp, partook of a dinner of jerked venison, washed and arrayed himself in his best apparel and afterwards painted his face. His dress was very rich, his hair gray and his whole appearance graceful and commanding." When the time set for the execution had arrived Leatherlips shook hands in silence with all of the spectators, and then turning from his wigwam moved slowly away, chanting, in a voice of great strength and most pleasing melody, his death song. He was followed closely by the warriors who were to be his executioners, all keeping time in their march to the measure of his wild and melancholy dirge. The white men came last in the strange procession. All was silence, save the sound of the mournful music of the condemned man's song. After going a distance of less than a hundred yards, and halting, the white men were surprised to find themselves by the side of a newly-made, shallow grave, which had been dug without their knowledge, and probably before the executioners had made their presence known to him who was to be their victim. By the brink of this grave the old man knelt down, and in solemn tone of voice, sufficiently strong to be heard by all the bystanders, addressed his last prayer to the Great Spirit. When he had finished, the leader of the Indian band knelt beside Leatherlips and prayed in a similar manner. Both spoke in the Wyandot tongue. The prisoner arose and after a few moments delay again sank upon his knees and prayed in the same manner as before. He still continued in a kneeling posture, when he had ceased speaking. As all the rifles had been left behind, at Leatherlips' wigwam, the men whose curiosity had led them to remain and witness the tragedy which they could not prevent, were at a loss to know how the murderers would accomplish their purpose. After the conclusion of the last prayer all had been silence. Neither the prisoner nor any of the Indians had changed their position in the slightest degree. Suddenly the painful stillness was broken by the sound of a movement and one of the Indians stepped forward, drawing from the folds of his garment a keen, glittering tomahawk. He walked directly up behind the kneeling chief, raised the weapon high over his head, paused a moment, and then, with his whole strength, sunk it in the skull of his victim. Leatherlips fell prostrate upon the ground, and after he had lain for a time in the agonies of death the captain of the executioners directed the attention of the white men to the drops of sweat which were gathering upon his neck and face, and remarked with exultation that it was proof of the dying chief's guilt. After a few minutes' delay, the same Indian who had before struck, inflicted two or three more heavy blows. Life was soon entirely extinct. The body, with its apparel and decorations, was hastily buried, and the assemblage dispersed.

Leatherlips was a peaceable and harmless old Indian. A rude pile of stone for many years marked his grave, on the Kosciusco lands, near the northern county line.

During the years of the early settlement along the Scioto, the Indians were in the custom of roaming through the county, and some of them lived among or in close proximity to the whites. As late as 1813 the Indian boundary was only fifty miles from Franklinton, and the inhabitants of that village and of the other settlements in this part of the State were in a state of feverish anxiety, and there was a constant dread that the Indians would begin hostilities, and that their families would be massacred and their houses burned. There was a great feeling of relief, therefore, when on June 21st of that year the Indians, at a council held in Franklinton, solemnly agreed to remain at peace, thus satisfying the spirit of all former treaties.*

An eloquent description† of this council has been prepared, and as the event forms a pleasant scene which practically concludes the Indian history of this part of the State, we cannot do better than to present it to the reader.

The council was held on the grounds of Lucius Sullivant. The memorial continues:

"The Delaware, Shawnee, Wyandot, and Seneca tribes were represented by about fifty warriors. General Harrison represented the government, and with him were his staff and a brilliant array of officers in full uniform. Behind them was a detachment of soldiers. In his front were the Indians. Around all were the inhabitants of this region, far and near.

"The object was to induce these tribes, who had heretofore remained neutral in the war, to take an active part in the ensuing campaign for the United States, or at least give a guarantee of their peaceful intention by remaining with their families within the settlements.

"The general began to speak in calm and measured tones, befitting the grave occasion, but an undefined oppression seemed to hold all in suspense, as with silent and almost breathless attention they awaited the result of the general's words. These seemed to fall on dull ears, as the Indians sat with unmoved countenances, and smoked on in stolid silence. At length the persuasive voice of the great commander struck a responsive chord, and Tahre, or the Crane, the great Wyandot chief, slowly rose to his feet. Standing for a moment, in a graceful and commanding attitude, he made a brief reply. When he, with others, passed forward to grasp the hand of Harrison, in token not only of amity, but in agreement to stand as a barrier on our exposed frontier, a terrible doubt and apprehension were lifted from the hearts of all.

*The title to every foot of Ohio soil was perfected by honorable treaty with the Indians, and their claims properly compensated and extinguished.

†The Sullivant Memorial, by Joseph Sullivant.

Jubilant shouts rent the air, women wept for joy, and stalwart men thrilled with pleasure as they thought of the assured safety of their wives and children, from a cruel and stealthy foe. They prepared at once, with alacrity, to go forth to the impending battles."

The Indians were faithful to this agreement, and the country was spared a re-enactment of the bloody scenes of her earlier history.

CHAPTER III.

THE STORY OF LOGAN---LORD DUNMORE'S INVASION.

The map represents a section of country about seven miles square. It is reduced from one made many years ago for Felix Renick, by P. N. White, and is substantially correct. The famous Pickaway plains appear at the left. A represents the plan of the ancient earthworks, on which Circleville now stands, and from which its name is derived. B is the cabin of Logan, at Old Chillicothe (now Westfall). C is the Black Mountain, a ridge of dark-colored, gravelly earth, which it is supposed the Indians used as a coigne of vantage from which they could obtain a view of the surrounding country, watch the movements of the buffalo and deer, and discover the approach of an enemy. D is the Council House at Grenadier Squawtown. E the point where Lord Dunmore met with and stopped the army of General Lewis when he was marching to attack the Indian towns. F is the site of Camp Lewis. The dotted line from Old Chillicothe to Camp Lewis represents an old and much used Indian trail, and the line extending southerly from the site of Circleville shows the present Chillicothe road. The site of Camp Charlotte is upon the old Winship farm, in the southwest quarter of section twelve—the land now owned by Mrs. Martha Jacobs and Jacob Ludwig. The site of Camp Lewis is in the southeast quarter of section thirty. John Boggs was the original, and Daniel Lodwick the present, owner of the land where Cornstalk's town was located, and Jacob Hitler is the owner of the site of Grenadier Squawtown.

The name of Logan is inseparably connected with the history of Lord Dunmore's campaign in 1774. The hostilities which took place in that year were brought about, principally, by the wanton and cruel butchery of the great chief's kindred—one of the most shameful and inhuman acts of the whites toward the Indians that blot the pages of our early history.

It will be our endeavor, in this chapter, to present to the reader a succicnt account, in proper chronological order, of the circumstances which transformed the peace-loving Logan—the warm friend of the whites—into the murderous demon Logan, their bitter enemy.

Let it be remembered that Logan was, according to the best authorities (those pioneers of Western Pennsylvania and Virginia who were acquainted with him), a savage of noble nature, strong but sensitive, full of dignity and pride, generous and just, brave and true. No act of perfidy on his part gave excuse for the white man's atrocities. Judge William Brown, of Mifflin county, Pennsylvania, said of the noble-hearted Logan: "He was the best specimen of humanity I ever met with, either white or red."* When the atrocities of the whites were perpetrated, his great soul underwent a collosal revulsion, and he became as terrible in his violent enmity as he had been admirable in his fervent friendship, and after the tempest of his passion had been spent—his "vengeance glutted"—he relapsed into that bitter, gloomy misanthropy that is too apt to be the lot of all strong and good natures, either civilized or savage, that are blasted by a giant evil or wrong.

Logan, upon coming into Ohio, in 1772, located at a Mingo village on the Ohio river, at the mouth of Indian Cross creek, which—such was his prominence and popularity among his people—was named after him before he had long been a resident.

In the spring of 1773 Dr. John Connolly, determining to assert the claims of Virginia to the country about Pittsburgh, proclaimed the jurisdiction of Virginia, rebuilt Fort Pitt, named it after Lord Dunmore, the royal governor of Virginia, made himself the commandant, and almost immediately commenced the exercise of tyranny toward all who were in the interests of Pennsylvania, and it was alleged, endeavored in various ways to involve the frontier in an Indian war, having, as has been suggested, a motive in so doing. It is a matter of history that he wrote letters to the Virginian exploring parties along the Ohio, which assisted materially to precipitate hostilities. The Indians had been accused of thefts from the encampments and settlements of the Virginians, and as Connolly's letters constantly suggested that the Shawnees were not to be trusted, and that the people should be ready to retrieve any losses or revenge any wrongs they might sustain, they were put in such spirit that only a trifling wrong act on the part of the Indians was necessary to bring down upon them the artfully nursed wrath of the whites. On the sixteenth of April a canoe owned by a Pittsburgh trader was attacked upon the Ohio river by the Cherokee Indians, and one white man was killed. The alarm spread, and a party of Virginians, led by Michael Cresap, went down the river to revenge the murder of the trader. While the party were at Wheeling letters were received from Connolly asking the men to remain there and await further developments, and telling them that war was imminent. War was formally declared, and the same evening some of the scouts who had been sent out to scour the country brought in two scalps, probably those of friendly Indians. The next day a skirmish occurred with a small party of Indians, and the same evening it was resolved to march the next day against Loganstown. The men started on the expedition, but they gave up their purpose after a march of five miles, and returned to their camping place. Sometime afterward, probably on the thirtieth of April, Captain Daniel Greathouse went up the river to the mouth of Yellow creek, and there, accompanied by circumstances of great perfidy and atrocity, murdered ten Indians, some of whom were the kindred of Logan. The act was the more dastardly because committed against men, women and children known to cherish no hostile feeling toward the whites.

The Indians, encamped on the Ohio side of the river, crossed over to where the Virginians were stationed, and there, by the direction of Greathouse, rum was given them and three of them became drunk. Two men and one woman, who refused to drink, were shot down. This was done by a few of the party, the greater part protesting against the commission of the act. The intoxicated Indians were killed by tomahawking. A child was spared through some lingering idea of humanity. The Indians, hearing the gun-shots, sent two of their number in a canoe to ascertain the cause. They were both shot as soon as they landed upon the bank. Another, and a larger, party followed, and were nearly all killed. Those who escaped exchanged shots across the river with the murderous whites, but not one of the latter was wounded. The Indians who were killed were all scalped. The survivors escaped down the river. A short time before this massacre Logan, in an Indian council, had strongly urged peace. Cornstalk had sent his own brother, only a little time previous, to escort and guard Pittsburgh traders in their journeys. Logan's advice had been regarded and the hatchet buried, when the news of the Yellow creek massacre was received. Six or eight weeks intervened between the time of the Yellow creek outrage and the avenging stroke. The Shawnees and Senecas endeavored to secure the assistance of the Delawares, but were unsuccessful. It is probable, however, that many of the young braves of this tribe took to the war path. Before the middle of July the Shawnees and the Mingos, with some Cherokees and a few Delawares, were in the field.

Logan, burning with hatred toward the people who had murdered his women and other kindred, was anxious to strike the blow of vengeance where it would produce the greatest consternation. With a small band of chosen braves, he made his way to the head waters of the Monongahela, where twelve or thirteen scalps were taken, and several persons made prisoners. The Indians eluded pursuit, and mde a safe return. The captives were taken to a village on the Muskingum. Among them was William Robinson, with whom Logan was on terms of friendship on the journey, and whose life he saved when the other Indians were about to burn him at the stake. Robinson was taken to the wigwam of the famous chief and adopted as his brother in the place of one killed at Yellow creek. On the twenty-first of July—testified Robinson—Logan brought to him a piece of paper and requested him to write a letter, which he did, with ink prepared from gunpowder. Logan dictated as follows:

CAPTAIN CRESAP:—What did you kill my people on Yellow creek for? The white people killed my kin at Conestoga, a great while ago, and I thought nothing of that. But you killed my kin again, on Yellow creek, and took my cousin prisoner. Then I thought I must kill too, and I have been three times to war since; but the Indians are not angry, only myself.*

CAPTAIN JOHN LOGAN.

The Virginians, after Logan's bold dash into Pennsylvania, marshalled under the command of Colonel McDonald and marched upon several Indian villages, which they destroyed. This foray only added to the general irritation, and in August, Lord Dunmore, who was undoubtedly, from all accounts, anxious to gain military renown, resolved to carry the war into the enemy's country. Three companies were raised west of the Blue ridge under the command of General Andrew Lewis, and an equal force was mustered from the interior, to be commanded by the governor himself. The total number of men was about twenty-five hundred. The two armies were to meet at the mouth of the Great Kenhawa and, under the leadership of Dunmore, proceed against the Indian towns of Ohio. It was subsequently decided to move directly upon the Scioto river towns and there to form a junction of the armies.

On the tenth of October, General Lewis started with his men for the Scioto, but was suddenly and unexpectedly attacked by about a thousand Indians of the allied tribes,—Shawnees, Mingos (or Senecas), with members of the Delawares, Wyandots and other divisions, who, under the command of the celebrated Cornstalk, had marched from the Pickaway plains to meet his army before it could effect a union with the other wing. The fight that ensued, known as the battle of Point Pleasant, has been generally characterized by historians as "one of the most sanguinary and best fought battles in the annals of Indian warfare in the west." Colonel Charles Lewis, brother of the general, and Colonel Fleming were both killed, and the line, at first, was forced back by the savage onslaught of the red warriors. It was afterwards reinforced and the Indians, in turn, retreated. The battle raged from early morn until past noon, unabated, and a scattered fire continued until sunset. The Indians had secured a rise of ground about the middle of the day, and they took almost constant advantage, according to their established rule of warfare, of the protection afforded by trees and logs. A part of the time, however, the "lines were not more than twenty yards apart and often within six yards, and sometimes closer, tomahawking one another."†

Tradition says that Logan, Ellenipsco, Red Hawk, Cornstalk, and other noted chiefs, were in the foremost of the fight, encouraging the warriors both by word and example. Cornstalk's voice was heard high above the din of the conflict, calling to his men "Be strong! be strong!" He is said to have tomahawked one of his own tribe who showed signs of cowardice. Seventy-five officers and men of Lewis's army were killed and one hundred and forty wounded. The loss on the part of the Indians, who retreated in the night, was probably about the same.

* Logan was misinformed in regard to the author of the Yellow Creek outrage. It was very natural that, knowing Cresap to be commander of the expedition, he should hold him accountable for the murder.

† Letter from a Virginia soldier, November 4, 1774.

After the battle, General Lewis' command, being reinforced by the addition of three hundred men, under command of Colonel William Crawford, marched eighty miles through the wilderness to the Indian towns of the Scioto. In the meantime Lord Dunmore and his army, which had been at the mouth of the Hockhocking when Lewis fought the battle of Point Pleasant, ascended the river to the present town of Logan, Hocking county, from whence he marched westward to Scippo creek, about seven miles southeast of Circleville. Near this place Lord Dunmore was met by a white man named Elliott, who bore a flag of truce and was commissioned with a message of submission from the Shawnee chiefs. It was requested by the Indians that an interpreter should be sent to their town, with whom they could make arrangements for the establishment of peace. Their request was granted by Lord Dunmore, and he ordered the encampment of his force at a spot of ground in the southwest quarter of section twelve, township ten, range twenty-one. It was named Camp Charlotte. Lord Dunmore then sent out a messenger to intercept General Lewis' army. General Lewis and his hardy, adventurous, brave men, were eager for another encounter with the Indians, and pushed onward in pursuit of them until they reached the banks of the Congo, in Pickaway township, October 24th. Here, within striking distance of the Indian towns, Camp Lewis was laid out. Lewis, who was smarting under the loss of his brave brother, and his men, who thirsted to revenge the many border murders, were dissatisfied with Lord Dunmore's negotiations for peace, and it was with the utmost difficulty that they could be prevented from pressing forward and destroying the villages that lay before them. The dissatisfaction led almost to a mutiny, or rebellion, in the army. Lord Dunmore went in person to enforce his order, and as General Lewis showed an intention to disobey him, he drew his sword and threatened to kill him if he further refused to obey orders. Thus was another scene of bloodshed averted. Lord Dunmore, it is said, was anxious to bring the hostilities to a close, that he might return to Virginia, where already the muttering thunders of the coming storm of 1776 were beginning to be heard. The soldiers of Lewis' army accused the governor of attempting to force an alliance with the Indians whereby they should assist Great Britain against the colonies in the event of revolution. It is by no means a certainty, though it is a possibility, that he had such a design.

While the events we have mentioned were taking place among the whites, there was history being made upon the other side of the river, in the Indian towns. The almost universal voice was for peace. When Cornstalk returned from the battle of Point Pleasant he called a council of the nation to consult as to what should be done, and expressed his displeasure that he had not been permitted to make peace, as it is said he desired to do on the eve of battle. "What," said he, "will you do now? The Big Knife is coming on us and we shall all be killed. Now you must fight, or we are undone." He was silent then a little time, and no one answering, he said: "Then let us go and kill all our women and children and fight till we die." Still there was no response, and at length, springing from the ground, the great chief struck his tomahawk into a post and exclaimed: "I'll go and make peace." To this there was a general assent. Cornstalk and all of the principal chiefs of the allied tribes, except Logan, were present at the council held at Camp Charlotte, and readily assented to the terms of peace proposed.

So apprehensive was Dunmore of treachery that he would admit only a few Indians at a time, even within the outer line of his camp, and they were compelled to leave their arms under a guard. The greatest of the chiefs were first admitted to the presence of the royal governor, and afterward many others were allowed in the camp. According to the account of the celebrated pioneer, Simon Kenton, who was present at the treaty of truce, the Indians came from their villages to the camp five hundred strong, most of them riding ponies in single file, and making a most striking and magnificent appearance. The faces of the warriors were painted one-half black, and one-half red, signifying that they were about equally divided in their minds between peace and war; that they were indifferent as to the result of the treaty. This, however, was an act of bravado. They were really very anxious to have peace established.*

In regard to the result of the treaty, the best authority is a letter from Colonel William Crawford to George Washington.† It reads as follows:

"STEWART'S CROSSING, Nov. 14, 1774.

"I yesterday returned from our late expedition against the Shawnese, and I think we may, with propriety, say we have had great success, as we have made them sensible of their villainy and weakness, and I hope made peace with them on such a footing as will be lasting, if we make them adhere to the terms of the agreement, which are as follows: 'First, they have to give up all the prisoners ever taken by them in war with the white people; also negroes and all of the horses stolen or taken by them since the last war. And further, no Indian for the future is to hunt on the east side of the Ohio, nor any white man on the west side; as that seems to have been the cause of some of the disturbance between our people and them. As a guarantee that they will perform their part of the agreement, they have given up four chief men, to be kept as hostages, who are to be relieved yearly or as they may choose.'‡ The Shawnese have complied with the terms, but the Mingoes did not like the conditions and had a mind to deceive us. But Lord Dunmore discovered their intentions, which were to slip off while we were settling matters with the Shawnese. The Mingoes intended to go to the lakes and take their prisoners with them and the horses which they had stolen.

* * * * *

The Mingoes were not a party to the treaty, their chief, Logan, scorning to appear at the council. This tribe had, in 1774, three villages within the present limits of Franklin county—one on the high bank near the Morrill house, a mile and a half below Columbus, one near the present location of the Harrisburgh bridge, on the west side of the river, and the third near where the penitentiary now stands.

---

* Simon Kenton is quoted by Joseph Sullivant, esq., in an address delivered before the Franklin County Pioneer Association, 1871. Mr. Sullivant had this from his own lips. Not one of the many written accounts of the Dunmore war, or invasion, even allude to this interesting feature.

† Letters of Washington and Crawford, Concerning Western Lands; edited by C. W. Butterfield.

‡ The note in the volume of correspondence says: "Nowhere else, it is believed, are the terms of the agreement between Lord Dunmore and the Shawnese to be found—at least so full as the above."

Lord Dunmore, angered at the Mingoes because they would not assent to any terms of peace, resolved to punish them, and ordered the destruction of these towns. Colonel Crawford briefly tells the story of the expedition against the Mingoes in the continuance of the letter of which we have already given the first part:

* * * * "Lord Dunmore ordered myself and two hundred and forty men to set out in the night; we were to march to a town about forty miles distant from our camp, up the Scioto, where we understood the whole of the Mingoes were to rendezvous the next day in order to pursue their journey. This intelligence came by John Montour, son of Captain Montour, whom you formerly knew.

Because of the number of Indians in our camp we went out of it under pretense of going to Hockhocking for more provisions. Few knew of our setting off anyhow, and none knew where we were going to until the next day. Our march was performed with as much speed as possible. We arrived at a town called the Salt-lick town* the ensuing night, and at daybreak we got around it with one-half our force, and the remainder were sent to a small village half a mile distant. Unfortunately one of our men was discovered by an Indian who lay, out from the town some distance, by a log which the man was creeping up to. This obliged the man to kill the Indian. This happened before daylight, which did us much damage, as the chief part of the Indians made their escape in the dark; but we got fourteen prisoners, and killed six of the enemy, wounding several more. We got all of their baggage and horses, ten of their guns, and two hundred white prisoners. The plunder sold for four hundred pounds sterling, besides what was returned to a Mohawk Indian who was there. The whole of the Mingoes were ready to start, and were to have set out the morning we attacked them.†

Lord Dunmore has eleven prisoners, and has returned the rest to the nation. The residue are to be returned upon his lordship's demand."

* * * * * * * * *

When this town was attacked one very cruel deed was committed, of which there is no mention in the letters of Colonel Crawford, or in any cotemporary correspondence. Mr. Sullivant says in his address, upon the authority of Jonathan Alder, a white man whom he well knew, and who had been in captivity among the Indians, that a squaw with a young child fled down the river bank and across the bed of the stream to a wooded island. There was a rattling discharge of muskets, and the Indian woman fell dead, killed by one of the shower of bullets, just as she reached the bank. The child, described as about three years of age, unhurt, fled like a wild creature, up the bank and disappeared in the bushes. Two days after it was found alive in a hollow sycamore tree, which for many years remained standing, and was one of the objects of traditional interest to the early pioneers. We now resume the story of Logan.

Lord Dunmore had been very anxious to have the proud and disconsolate Mingo present at the council, even if he was unwilling to approve of the treaty, and, to accomplish this end, he had sent Colonel John Gibson to see Logan and prevail upon him to attend, or give his reasons for not attending. The messenger found Logan at Old Chillicothe (now Westfall), where he spent most of his time. He, who had scorned to attend the council, at first seemed in sullen mood, and refused to converse with Colonel Gibson. He at length, however, became in better humor, and under the persuasive influence of firewater and skillful handling, was moved to give Gibson an interview. He went out of the wigwam where he and Gibson had been, and beckoning the latter to follow, "he went into a solitary thicket near by, where, setting down on a log, he burst into tears, and uttered some sentences of impassioned eloquence, charging the murder of his kindred upon Captain Cresap." Then and there was composed and delivered the simple speech, full of burning eloquence, which was published in the great journals of the old world, translated into half a dozen different languages, and which has been made familiar in all the succeeding generations of this country by its introduction into the school books and wide circulation in the literary magazines and papers of the land. Here we have the strange occurrence of an utterance from the mouth of a savage in the western wilderness, which has become a classic, the admiration of all civilization, a model expression of mingled pride, courage and sorrow, which, as Colonel Charles Whittlesey says, "elevated the character of the native American throughout the intelligent world."

Logan's words were committed, in translation, to paper, by Colonel Gibson immediately upon his return to Camp Charlotte, and was doubtless read in council and in the presence of the army. Three different versions, alike in all essential particulars, are in existence, viz.: One contained in a letter from Williamsburgh, Virginia, dated February 4, 1775, and preserved in the American archives; another published in New York February 16, 1775, as an extract from a Virginia letter, and the third, which we here reproduce, given by Thomas Jefferson in his "Notes on Virginia," published in 1784, and substantiated by Gibson's affidavit.

As has been heretofore stated, Logan was misinformed in regard to the author of the crime at Yellow creek. It was Greathouse, and not Cresap, who led the party that murdered his people. There is a difference of opinion in regard to the merits of Logan's speech. Those who detract from its value as an eloquent utterance are very well represented by Mr. Isaac Smucker, of Newark, Ohio, who says: "It was neither a speech, an address, a message, nor a promise to assent to, or comply with, the provisions of a treaty, but simply the wild, excited, passionate utterances of a blood-stained savage."* The general verdict has, however, been of a different nature from the opinion above quoted, Mr. Jefferson's prime object in publishing the translation was to disprove the assertions of Buffon and Raynal, who alleged the inferiority of the American race.

Following is his version of

LOGAN'S SPEECH:

"I appeal to any white man to say if ever he entered Logan's cabin hungry, and he gave him not meat; if ever he came cold and naked, and he clothed him not.

"During the course of the last long and bloody war, Logan remained idle in his cabin, an advocate for peace. Such was my love for the whites, that my countrymen pointed as they passed, and said, 'Logan is the friend of white men.' I had even thought to have lived with you, but for the injuries of one man. Colonel Cresap, the last spring, in cold blood and unprovoked, murdered all of the relatives of Logan, not even sparing my women and children. There runs not a drop of my blood in the veins of any living creature. This called on me for revenge. I have sought it. I have killed many. I have fully glutted my vengeance. For my country, I rejoice at the beams of peace. But do not harbor a thought that mine is the joy of fear. Logan never felt fear. He will not turn on his heel to save his life. Who is there to mourn for Logan? Not one."

*This village sometimes called Seekonk or Seekunk, a corrupnion of Kzeek-heoong, "a place of salt."

†The destruction of the Salt-lick town, by Crawford, was the only actual fighting done by that portion of the army which was under the command of Dunmore in person.

Mr. Jefferson says of this production: "I may challenge the whole orations of Demosthenes and Cicero, and of any more eminent orator—if Europe has furnished any more eminent—to produce a single passage superior to the speech of Logan, a Mingo chief, to Lord Dunmore, then Governor of Virginia." Again he speaks of it as "a marvel of eloquence."

Campbell, in his "Gertrude of Wyoming," thus paraphrases the sentiment of Logan's utterance:

"He left of all my tribe
Nor man nor child, nor thing of living breath.
No! not the dog that watched my household hearth,
Escaped that night of blood, upon our plains!
All perished; I alone am left on earth,
To whom nor relative nor blood remains;
No! not a kindred drop that runs in human veins."

Logan engaged in various subsequent hostile crusades against the early settlers. He marched at the head of a war party upon Ruddell's amd Martin's stations, in Kentucky, where many captives were taken. He also went upon an expedition against the Holston river settlement in 1779. Hostilities were kept up constantly for a number of years. Most of the ill feeling grew, directly or indirectly, out of the massacre of Logan's kindred. Logan revenged, and the frontier men retalliated with determined spirit.

Logan's future was dark, gloomy, full of tragedy. All of the kindness of his great heart was turned to bitterness. He became melancholy and miserable, and at times was sullen, harsh, vindictive and cruel. He said that life had become a torment to him; he knew no more what pleasure was; he thought it would have been better if he had never existed; he knew he had two souls—one bad, the other good. When the bad soul ruled, he delighted in blood; when the good soul had possession of him, he was humane and kind. He wandered about from tribe to tribe, a solitary and lonely man; dejected and broken-hearted by the loss of his friends and the decay of his tribe. He became, in a degree, delirious, and several times said that he should take his own life. To drown his sorrow he resorted to the stimulus of strong drink. His condition was most abject and miserable. His mournful and melancholy later career closed with a tragedy. While sitting by his camp fire, in profound reflection, or living over again, in imagination, the joys and sorrows of his life, his head sunken upon his hands and covered with his blanket, an Indian stole stealthily behind him and, burying the tomahawk in Logan's brain, sent the famous and unfortunate chief upon his journey to the happy hunting grounds. Thus closed a life, the history of which has appealed irresistibly to the sympathies of our whole race. He was a savage, it is true, and, in the paroxysm of his grief, he horribly avenged his private wrongs; but that, before his soul was shocked by the cruel murder of his friends and kindred, his nature was a kind and noble one, cannot be denied. He had great provocation, too, for the enormities that he committed. The massacre of his kindred, at Yellow creek, was the most wanton and shameful crime in the long list that the whites perpetrated upon the Indian race.

The place where Logan met his death is in dispute. By some it is said to have been at a point near the shore of Lake Erie, between Sandusky and Detroit, but there is good reason to believe that it was in the vicinity of Urbana that the closing tragedy occurred.

CHAPTER IV.

THE PIONEERS.

In nearly all great and thoroughly organized armies there is a corps of active, brave men, usually volunteers, whose self-imposed duty it is to go ahead and prepare the way with axe, and mattock and pick, for the advancement of the army—the fighting rank and file. They are called pioneers. They are armed with guns, as well as implements of labor, for their position and their work is a dangerous one. They are obliged to keep a constant lookout for an ambush, in momentary fear of a sudden attack, for the enemy, with a full knowledge of the country, which to the advancing corps of pioneers is a terra incognita, is liable at any instant to send a sudden volley of arrows or rifle balls into their midst, or to hem them in with a superior force.

The men who pushed their way into the wilderness along the Scioto, and all those earliest settlers of Ohio, from the river to the lake, were the pioneers of one of the grandest armies that earth ever knew; an army whose hosts are still sweeping irresistibly ahead, and which now, after eighty years, has not fully occupied the country it has won. It was the army of peace and civilization, that came, not to conquer an enemy with blood and carnage and ruin, but to subdue a wilderness, by patient toil; to make the wild valley blossom as the rose; to sweep away the forest, till the prairie's pregnant soil, make fertile fields and hew out houses, which were to become the abodes of happiness and plenty. The pioneers were the reliant vanguard of such an army as this.

The first hardy and resolute men who penetrated the valley of the Scioto, coming up the stream from "la belle rivere," found a land fertile as heart could wish, fair to look upon, and fragrant with the thousand fresh odors of the woods in early spring. The long, cool aisles of the forest led away into mazes of vernal green, where the swift deer bounded by unmolested, and as yet unscared by the sound of the woodman's axe or the sharp ring of the rifle. They looked upon the wooded slopes and the tall grass of the plains, jeweled with strange and brilliant flowers, where once the red man had his fields of corn. All about them were displayed the lavish bounties of nature. The luxuriant growth of the oak, the walnut, of the sycamore, sugar trees, the beech, chestnut and the tulip tree, with the lesser shrubs, the dogwood, the wild plum and crab apple, the red bud, the paw-paw, the heavy-hanging grape vines, the blueberry and raspberry, gave evidence of the strength of the virgin soil and the kindness of the climate. The forest covered the land with an abundance of food for the smaller animals, and the deer, as common as the cattle of to-day, grazed upon the rich grass of the prairies, and browsed upon the verdure in the little glades. Other animals were abundant. The opossum, raccoon, rabbit and ground-hog existed in great numbers. The wild hogs roamed the woods in droves, and fattened upon the abundant mast, or "shack." The bear, the buffalo and the elk were occasionally seen. Wild turkeys appeared in vast flocks, and in the season came the migratory fowls, and tarried by the streams. The river had its share of life, and fairly swarmed with fish.

But the pioneers came not to enjoy a life of lotus-eating and ease. They could admire the pristine beauty of the scenes that unveiled before them; they could enjoy the vernal green of the great forest, and the loveliness of all the works of nature. They could look forward with happy anticipation to the life they were to lead in the midst of all this beauty, and to the rich reward that would be theirs from the cultivation of the mellow, fertile soil; but they had first to work. The seed time comes before the harvest in other fields, too, than that of agriculture.

The dangers, also, that these pioneers were exposed to, were serious ones. The Indians could not be trusted, and the many stories of their outrages in the earlier eastern settlements made the pioneers of the Scioto country apprehensive of trouble. The larger wild beasts were a cause of much dread, and the smaller ones were a source of great annoyance. Added to this was the liability to sickness which always exists in a new country. In the midst of all the loveliness of the surroundings, there was a sense of loneliness that could not be dispelled, and this was a far greater trial to the men and women who first dwelt in the western country than is generally imagined. The deep-seated, constantly-recurring feeling of isolation made many stout hearts turn back to the older settlements and the abodes of comfort, the companionship and sociability they had abandoned in Virginia, Pennsylvania and the Southern and Eastern States, to take up a new life in the wilderness.

The pioneers, coming first down the Ohio and then making their way up the Scioto, and later making the tedious journey from the east by the rude trails, arrived at the places of their destination with but very little with which to begin the battle of life. They had brave hearts and strong arms, however, and they were possessed of of invincible determination. Frequently they came on without their families to make a beginning, and this having been accomplished, would return to their old homes for their wives and children. The first thing done after a temporary shelter from the rain had been provided, was to prepare a little spot of ground for some crop, usually corn. This was done by girdling the trees, clearing away the underbrush, if there chanced to be any, and sweeping the surface with fire. Ten, fifteen, twenty or even thirty acres of land might thus be prepared and planted the first season. In the autumn the crop would be carefully gathered and garnered with the least possible waste, for it was the food supply of the pioneer and his family, and life itself depended, in part, upon its safe preservation.

While the first crop was growing the pioneer has busied himself with the building of his cabin, which must answer as a shelter from the storms of the coming winter, a protection from the ravages of wild animals, and, possibly, a place of refuge from the red man.

If a pioneer was completely isolated from his fellowmen, his position was certainly a hard one; for without assistance he could construct only a poor habitation. In such cases the cabin was generally made of light logs or poles, and was laid up roughly, only to answer the temporary purpose of shelter, until other settlers had come into the vicinity, by whose help a more solid structure could be built. Usually a number of men came into the country together, and located within such distance of each other as enabled them to perform many friendly and neighborly offices. Assistance was always readily given one pioneer by all the scattered residents of the forest within a radius of several miles. The commonly followed plan of erecting a log cabin was through a union of labor. The site of the cabin home was generally selected with reference to a good water supply, often by a never-failing spring of pure water, or if such could not be found, it was not uncommon to first dig a well. When the cabin was to be built the few neighbors gathered at the site, and first cut down, within as close proximity as possible, a number of trees, as nearly of a size as could be found, but ranging from a foot to twenty inches in diameter. Logs were chopped from these and rolled to a common center. This work, and that of preparing the foundation, would consume the greater part of the day, in most cases, and the entire labor would most commonly occupy two or three days—sometimes four. The logs were raised to their places with handspikes and "skid poles," and men standing at the corners with axes notched them as fast as they were laid in position. Soon the cabin would be built several logs high, and the work would become more difficult. The gables were formed by beveling the logs, and making them shorter and shorter, as each additional one was laid in place. These logs in the gables were held in place by poles, which extended across the cabin from end to end, and which served also as rafters upon which to lay the rived "clapboard" roof. The so-called "clapboards" were five or six feet in length, and were split from oak or ash logs, and made as smooth and flat as possible. They were laid side by side, and other pieces of split stuff laid over the cracks so as to effectually keep out the rain. Upon these, logs were laid to hold them in place, and the logs were held by blocks of wood placed between them.

The chimney was an important part of the structure, and taxed the builders, with their poor tools, to their utmost. In rare cases it was made of stone, but most commonly of logs and sticks laid up in a manner similar to those which formed the cabin. It was, in nearly all cases, built outside of the cabin, and at its base a huge opening was cut through the wall to answer as a fire-place. The sticks in the chimney were held in place, and protected from fire, by mortar, formed by kneading and working clay and straw. Flat stones were procured for back and jambs of the fire place. An opening was chopped or sawed in the logs on one side of the cabin for a doorway. Pieces of hewed timber, three or four inches thick, were fastened on each side, by wooden pins, to the ends of the logs, and the door (if there were any) was fastened to one of these by wooden hinges. The door itself was a clumsy piece of wood-work. It was made of boards, rived from an oak log, and held together by heavy cross-pieces. There was a wooden latch upon the inside, raised by a string which passed through a gimlet-hole, and hung upon the outside. From this mode of construction arose the old and well-known hospitable saying, "you will find the latch-string always out." It was only pulled in at night, and the door was thus fastened. Very many of the cabins of the pioneers had no doors of the kind here described, and the entrance was only protected by a blanket, or skin of some wild beast, suspended above it. The window was a small opening, often devoid of anything resembling a sash, and very seldom having glass. Greased paper was sometimes used in lieu of the latter, but more commonly some old garment constituted a curtain, which was the only protection from sun, or rain, or snow, The floor of the cabin was made of puncheons—pieces of timber split from trees, about eighteen inches in diameter, and hewed smooth with the broad-axe. They were half the length of the floor. Many of the cabins first erected in this part of the country had nothing but the earthern floor. Sometimes the cabins had cellars, which were simply small excavations in the ground, for the storage of a few articles of food, or, perhaps, cooking utensils. Access to the cellar was readily gained by lifting a loose puncheon. There was sometimes a loft, used for various purposes, among others as the "guest chamber" of the house. It was reached by a ladder, the sides of which were split pieces of a sapling, put together, like everything else in the house, without nails.

The furniture of the log cabin was as simple and primitive as the structure itself. A forked stick set in the floor and supporting two poles, the other ends of which were allowed to rest upon the logs at the end and side of the cabin, formed a bedstead. A common form of table was a split slab, supported by four rustic legs, set in auger holes. Three legged stools were made in similar simple manner. Pegs, driven in auger holes in the logs of the wall, supported shelves, and others displayed the limited wardrobe of the family not in use. A few other pegs, or perhaps a pair of deer horns, formed a rack where hung the rifle and powder-horn, which no cabin was without. These, and perhaps a few other simple articles, brought from the "old home," formed the furniture and furnishings of the pioneer cabin. The utensils for cooking and the dishes for table use were few. The best were of pewter, which the care ul housewife of the olden time kept shining as brightly as the most pretentious plate of our later day fine houses. It was by no means uncommon that wooden vessels, either coopered or turned, were used upon the table. Knives and forks were few; crockery very scarce, and tin-ware not abundant. Food was simply cooked and served, but it was of the best and most wholesome kind. The hunter kept the larder supplied with venison, bear meat, squirrels, wild turkeys and the many varieties of smaller game. Plain corn bread, baked in a kettle, in the ashes, or upon a board in front of the great open fire-place, answered the purpose of all kinds of pastry. The corn was, among the earlier pioneers, pounded, or grated, there being no mills for grinding it, for some time, and then only small ones at a considerable distance away. The wild fruits, in their season, were made use of, and afforded a pleasant variety. Sometimes especial effort was made to prepare a delicacy, as, for instance, when a woman experimented in mince pies, by pounding wheat for the flour to make the crust and used crab apples for fruit. In the lofts of the cabins was usually to be found a collection of articles that made up the pioneer's materia medica, the herb medicines and spices—catnip, sage, tansy, fennel, boneset, pennyroyal and wormwood, each gathered in its season; and there were also stores of nuts, and strings of dried pumpkin, with bags of berries and fruit.

The habits of the pioneers were of a simplicity and purity in conformance to their surroundings and belongings. The men were engaged in the herculean labor, day after day, of enlarging the little patch of sunshine about their homes, cutting away the forest, burning off the brush and debris, preparing the soil, planting, tending, harvesting, caring for the few animals, which they brought with them, or soon procured, and in hunting. While they were engaged in the heavy labor of the field and forest, or following the deer, or seeking other game, their help-meets were busied with their household duties —providing for the day and for the winter coming on, cooking, making clothes, spinning and weaving. They were fitted, by nature and experience, to be the consorts of the brave men who first came into the western wilderness. They were heroic in their endurance of hardship, and privation, and loneliness. Their industry was well directed and unceasing. Woman's work then, like man's, was performed under disadvantages, which have been removed in later years. She had not only the common household duties to perform, but many others. She not only made the clothing but the fabric for it. That old, old occupation of spinning and of weaving, with which woman's name has been associated in all history, and of which the modern world knows nothing, except through the stories of those who are grandmothers now—that old occupation of spinning and of weaving, which seems surrounded with a glamour of romance as we look back to it through tradition and poetry, and which always conjures up thoughts of the graces and virtues of the dames and damsels of a generation that is gone—that old, old occupation of spinning and of weaving, was the chief industry of the pioneer women. Every cabin sounded with the softly-whirring wheel and the rythmic thud of the loom. The woman of pioneer times was like the woman described by Solomon: "She seeketh wool and flax, and worketh willingly with her hands; she layeth her hands to the spindle, and her hands hold the distaff."

Almost every article of clothing, all the cloth in use in the old log cabins, was the product of the patient woman-weaver's toil. She spun the flax and wove the cloth for shirts, and pantaloons, frocks, sheets and blankets. The linen and the wool, the "linsey-woolsey" woven by the housewife, formed all of the material for the clothing of both men and women, except such articles as were made of skins. The men commonly wore the hunting shirt, a kind of loose frock reaching half way down the thighs, open before, and so wide as to lap over a foot or more upon the chest. This generally had a cape, which was often fringed with a raveled piece of cloth of a different color from that which composed the garment. The bosom of the garment answered as a pouch, in which could be carried the various articles that the hunter or woodsman would need. The hunting shirt was always worn belted. It was made of coarse linen, of linsey, or of dressed deer-skin, according to the fancy of the wearer. Breeches were made of heavy cloth or of deer-skin, and were often worn with leggings of the same material, or of some kind of leather, while the feet were most usually encased in moccasins, which were easily and quickly made, though they needed frequent mending. The deerskin breeches, or drawers, were very comfortable when dry, but when they became wet were very cold to the limbs, and the next time they were put on were almost as stiff as if made of wood. Hats or caps were made of the various native furs. The women were clothed in linsey petticoats, coarse shoes and stockings, and wore buckskin gloves or mittens when any protection was required for the hands. All of the wearing apparel, like that of the men, was made with a view to being serviceable and comfortable, and all was of home manufacture. Other articles, and finer ones, were worn sometimes, but they were brought from former homes, and were usually the relics handed down from parents to children. Jewelry was not common, but occasionally some ornament was displayed.

In the cabins of the cultivated pioneers were usually a few books—the Bible and hymn-book, Pilgrim's Progress, Baxter's Saints' Rest, Harvey's Meditations, Æsop's Fables, Gulliver's Travels, Robinson Cruso, and the like. The long winter evenings were spent in poring over a few well-thumbed volumes by the light of the great log fire, in knitting, mending, curing furs, etc. Hospitality was simple, unaffected, hearty, unbounded.

Whiskey was in common use, and was furnished on all occasions of sociality. Nearly every settler had his barrel stored away. It was the universal drink at merry-makings, bees, house-warmings, weddings, and was always set before the traveler who chanced to spend the night or take a meal in the log cabin. It was the good, old-fashioned whiskey—"clear as amber, sweet as musk, smooth as oil"—that the few octogenarians and nonogenarians of to-day recall to memory with an unctuous gusto and a suggestive smack of the lips. The whiskey came from the Monongahela country, and was floated down the Ohio and thence boated up the Scioto. A few years later many stills were set up by the settlers, and an article of corn whiskey manufactured that was not held in such high esteem, though used in great quantities.

As the settlement increased, the sense of loneliness and isolation was dispelled, the asperities of life were softened, its amenities multiplied. Social gatherings became more numerous and more enjoyable. The log-rolling, harvesting, and husking-bees for the men, and the applebutter-making and quilting parties for the women, furnished frequent occasions for social intercourse. The early settlers took much pleasure and pride in rifle-shooting, and as they were accustomed to the use of the gun as a means, often, of obtaining subsistence, and relied upon it as a weapon of defence, they exhibited considerable skill. A wedding was the event of most importance in the sparsely settled new country. The young people had every inducement to marry, and generally did so as soon as able to provide for themselves. When a marriage was to be celebrated, all the neighborhood turned out. It was customary to have the ceremony performed before dinner, and, in order to be on time, the groom and his attendants usually started from his father's home in the morning, for that of the bride. All went on horseback, riding in single file along the narrow trail. Arriving at the cabin of the bride's parents, the ceremony would be performed, and after that, dinner served. This would be a substantial backwoods feast of beef, pork, fowls, and bear or deer meat, with such vegetables as could be procured. The greatest hilarity prevailed during the meal. After it was over, the dancing began, and was usually kept up till the next morning, though the newly-made husband and wife were, as a general thing, put to bed in the most approved fashion, and with considerable formality, in the middle of the evening's route. The tall young men, when they went on to the floor to dance, had to take their places with care between the logs that supported the loft floor, or they were in danger of bumping their heads. The figures of the dances were three and four-handed reels, or square sets and jigs. The commencement was always a square four, which was followed by "jigging it off." The "settlement" of a young couple was thought to be thoroughly and generously made when the neighbors assembled and raised a cabin for them.

During all the early years of the settlement, varied with occasional pleasures and excitements, the great work of increasing the tillable ground went slowly on. The implements and tools were few, and of the most primitive kind, but the soil, that had long held in reserve the accumulated richness of centuries, produced splendid harvests, and the husbandman was well rewarded for his labor. The soil was warmer then than now, and the season earlier. The prairie fields were often, by the first of March, as green as fields of grain now are by the first of April. The wheat was pastured in the spring to keep it from growing up so early and so fast as to become lodged. The harvest came early, and the yield was often from thirty-five to forty, or more, bushels per acre. Corn grew fast, and roasting ears were to be had by the Fourth of July in some seasons.

There was great difficulty in obtaining flour and meal. There was no mill nearer than Chillicothe—the floating mill upon the river—for a number of years. Only the commonest goods were brought into the country, and they sold at enormous prices, being packed from Detroit, or wagoned from Philadelphia to Pittsburgh, thence floated down the Ohio to the mouth of the Scioto, and thence brought up the stream in boats, or packed along the banks. Tea was worth two or three dollars a pound for a number of years after the settlement of the Scioto valley had extended up as far as Columbus. Coffee brought from seventy-five cents to a dollar; salt, five to six dollars per bushel, of fifty pounds, and the commonest kinds of calico were sold at a dollar per yard. Long journeys upon foot were often made by the pioneers to obtain the necessities of life, or some article, then a luxury, for the sick. Hardships were cheerfully borne, privations stoutly endured; the best was made of what they had, by the pioneers and their families, and they toiled patiently on, industrious and frugal, simple in their tastes and pleasures, happy in an independence, however hardly gained, and looking forward, hopefully, to a future of plenty, which should reward them for the toils of their earliest years, and a rest from the struggle amidst the benefits gained by it. Without an iron will and indomitable resolution, they could never have accomplished what they did. Their heroism deserves the highest tribute of praise that can be awarded.

During the war of 1812, many of the husbands and fathers volunteered their services to the United States, and others were drafted. Women and children were then left alone in many an isolated log cabin all through Ohio, and there was a long reign of unrest, anxiety and terror. It was feared by all that the Indians might take advantage of the desertion of these homes by their natural defenders, and pillage and destroy them. The dread of robbery and murder filled many a mother's heart, but happily the worst fears of this kind proved to be groundless, and this part of the country was spared any scenes of actual violence.

After the war, there was a greater feeling of security than ever before; a new motive was given to immigration. The country rapidly filled up with settlers, and the era of peace and prosperity was fairly begun. Progress was slowly, surely made; the log houses became more numerous in the clearings; the forest shrank away before the woodsman's axe. Frame houses began to appear; the pioneers, assured of safety, laid better plans for the future, resorted to new industries, enlarged their possessions, improved the means of cultivation. Stock was brought in from Kentucky and from the east. Every settler had his horses, oxen, cattle, sheep and hogs. More commodious structures took the places of the old ones; the large double log cabin, of hewed logs, took the place of the smaller hut; log and frame barns were built for the protection of stock, and the housing of the crops. Then society began to form itself, the school-house and the church appeared, and the advancement was noticeable in a score of ways. Still there remained a vast work to perform, for as yet only a beginning had been made in the western woods. The brunt of the struggle, however, was past, and the way made in the wilderness for the army that was to come.

CHAPTER V.

SETTLEMENT AND POPULATION.

THERE is one great and striking peculiarity in the settlement and population of the Scioto valley that is more clearly exemplified in Pickaway county than in Franklin, or any other. It is the difference between the people upon the east and west sides of the river. There is, probably, no other county or section of country, of equal size, in the State of Ohio which contains two such clearly defined and different elements as the population of Virginian descent upon the west side of the river, and that of Pennsylvanian origin upon the east side. The cause of this peculiarity is, of course, directly attributable to the formation of the land grants, or reservations. Virginia having retained, as is fully explained in the chapter headed "Title to Ohio—The Land Grants—The Survey," all of the lands west of the Scioto and east of the Miami, they came, very naturally, to be settled by the pioneers who emigrated from that State. They brought with them the ideas, and manners and customs of the Old Dominion, which, taking root in the new soil of the frontier, sprang up and produced their like, modified, to be sure, by various forces, but retaining strong general resemblance to the parent stock. The land upon the east side of the river being within the United States military, congress and refugee tracts, was, for obvious reasons, settled and developed by pioneers from a wider range of localities, though the greater proportion, especially in Pickaway county, were Pennsylvanians.

Franklin county, from the fact that it is farther north than Pickaway, received more of its early population from the east; an admixture from New England and New York State, as well as from the northern part of Ohio, in later years. Upon the west side of the river the early settlers were, as in Pickaway, from Virginia, but upon the whole, the population of Franklin was, and is, much more cosmopolitan in its character than that of Pickaway; the river has been less clearly the dividing line between the Virginian and other pioneers, and the difference in the mode and degree of the development of the country has been conspicuous.

The different elements in the population of Pickaway, and the effects produced by the two peoples, is worthy of more than a passing word. At present there is not exhibited the wide diversity there once was. It has been modified by the influx of other than the original elements of population, by intermingling of the people, change of residence, and various other causes.

The land in Pickaway, which is a part of the Virginia military grant, was mostly held by wealthy men, in large tracts, and a system of tenantry was brought in vogue at an early day, through this circumstance. Upon the west side of the river, there is within the county a territory of about two hundred and ninety square miles, and this territory, about the year 1843, according to a small historical pamphlet then published, contained a population of only eight thousand, three hundred and seventy-six, an average of less than thirty to the square mile, while the land upon the east side of the river, containing about eighty less square miles, sustained a population of eleven thousand, three hundred and forty-nine, an average of almost fifty-five to the square mile. The popular disposition being to take up large tracts of land, the insecurity of title, and other causes, created the tenant system under which the lands were never so fully improved as where actual ownership, and division into smaller farms, was the rule. Forty or fifty years after the settlement of the county began, the difference between the lands east and west of the river was very conspicuous. Upon the east side, where the Pennsylvanians were in the majority, the farms and fields were of moderate size, well improved, and thoroughly worked by men who lived upon them, in comfortable homes, and who were their owners. Upon the west side there were occasional houses of much pretension, and immense farms but partially improved, and often cultivated in a lax and slovenly way. Upon one side the wealth of the country was quite equally divided; upon the other were to be seen the extremes of wealth and poverty. The price of land of the same quality east and west of the river was very often nearly twice as great upon the former side as upon the latter, and as the lands east of the Scioto were surveyed in small tracts and parcels, thus being within reach of the poorer class of pioneers, this part of the county was first to gain a good average of population. The habits brought with the first emigrants underwent a gradual change, new elements of population entered the country, the large farms, upon the death of their original owners, were cut up and divided among the members of the family, and the peculiar differences between the appearance and character of the country upon the east and west sides of the river grew slowly less observable until, at the present, very little is noticeable.

THE FIRST SETTLEMENTS.

In Pickaway county the first permanent white settlements were made in 1796, or the following year. The first cabins were erected upon the "truce," or trail leading from the crossing of the Hockhocking (now Lancaster) by the Pickaway plains, to Chillicothe. There was one three or four miles south of the plains, and another at the eastern edge. The land upon which stood the old Indian town of Chillicothe became the property of Abel Westfall, who laid out the village which to-day bears his name. The rich body of lands known as the Pickaway plains was crossed by the great thoroughfares leading from the eastern settlements to Chillicothe, and to Cincinnati and the Miami settlements. Numerous "squatters" had, at an early day, erected cabins along these roads, and yet these lands were not sold until nearly all of the soil lying around them had been taken up. Consequently the settlement upon the plains could not be regarded as permanent. It involved no possessive rights. Settlements were made on Darby creek by Jonathan Renick; on Deer creek by Abraham Shanton, and on Walnut plains by David Denny, as early as 1800. A few cabins were erected six or eight miles apart, upon the trail leading from Chillicothe to Franklinton through Westfall, as early as 1797–8. Following are the dates of settlement of the several townships, as nearly as can be ascertained:

Franklin county was first settled in 1797, the point being the site upon which Franklinton was subsequently laid out. The next settlement was made upon Darby creek, and the third—a scattering of pioneer cabins along Alum creek—was made in the summer of 1798. About the same time a few settlers located at the mouth of Big Belly (now Gahanna) creek. The settlement followed the banks of this stream throughout the territory of what is now Franklin county. After the year 1800, the influx of population was steady and quite rapid, so that the country was soon occupied by a number of people, and its resources began to be developed in such a manners a to encourage other emigrants to come here.

Following is a list of some of the earliest settlements:

Franklin township, which originally contained about twice as much land as the whole county now does, was first settled at the village of Franklinton, of which mention has been before made, in 1797.

Sharon. The first settlement was made in the spring of 1803, by the Scioto company, upon the site of the town of Worthington.

Montgomery was settled in 1799, along Alum creek.

Pleasant township was first settled at a point on Darby creek, near Georgesville.

Hamilton was settled in 1800; Washington, in 1801 or 1802; Madison, 1802–3; Truro, in 1805; Plain, in 1802; Blendon, in 1806; Mifflin, in 1799; Jefferson, in 1802–3; Brown, in 1808; and Clinton, previous to 1804.

POPULATION.

The following tables show the population of Franklin and Pickaway counties every decade from 1820 to 1870, both inclusive, as given by the United States census, and the population of the townships, at three periods of their growth:

FRANKLIN COUNTY.

1820	10,300	1850	64,132
1830	14,756	1860	50,361
1840	24,880	1870	63,524

The following shows the population of the townships at the periods—1820, 1840 and 1870:

	1820	1840	1870
Blendon	——	972	1,771
Brown	——	425	819

CHAPTER VI.

TITLES TO OHIO---LAND GRANTS---THE SURVEY.

THE first people to claim possession of the territory now included in the State of Ohio, other than the prehistoric Mound Builders and the Indians, were the French. France vested the right of her title upon the discoveries of that intrepid, indomitable explorer Robert Cavalier De La Salle, who is said, by Parkman and other historians, to have passed from Lake Erie south, over the portage in the Allegheny river, and from thence to the Ohio river, as far as the "Falls" at Louisville, thus being the discoverer and explorer of the State. By his subsequent discoveries, too, La Selle was accredited with the honor of having found for France the whole of the vast territory commonly considered as included in the Mississippi valley and called Louisiana. The title was disputed by Great Britain, but the controversy was only a slight one, and France held possession before the Utrecht treaty in 1713, and after that treaty, up to the treaty of Paris in 1763, when Great Britain came into possession of the soil northwest of the Ohio, and retained it until the close of the Revolutionary war, whereby the treaty of peace, concluded at Paris in 1783, and ratified by the American congress in the following year, the ownership was vested in the United States.

INDIAN TREATIES.

The indefinite claim of the Iroquois Indians, or Six Nations, based upon their assumption of having conquered the whole country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and hence becoming its owners, was extinguished by the terms of the treaty of Fort Stanwix, concluded October 22, 1784. The commissioners of congress in this transaction were Oliver Wolcott, Richard Butler and Arthur Lee. The Six Nations were represented by Red Jacket and Cornplanter, two of their most able chiefs.

The treaty of Fort McIntosh, by which the Delawares, Wyandots, Ottawas and Chippewas relinquished all claims to the Ohio valley, was negotiated in January, 1785, by George Rogers Clark, Richard Butler and Arthur Lee, for the United States, and the chiefs of the tribes named, for the Indians. By the provisions of this treaty, the boundary line dividing these Indians from the United States was established along the Cuyahoga river and the main branch of the Tuscarawas, to its fork, near Fort Laurens, thence westwardly to the portage between the headquarters of Great Miami and the Miami of the Lakes (Maumee), thence down said river to Lake Erie, and along the lake to the mouth of the Cuyahoga.

Other relinquishments were effected by the treaty of Fort Finney, at the mouth of the Great Miami, concluded with the Shawnees, January 31, 1786; by the treaty of Fort Harmer, held by General St. Clair, January 9, 1789, and by the treaty of Greenville, August 3, 1795.

The rights and titles left the Indians by these and other treaties were extinguished by treaties subsequently made, and by purchase.

THE CLAIMS OF STATES.

After the ratification of the treaty of peace, in 1784, between Great Britain and the United States, and for some time before, New York, Massachusetts and Connecticut asserted claims to portions of the lands now included in the boundaries of Ohio, and Virginia claimed the whole, and much more, even to the entire extent of the "territory northwest of the Ohio river." Virginia's claim was founded upon certain charters granted to the colony of Virginia by James the First, bearing date, respectively, April 10, 1606, May 23, 1609, and March 12, 1611; also, upon the conquest of the country between the Ohio and Mississippi rivers and the northern lakes, by General George Rogers Clark, in 1778 and 1779. Though possessing as valid a claim as any other State, Virginia was the second to relinquish her hold upon the disputed territory, for the good of the United States, which was done by a deed of cession, granted March 1, 1784.*

The charters of Massachusetts and Connecticut both embraced territory extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and that of New York, obtained from Charles the Second, included territory that had been previously granted to Massachusetts and Connecticut. Their charters covering, to some extent, the same territory, there arose conflicts between them and Virginia as to the ownership of the soil of Ohio. New York made a deed of cession May 1, 1782. Virginia followed, reserving the military lands, in 1784, and Masschusetts on the thirteenth of November, in the same year, authorized her delegates in congress to cede the title of the State to all lands west of the western boundary of New York. The measure was consummated in 1785. Connecticut ceded all of her claim west of what is now known as the Western Reserve, in September, 1786, an act which has been characterized by Chief Justice Chase as "the last tardy and reluctant sacrifice of State pretensions to the common good."

* The nature and provisions of this deed of cession are more fully explained under the heading "Virginia Military Lands," in this chapter.

Having traced the history of the title to the soil of Ohio, we shall proceed to show how that part of the lands in which the counties of Franklin and Pickaway lie, was parceled off and put in the market, the tracts or grants to which they belong, and the reason of their existence.

When Ohio was admitted to the Federal Union as an independent State, one of the terms of admission was, that the fee simple to all the lands within its limits, especially those previously granted or sold, should be vested in the United States. The different portions of the lands have, at various times, been granted or sold to various companies, bodies politic, and individuals. The principal divisions were known as follows:

1, Congress lands; 2, United States Military Lands; 3, Virginia Military District; 4, Western Reserve; 5, Fire Lands; 6, Ohio Company's Purchase; 7, Donation Tract; 8, Symmes' Purchase; 9, Refugee Tract; 10, French Grant; 11, Dolerman's Grant; 12, Zane's Grant; 13, Canal Lands; 14, Turnpike Lands; 15, Maumee Road Lands; 16, School Lands; 17, College Lands; 18, Ministerial; 19, Moravian; 20, Salt Sections.

All of the lands in the two counties represented in this work belong to one of four tracts—the Virginia Military Lands, the United States Military Lands, the Refugee Tract, or the Congress Lands.

THE VIRGINIA MILITARY LANDS.

All of the territory in Franklin and Pickaway counties, west of the Scioto river, is included in the Virginia Military district.

At its session, beginning October 20, 1783, the general assembly of Virginia passed an act to authorize its delegates in congress to convey to the United States, in congress assembled, all the right of that commonwealth to the territory northwest of the Ohio river. Congress stipulated to accept this cession upon condition that this territory should be formed into States, containing a suitable extent of territory, and that the States so formed should be distinctly republican, and admitted members of the Federal Union, having the same rights of sovereignty and freedom as the other States. On the seventeenth of March, 1784, Thomas Jefferson, Arthur Lee, James Monroe and Samuel Hardy, the Virginia delegates to congress, conveyed to the United States "all right, title and claim, as well as of jurisdiction, which the said commonwealth hath to the territory, or tract of country, within the limits of the Virginia charter, situate, lying and being northwest of the river Ohio."

This act of cession contained, however, the following reservation: "That in case the quantity of good land on the southeast side of the Ohio, upon the waters of Cumberland river, and between the Great and Tennessee rivers, which have been reserved by law, for the Virginia troops, upon continental establishment, should, from the North Carolina line, bearing in further upon the Cumberland lands than was expected, prove insufficient for these legal bounties, the deficiency should be made up to the said troops in good lands, to be laid off between the rivers Scioto and Little Miami, on the northwest side of the river Ohio, in such proportions to them as have been engaged to them by the laws of Virginia." The land embraced in this reservation constitutes the Virginia military district in Ohio, and is composed of the counties of Adams, Brown, Clinton, Clermont, Highland, Fayette, Madison and Union, and portions of Scioto, Pike, Ross, Pickaway, Franklin, Delaware, Marion, Hardin, Logan, Clark, Greene, Champaign, Warren and Hamilton.

Congress passed an act authorizing the establishment of this reservation and location as defined, upon the report of the executive of Virginia that the deficiency of good lands upon the waters of the Cumberland existed.

The Virginia soldiers of the Continental line, who served in the Revolutionary war, were compensated in bounty awards of these lands according to the rank, time of service, etc. The first step necessary, after securing the proper certificate of actual service, was that of procuring a printed warrant from the land officer, specifying the quantity of lands and the rights upon which it was due. This military warrant was issued from the land office, in the State of Virginia, which empowered the person to whom it was granted, his heirs or assigns, to select the number of acres specified in the lands reserved for that purpose, and to have the same appropriated. After the location was made and the boundaries ascertained by surveying, the owner of the warrant returned it to the State authorities, and received in its place a patent, or grant, from the government. This grant was equivalent to a deed in fee simple, and passed all of the title of the government to the grantee.

On the same day on which the act was passed, Richard C. Anderson, a colonel in the army, was appointed surveyor for the Continental line of the army, by the officers named in the act and authorized to make such appointment as they saw fit. He opened his office at Louisville, for entries in the Kentucky lands, on the twentieth of July, 1784. When the Kentucky grant was exhausted he opened another office for entries in the Ohio tract. He held his position up to the time of his death, in October, 1826, and during the long period faithfully discharged the onerous duties devolving upon him. His son-in-law, Allen Latham, esq., was appointed surveyor sometime after Colonel Anderson's death, and opened his office at Chillicothe in July, 1829.

Any soldier who held a warrant, or the heir or assign of any soldier who held a warrant, was at liberty to locate his lands wherever he pleased within the Virginia military lands, and in consequence of the irregularities with which many locations were made, and the encroachment of some locations upon others, far more litigation has arisen relative to lines and titles in this district than in those which were regularly surveyed and laid off in sections.

The Virginia military tract was never surveyed into ranges or townships until it was done in the different counties, by order of the county commissioners, when it became desirable to organize the townships for civil purposes. Hence their irregular shape and size. The townships in Franklin county which lie within the tract are: Washington, Norwich, Brown, Prairie, Franklin, Pleasant and Jackson. Those in Pickaway county are: Darby, Scioto, Monroe, Muhlenburg, Jackson, Perry, Deer Creek and Wayne.

THE UNITED STATES MILITARY LANDS

Were surveyed under the provisions of an act of Congress, passed June 1, 1796, and contained two million five hundred and sixty thousand acres. The tract was set apart to satisfy certain claims of the officers and soldiers who fought in the Revolutionary war. It is bounded by the Seven ranges on the east, by the Greenville treaty line on the north, by the Congress and Refugee lands on the south, and by the Scioto river on the west, and includes the entire county of Coshocton and portions of Tuscarawas, Guernsey, Muskingum, Franklin, Delaware, Marion, Morrow, Knox, and Holmes. The townships of Franklin county which belong to this tract are Jefferson, Plain, Blendon, Mifflin, Clinton, Sharon, and Perry. The southeast quarter of Plain township, and a portion of Perry, were laid out, for the convenience of soldiers, in one hundred acre lots. The townships of Plain, Jackson, Mifflin, Blendon, Sharon, and Clinton, were divided into quarters, each of which was intended to contain four thousand acres. After satisfying the claims for which these lands were set apart, there was a surplus, which was divided into sections a mile square, and containing six hundred and forty acres. The surplus lands were disposed of by sale.

THE REFUGEE TRACT

Is a body of land containing about one hundred thousand acres, granted by Congress, February 18, 1801, to persons who fled from the British provinces—Canada and Nova Scotia—during the Revolutionary war and took up arms in behalf of the colonies and against their mother country, thereby losing their property by confiscation.

This tract is four and one-half miles wide, from north to south, and extends forty-eight miles eastward from the Scioto river, at Columbus, into Muskingum county, including parts of Franklin, Fairfield, Perry, Licking and Muskingum. The townships in Franklin county which lie within this tract are Montgomery and Truro.

THE CONGRESS LANDS

Two townships in Franklin county—Hamilton and Madison—are within the Congress lands. This tract includes, also, all of Pickaway county east of the Scioto river, viz.: the townships of Madison, Harrison, Walnut Creek, Circleville, Washington, Pickaway and Salt Creek. The congress lands were surveyed and put in the market in conformance to an ordinance passed in 1785, after the several States claiming ownership had all granted deeds of cession to the United States, and after the title had been made perfect by treaty with the Indians. The lands were surveyed into townships six miles square, or as nearly that size as was practicable, and were divided into sections, each a mile square. Four sections in each township were reserved for future sale by the United States, and one section was set apart for the use of schools. Originally a provision was made for the reservation of one-seventh of the lands surveyed, for the use of the Continetal troops, but this plan was subsequently abandoned, and, as heretofore related, a specific appropriation of a tract was made for that purpose. The system of the survey and sale underwent many changes, which it is unnecessary here to relate.

SCHOOL LANDS.

Congress, by a compact with the people, gave them one-thirty-sixth part of all of the lands northwest of the Ohio river for school purposes. The lands for this purpose set apart, however, were appropriated by squatters, and through unwise, careless, and, sometimes, corrupt legislation, these squatters were vested with proprietorship. "Members of the legislature, not unfrequently, got acts passed and leases granted, either to themselves, to their relatives, or to their warm partizans. One senator contrived to get, by such acts, seven entire sections of land into either his own, or his children's possession."* From 1803 to 1820, the general assembly spent a considerable portion of every session in passing acts relating to these lands, without ever advancing the cause of education in any degree.

In 1821 the house of representatives appointed five of its members, viz: Caleb Atwater, Lloyd Talbot, James Shields, Roswell Mills and Josiah Barber, a committee on schools and school lands. This committee subsequently made a report, rehearsing the wrong management of the school land trust on behalf of the State, warmly advocated the establishment of a system of education, and the adoption of measures which would secure for the people the rights which congress intended they should possess. In compliance with the recommendation of the committee, the governor of the State, in May, 1822, having been authorized by the legislature, appointed seven commissioners of schools and school lands, viz: Caleb Atwater, the Rev. John Collins, Rev. James Hoge, D. D., N. Guilford, Hon. Ephriam Cutler, Hon. Josiah Barber and James M. Bell, esq. The reason why seven persons were appointed was because there were seven different sorts of school lands in the State, viz: Section number sixteen in every township of the Congress lands, the Virginia military lands, Symmes' purchase, the Ohio company's purchase, the Refugee lands, and the Connecticut Western Reserve. For the four different land grants represented in the lands of Franklin and Pickaway counties, the appointments were as follows: For Congress lands, John Collins; for the Refugee lands, James Hoge; for the United States Military lands, James M. Bell. The commission of seven persons was reduced, by various causes, to one of three, Messrs. Atwater, Collins and Hoge, who performed the arduous duties incumbent upon them, with but little remuneration, and (at the time), but few thanks. The legislature of 1823 broke up without having taken any definite action upon the report presented by the commission, but during the summer and autumn of 1824, the subject of the sale of the school lands was warmly agitated, and the friends of this measure triumphed over the opposition so far as to elect large majorities to both branches of the general assembly, in favor of its being made a law. The quantity of land set apart was ascertained, in 1825, to be a little more than half a million acres, and was valued at less than a million dollars. A portion of these lands was sold by the legislature under authority of congress, and the residue was leased.

PERILS OF THE SURVEY.

The original survey of the lands at present comprised in Franklin and Pickaway counties, and especially of the Virginia Military tract, was attended with great difficulty and danger.

This land district was opened in 1787, and soon after, Massie, Sullivant, McArthur, and others, commenced the adventurous undertaking of surveying it. All of the locations of land warrants prior to 1790, were made by stealth. "Every creek which was explored, every line that was run, were at the risk of life from the savage Indians, whose courage and perseverance were only equaled by the perseverance of the whites to push forward their settlements. Colonel R. C. Anderson, surveyor-general of the Virginia Military District, placed a large number of the warrants in the hands of Nathaniel Massie, in 1790, when Congress removed the last obstruction to the taking of the lands, and he immediately proceeded to enter and survey, on such terms as he could make with the owners. The risk being great, and as the holders of claims were anxious to have them located as soon as possible, in order that they might obtain the best selections, they were willing to pay liberally for the labor and danger of the survey. One-fourth, one-third, and sometimes as much as one-half, of the lands acquired by entry, were given by the proprietors to the surveyors. If the owners preferred paying in money, the usual terms were ten pounds, Virginia currency, for each one thousand acres surveyed, exclusive of chainman's wages. Massie continued to survey during the winter of 1792–3, and in the fall of the latter year he pushed his way far up the Scioto. He employed about thirty men to accompany him on his dangerous expedition. The greater part of Ross and Pickaway counties, west of the river, was well explored and partly surveyed. The party returned without having met with any harm, and delighted with the richness of the valley. Massie resumed his labors in the winter of 1793–4, and braved many hardships and dangers.

Mr. Lucas Sullivant, one of the first settlers on the site of Columbus, and who died August 8, 1823, surveyed most of the Virginia Military grant lying in the present limits of Franklin county. In some of his first attempts he was driven back by the Indians, but, finally, having formed a large party, about twenty men, surveyors, chain-bearers, markers, hunters, scouts and pack-horse men, with pack-horses, he made his way up the Scioto valley, through the untracked wilderness to the vicinity of what is now Columbus. The party experienced much suffering, sometimes having a short allowance of food, and because of the proximity of Indians, not daring to use their rifles to bring down game. Wolves were constant visitors to the encampment, and the panther was more than once found prowling around. "Once," says the Sullivant memorial, "when encamped near what the early settlers knew as the 'Salt-lick,' on the west side of the river, three miles below the present city of Columbus, a panther was discovered crouching upon the horizontal limb of a tree, nearly overhanging the place where they were sitting around the brightly blazing fire. The tail of the panther was swaying to and fro, and he seemed about to spring upon them, when one of the hunters, seizing his rifle, aimed at the head, between the glaring eye-balls of the animal, and, with a steady hand, pulled the trigger. Simultaneous with the crack of the gun, the beast gave a spring, and falling in their midst, scattered the camp-fire in his death struggles."

The rear guard of Mr. Sullivant's party attacked, on one occasion, a party of Indians, and killed a Frenchman who was with them—probably an Indian trader. For this the men were severely reprimanded by Mr. Sullivant, who believed that this wanton attack would be followed by a retaliating blow. The Mingo Indians held a consultation and sent out a party of warriors to capture or destroy the surveying squad. Mr. Sullivant, who, apprehending such a result, had hurried his work and was about ready to leave the country, was met on the fourth day after the Frenchman's murder by Indians. He held a council with his men, to determine whether they should attack the redskins or not, and it was decided not to take the initiative in battle. After directing the men to keep together, remain quiet, and on no consideration to fire a gun unless attacked, Mr. Sullivant resumed his work and, just at twilight, as he was making his last entry, some of the men fired at a wild turkey, and their whereabouts thus being made known, the Indians rushed upon them with a whoop and a volley. Mr. Sullivant threw his compass and other instruments under the top of a fallen tree, and swinging a light shotgun, which he always carried, to his shoulder, he fired upon an Indian who was rushing upon him with uplifted tomahawk. Turning about to look for his men, he saw they were in a panic and rapidly dispersing, and he also took to his heels, and, fortunately, in about a quarter of a mile, fell in with six of them. Favored in their flight by the darkness, they journeyed all night and most of the next day. Two of the men in this surveying party were killed when the Indians made their first onslaught. Mr. Sullivant had some other experiences with the Indians, but none so dangerous or nearly fatal as this.

The surveys of the lands upon the east side of the river were accompanied by dangers similar to those that attended the survey of the Virginia military district, though lesser, on account of the surveying being done at a later date.

CHAPTER VII.

CIVIL ORGANIZATION AND COUNTY DIVISION.

THE pre-historical history of Ohio, so far as regards civil organization and the exercise of authority, begins in 1769, when the colony of Virginia attempted to extend her jurisdiction over the territory northwest of the river

Ohio. The house of burgesses passed an act establishing the county of Botetourt, with the Mississippi river as its western boundary. This was a vast county. The act which established it contained the following passage:

"Whereas, the people situated on the Mississippi, in the said county of Botetourt, will be very remote from the court house, and must necessarily become a separate county as soon as their numbers are sufficient, which will probably happen in a short time, be it therefore enacted by the authority aforesaid, that the inhabitants of that part of the said county of Botetourt which lies on the said waters shall be exempted from the payment of any levies to be laid by the said county court for the purpose of building a court house and prison for said county.

Civil government between the Ohio and Mississippi rivers existed only nominally until 1778, when, after the conquest of the country by General George Rogers Clark, the Virginia legislature organized the county of Illinois, embracing within its limits all of the lands lying west of the Ohio river to which Virginia had any claim. Colonel John Todd received appointment from the governor of Virginia as civil commandant and lieutenant of the county. He served until his death, at the battle of Blue Licks, in 1782, and Timothy Montbrun was his successor.

In 1787, Virginia, having made her deed of cession to the United States, and the title having been protected through other deeds of cession, and through Indian treaties, congress took the great step which resulted in the establishment of a wise and salutary civil government. Upon the thirteenth of July, after a prolonged discussion of the principles and issues involved, there was issued "An Ordinance for the Government of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio," which has since been known as "the ordinance of 1787," or the "ordinance of freedom." By this great and statesmanlike ordinance, provision was made for successive forms of territoral government, adapted to successive steps of advancement in the settlement and development of the western country. Chief Justice Chase says of this ordinance: "This remarkable instrument was the last gift of the congress of the old confederation to the country, and it was a fit consummation of their glorious labors."

At the time this ordinance went into effect, there had been made no permanent settlements of whites upon the territory embraced, except the few French villages, and their immediate vicinities, in the western and northwestern portions of it. If any such existed within the present limits of Ohio, they must have been situated along the Maumee river, and were of small extent.* The government had discouraged the settlement of whites up to this time, to avoid infringement upon the rights of the Indians, and consequent troubles. Military force was resorted to to break up some small settlements made along the Ohio, and in other parts of the State.

After the passage of the ordinance, immigration was encouraged. "When the settlers went into the wilderness, they found the law already there. It was impressed upon the soil itself, while it yet bore up nothing but the forest." †

Congress, in 1787, appointed General Arthur St. Clair governor of the Northwest territory; Major Winthrop Sargent, secretary, and James M. Varnum and John Armstrong, judges, though the latter, declining to serve, was supplanted by John Cleve Symmes in the following year. On the ninth of July, 1788, Governor St. Clair arrived at Marietta, and proceeded to organize the territory. The first law was proclaimed July 25, 1788, and upon the twenty-seventh of the same month the governor issued a proclamation, establishing the county of Washington, which included all of the territory east of the Scioto river, to which the Indian title had been extinguished, reaching northward to Lake Erie, the Ohio river and the Pennsylvania line being its eastern boundary, Marietta, the seat of the territorial government, also becoming the county seat of Washington county.

The next county laid out was Hamilton, in 1790. Cincinnati was the county seat. The other territorial counties were the following, laid out in the order in which here given: St. Clair, Knox, Randolph, Wayne, Adams, Jefferson, Ross, Trumbull, Clermont, Fairfield and Belmont. Ross, the mother county of Franklin and Pickaway, was proclaimed August 20, 1798, and its seat of government was Chillicothe, which was laid out the previous year by Nathaniel Massie. The county was named after the Hon. James Ross, of Allegheny county, Pennsylvania, who, at that time, was the unsuccessful candidate of the Federalists for governor of that State.

CHAPTER VIII.

ERECTION AND ORGANIZATION OF FRANKLIN COUNTY.

FRANKLIN COUNTY was erected in 1803, by the following act of the general assembly, convened at Chillicothe, the then State capital:

An Act to Establish the County of Franklin:

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That all that part of Ross contained within the following boundaries, to wit: Beginning on the western boundary of the twentieth range of townships east of the Scioto river, at the corner of sections numbers twenty-four and twenty-five in the ninth township of the twenty-first range, surveyed by John Mathews; thence west until it intersects the eastern boundary line of Greene county; thence north with said line until it intersects the State line; thence eastwardly with the said line to the northwest corner of Fairfield county; thence with the western boundary line of Fairfield county to the place of beginning, shall form a separate and distinct county, to be called by the name of Franklin.

SECTION 2. And be it further enacted, That all taxes and officers' fees, which may be due from the inhabitants of the said county of Franklin to the county of Ross at the commencement of this act, shall be collected and paid in like manner as if the said county had not been divided; and the same proceedings shall be had in all processes, judgments, and executions which may be pending in the said county of Ross at the commencement of this act, as would have taken place had it never been passed.

SECTION 3. And be it further enacted, That courts for the said county of Franklin shall be holden in the town of Franklinton, until a permanent seat of justice shall be established therein, agreeably to the provisions of the act entitled, "an act establishing seats of justice."

SECTION 4. This act shall commence and be in force from and after the thirtieth day of April next. MICHAEL BALDWIN,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SAM. HUNTINGTON,

Speaker pro tem. of the Senate.

March 30, 1803.

The erection of the county of Delaware, in 1808, reduced the northern boundary of the county to its present limit. Pickaway county was erected in 1810, and reduced the county of Franklin to its present southern limit. The erection of Madison in 1810, and of Union in 1820, reduced the western extent of the county, but in 1845 the boundary line was established by act of the legislature, along Darby creek, from the northwest corner of Brown to the north line of Pleasant township. Again, in 1857, by an "act to annex a part of Licking county to the county of Franklin," nine half sections were attached to Franklin, and in 1851 six sections were added upon the same side of the county.

These changes left the county, as at present, nearly square, twenty-two and a half miles in extent north and south, and about twenty-four and three-quarters from east to west.

FIRST COURT.

The first court of common pleas in Franklin county was held in Franklinton, "on the first Tuesday in May, and the third day thereof." There were present John Dill, David Jameson and Joseph Foos, esqs., associate judges. The court appointed Lucas Sullivant clerk pro tempore, and he took the oath of office.

The first official act of the court is recorded as follows:

"On the application of Joseph Foos and Jane Foos, (widow and relict of John Foos, deceased), letters of administration of the said decedent's estate were granted them, upon their complying with the requisites of the law. Whereupon they took the necessary oath, and together with Lucas Sullivant, their security, entered into and acknowledged their bond in the penal sum of seven hundred dollars, conditioned for the faithful discharge of their duties in their said administration."

The first mention we find of the president judge is under date of the first Tuesday in September, 1803, (to which time the court had adjourned). On that day "the Honorable Wyllys Silliman, esquire, president, and David Jameson and Joseph Foos, esquires, two of the associate judges, were present.

"John S. Wills, Michael Baldwin, Philemon Beecher, Wm. W. Irwin and Jonathan W. Reddick, intending to appear as attorneys in this court, took the oath of fidelity to their State, the oath to support the constitution of this State, and the oath of an attorney-at-law, they are severally admitted to practice as attorneys therein."

Other entries show that at this session of court, Jeremiah McLene, James Furguson and William Creighton, who were appointed commissioners, reported in favor of establishing Franklinton as the regular place for holding court.

John Blair foreman, Andrew Culbertson, James Short, William Bennett, Jonathan Holmes, Ezekel Bogard, Zachariah Stephen, James Marshall, Joseph Hunter, Samuel Henderson, William Brown, James Ewing and Calvin Carey were sworn "a grand jury of inquest for the body of this county," and having received their charge, withdrew from the bar, and after some time returned with the following presentments:

Usual Osbourn, for striking and beating with force and arms, John Story, the 23d day of June last, in the county aforesaid, contrary to the laws of the State.

Against Samuel Sills, for perjury, before Zachariah Stephens, a justice of the peace.

John Swills appeared as prosecutor. Both causes were continued.

Several entries of civil cases appear on the record, and all of them were continued. Among them were: Samuel Smith against James Brown; John Clark against David Nelson, and Alexander McLaughlin against Nathan Rollings.

April 16, 1803, an act was passed making it the duty of the Associate Judges to divide their respective counties into townships, and divers other duties now performed by the county commissioners.

The following record shows the early division of Franklin county:

"At a meeting of the Associate Judges of the Court of Common Pleas of Franklin county, at the temporary seat of justice of said county, in Franklinton, on Tuesday, May 10, 1803; present, the Hon. John Dill, Chief Judge, David Jamison, and Joseph Foos, esqrs, Associated Judges of the court aforesaid; who, having taken their official seats, were attended by Lucas Sullivant, clerk of the said Court of Common Pleas, and they then proceeded to lay off the said county of Franklin into townships, as required by an act of the general assembly of the State of Ohio, entitled, 'An act to regulate the election of Justices of the Peace, and for other purposes,' in the following manner, to wit:

"Ordered, That all that part of Franklin county contained within the following limits, to wit: Beginning at the forks of Darby creek, that is, at the junction of what is called Treacle's creek with Darby creek, running thence south to the line between the counties of Ross and Franklin; thence east with said line, until it intersects the Scioto river; thence up the same till it comes to a point one mile, on a straight line, above the mouth of Roaring run; and from thence to the point of beginning, do make and constitute the first township in Franklin county, and be called Franklin township.

"Ordered, That in Franklin township there be elected two justices of the peace, and that the electors hold their election for that purpose at the temporary place of holding courts for the county of Franklin, on the twenty-first day of June next.

"Ordered, That the lands contained within the following boundaries, to-wit: Beginning on the west bank of the Scioto river, one mile, on a direct line, above the mouth of Roaring run; from thence, on a direct line, to the junction of Treacle's creek with Darby creek, which is frequently called the forks of Darby; thence south unto the line between the counties of Ross and Franklin; thence west with said line until it intersects the county line of Greene; thence with the last mentioned line north, and from the point of beginning, up the Scioto to the northern boundary of Franklin county, do make and constitute the second township in said county, and be called Darby township.

"Ordered, That in Darby township there be elected one justice of the peace, and that the electors of said township hold their election for that purpose at the house of David Mitchell, in said township, on the twenty-first day of June next.

"Ordered, That the lands contained in the following limits; to-wit: Beginning on the east bank of the Scioto river, at the point where the sectional line between the sections number eight and seventeen, in township four and range twenty-two, intersects the Scioto river; thence east with the said sectional line until it intersects the line between the counties of Fairfield and Franklin; thence south with the same to the line between the counties of Ross and Franklin; thence west with the same until it intersects the Scioto river; thence up the river to the point of beginning, to make and constitute the third township in Franklin county, and be called Harrison township.

"Ordered, That there be elected in Harrison township, one justice of the peace, and that the election be held at the house of Alexander Laughferty, on one Thomas Renixes' farm, in said township, on the twenty-first day of June, next.

"Ordered, That the land contained in the following limits, to-wit: Beginning on the east bank of the Scioto river, at the intersection of the sectional line between the sections number eight and seventeen, in the fourth township and twenty-second range; running thence with the said sectional line east, to the line between the counties of Fairfield and Franklin; thence north with said line, and from the point of beginning, to the Scioto, to the northerly boundary of Franklin county, do constitute and make the fourth township, Franklin county, and be called Liberty township.

"Ordered, That two justices of the peace be elected in Liberty township; the election to be held at the house of John Beaty, in said township, on the twenty-first day of June, next."

Following are the names of those who were elected in accordance with the foregoing provisions, and who were the first justices of the peace in Franklin county: Franklin township, Zachariah Stephen and James Marshal; Darby township, Joshua Ewing; Harrison township, William Brown, and in Liberty township,—Joseph Hunter and Ezra Brown. The same day an election was held for representatives in Congress, the first in the State. The vote of Franklin county was: Franklin township, 59; Darby township, 22; Harrison township, 21; Liberty township, 28, or a total of 130. The aggregate vote of Franklin county for president, in 1876, was 17,037.

OTHER COURTS.

Besides the common pleas court of Franklin there have been three others which have sat in Columbus, though they do not belong properly to the history of the county. Prior to 1824, the annual sessions of the supreme court were held in Franklinton; since that time in Columbus. It originally consisted of four judges, but by the present State constitution, which took effect in 1851, was made to consist of five judges.

The district court, constituted by the common pleas judges of the proper district, generally hold a short annual term in Franklin, as in other counties.

The supreme court of Franklin county was established in 1857—March 27—as a sort of adjunct of the court of common pleas, with a single judge, elected by popular vote for five years, and having jurisdiction only in criminal cases. Fitch James Mathews, of Columbus, was elected judge of this court in April, 1857, and re-elected in 1862. Before the expiration of his term of office he resigned, on account of failing health, and J. William Baldwin was appointed his successor. This court was abolished in 1865, by act of the legislature, and its unfinished business transferred to the court of common pleas.

The probate court, like that of other counties, was established by the provisions of the constitution of 1851.

The regular courts were held for several years in hired rooms. The Franklinton court house was erected in 1807–8, Lucas Sullivant being the contractor. This and the jail, erected about the same time, remained in use until 1824, when the county seat was removed to Columbus. After that time, and up to 1840, the Court of Common Pleas was held in the United States court house, on the public square, north of the old State buildings.

THE COURT HOUSE

Of Franklin county was erected upon land originally owned by Dr. M. B. Wright and wife, and by them deeded to Robert Lysle, James Bryden, and R. W. Coles, October 20, 1837. The lots were numbers three hundred and fifty-eight and three hundred and fifty-nine, situated on the southeast corner of High and Mound streets. A third lot—number three hundred and sixty—was afterwads purchased, as the two first bought were found insufficient. The whole cost of the ground was one thousand, five hundred and fifty-six dollars and four cents. The court house was so far completed, in 1840, that it was used, and found ample enough, until 1852, when an additional building was erected, between which and the first a passage way was made on a level with the second floor.

JAILS.

The first building used for a jail after the county seat was removed to Columbus, was of brick, and stood upon the south side of Gay street, between High and Third. After the court house was erected, its basement was used for the purposes of a jail, but it proved too insecure for a prison, and as escapes were too frequent, a new jail was built in the rear, or east of the court house, fronting on Mound street. This building, all except the front, is of massive stone, and the cells are composed entirely of iron.

THE COUNTY INFIRMARY.

The first infirmary building was finished in 1833, upon the farm at the confluence of the Olentangy and Scioto. This infirmary was not large enough; it was inconvenient to convey the pauper sick to—being situated at such a distance from Columbus, from which city three-fourths of the inmates came—and for various other reasons it was deemed best to abandon this place and locate an infirmary elsewhere. In 1839 the commissioners purchased the present site of the infirmary, in the southern part of the city, and erected thereon the building now in use. Various additions have been made, from time to time, and several separate buildings erected, as well as more ground obtained.

On the first of December, 1869, the county commissioners purchased, for seventeen thousand, five hundred dollars, a tract of land known as the Flenniken farm, containing one hundred and fifteen acres, and situated on the west side of Olentangy, at the west end of King avenue, two miles from the State capitol building. The contract for the new building was let to Fornoff, Hess & Miller for one hundred and eighty-nine thousand, two hundred and seventy-nine dollars and forty-eight cents. A model infirmary building was to have been constructed. The plans were elaborately prepared and the actual work begun, but the land rose rapidly in value, and it was decided to give up the project, as one too costly. The land was subsequently sold off in parcels, and since then until quite recently no new plan has been advanced to provide for the destitute and decrepit. The county owns a farm, purchased in 1854, at an expense of about thirteen thousand dollars. It is on the Groveport pike.

CHAPTER IX.

ERECTION AND ORGANIZATION OF PICKAWAY COUNTY.

PRIOR to the year 1810, the territory included at present within the limits of Pickaway county was included in the counties of Ross, Franklin and Fairfield, the part in which Circleville lies being within the bounds of Ross. The State legislature, assembled at Chillicothe, the then capital of the State, on the twelfth of January, 1810, passed the following

ACT FOR THE ERECTION OF PICKAWAY COUNTY:

"SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That all those parts of the counties of Ross, Franklin and Fairfield, within the following boundaries, be, and the same are hereby, erected into a separate county, to be known by the name of Pickaway: Beginning on the east side of the Scioto river, at the intersection of a line between townships two and three, of range twenty-one, Worthington's survey; thence east with the township lines, to the southeast corner of township number eleven, and range twenty; thence north with the range line, to the northeast corner, to section number one, of township eleven, in range twenty; thence west with the township line, to the northwest corner of said township; thence north with the range line, to the northeast corner of section number thirteen, in township ten, of range twenty-one, Matthew's survey; thence west to the Scioto river; thence west from the Scioto river twelve miles; thence south twenty miles; thence east to the Scioto river; thence down the river to the place of beginning.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That from and after the first day of March next, said county shall be vested with all the privileges and immunities of a separate and distinct county: Provided, That the sheriffs, coroners, constables and collectors, for the counties aforesaid, may perform all the duties required by law, in their respective counties, within the county of Pickaway before the said division, and suits at law which are, or may be pending at the time of such division, shall be adjusted in the same manner, as if a division had not taken place.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That on the first Monday of April next, the legal voters residing within the said county of Pickaway, shall assemble in their respective townships, and elect their several county officers, who shall hold their offices until the next annual election.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That the Courts of said county shall be held at the house of Henry Nevil, until a permanent seat of justice is fixed as the law directs.

This act shall be in force from and after the first day of March next.

EDWARD TIFFIN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
DUNCAN M'ARTHUR,
Speaker of the Senate.

JANUARY 12, 1810

At this time Jefferson was the principal town in the county, and contained, probably, between two and three hundred inhabitants. Henry Nevill, at whose house the act ordered that the first court should assemble, resided in this village, and was the leading merchant and most prominent business man in the community.

COURTS.

Friday, April 6th, of the same year, was a memorable day, for it was then that the first court was ever assembled in the new county of Pickaway. The august body was composed, as the records state, of William Seymour, Thomas Barr and John Shoemaker, esquires, associate judges of the court of common pleas. James Denny was appointed clerk, pro tem., and William H. Puthuff, recorder, the latter giving bond in the sum of one thousand dollars. Having thus organized and appointed the justices of the peace for the various townships,—three to Pickaway, two to Salt Creek, three to Washington, three to Walnut, three to Madison, one to Scioto, two to Darby, two to Deer Creek and two to Wayne—the court adjourned to wait until the county commissioners should prepare a suitable place for their assemblage. The commissioners, consisting of D. Kinnear, Peter Apple and Jonathan Holmes, met on the twenty-first of April, and organized by electing David Kinnear clerk. Their first act was to approve and accept of the bonds of the officers, who had been chosen at the election had on the second inst., as follows: James Renick, sheriff, and John McNeal coroner. At that time it was their duty to appoint a county treasurer, and they selected Henry Nevill. They also appointed Samuel Lyman, lister, now called assessor. These appointments completed the official organization of the county. The next thing in order was to provide a jail.

On April 13th, of the same year, occurred the first trial, of which the following record is made:

State of Ohio
John Bennit. } PICKAWAY COUNTY, OHIO.

At a special court of enquiry, holden in the town of Jefferson, on Monday, the thirteenth (13th) day of April, 1810. Present, the Honorable William Seymour, Jacob Shoemaker, Thomas Barr, associate judges. James Rennick, sheriff, having opened court, it was ordered that he bring in the body of John Bennit, in his custody, who was charged with murdering Reuben Cherry, with malice aforethought. The prisoner was arraigned, and plead "not guilty," whereupon he was remanded back to prison, and the court adjourned.

May 1 the case continued, and resulted in the prisoner's being admitted to bail, which was fixed at one thousand dollars, for his appearance at the ensuing term of the court of common pleas for Pickaway county.

July 23, following, the first term of the court of common pleas convened at the house of Henry Nevill, in Jefferson. Present, Hon. John Thompson, president, and William Seymour, Thomas Barr and Jacob Shoemaker, associates, and Edward Williams, West Miller, Charles Cade, George Atter, Isaac Williams, John Timmons, William Marquis, James Martin, Daniel Shelby, John Burget, Thomas Renick, Ezekiel Morris, William Miller, Hugh Creighton, William Renick and John Robinson. William Miller, Hugh Creighton and John Robinson failing to put in an appearance, Benjamin Kepner and Elisha Litler were chosen in their stead.

David Shelby was appointed foreman, and after being sworn the jury retired.

The day following (July 24), the case of the State of Ohio against John Bennit came on, and on the twenty-sixth a verdict was rendered for manslaughter, whereupon the court ordered that the prisoner be confined in the goal of the county for the period of eight days, pay a fine of two hundred dollars, and the costs of prosecution.

"At this time," says a well informed writer to the press, "rules for the government of the court and officers were established. Some of them are worthy of mention. One was that the attorneys were to be orderly, and treat each other with respect at the bar. 'To make no noise or contradict no gentleman addressing the court or jury, unless first moving the court to interfere, and if the gentleman thus contradicted talks back, he shall, at the discretion of the court, suffer a suspension.' Another, 'That the prosecuting attorney shall keep the secrets of the grand jury and his own.' 'The clerk or deputy never to leave the court without permission.' The sheriff was 'to suffer no one to smoke within the bar.' 'To attend the court at their lodgings and walk before them to the court house every morning.' He was to open court thus: 'Hear ye, hear ye, hear ye! The judges of the court of common pleas of Pickaway county are now setting! All persons having any business to transact give their attention, and they will be heard. God save the State of Ohio and this honorable court.'

"The fees of county officers at this time were as follows: Prosecuting attorney, one hundred and sixty dollars per annum; clerk, sixty dollars; sheriff, sixty dollars."

COUNTY BUILDINGS.

On April 26, 1810, the commissioners of Pickaway county entered into an agreement with Henry Nevill, of the town of Jefferson, whereby a room was leased in the dwelling of the said Nevill, the same to be used as a jail, at an annual rent of forty dollars. June 8th, subsequently, a house was rented of the same person, to be used as a court house, at an annual rent of sixty dollars.

November 14th, of the same year, a contract was closed with Andrew Briner, of Washington township, Pickaway county, by which the said Briner was to erect, within four weeks from the signing of said contract, a jail, in the southeast corner of the greater circle in the town of Circleville; said building to be in size sixteen by twenty-two feet, and constructed of logs, for which he was to receive, when completed, the sum of fifty-five dollars.

March 7, 1811, the commissioners rented the upper portion of the dwelling of Jacob Zeager, jr., situated in the town of Circleville, the same to be used as a county court house; at an annual rental of forty dollars.

June 15, 1821. It is recorded that a final settlement was made with John B. Bently, respecting the building and completing of the new jail in the town of Circleville. This stood on what is now lot number four hundred and forty-two, on Franklin street, and was occupied until the completion of the jail beneath the present court house, when it was torn down.

The first building erected for the especial use of Pickaway county as a court house, stood in the street, at the crossing of East and West and North and South Main streets. It was constructed of brick, at an early day, and was torn down in about 1840. The building was octagonal in form, and surmounted with a tower in the center.

The present commodious court house, located on the corner of Court and Franklin streets, was begun in the year 1845, and completed in the fall of 1847. It is in size fifty-five feet in width by one hundred and five feet in length, surmounted by a tower, in which is the town clock. The building cost, entire, about forty-five thousand dollars. N. B. Kelley, of Columbus, was the architect, and also superintendent of construction.

COUNTY INFIRMARIES.

April 11, 1831. The county commissioners purchased of Joshua Folsom and wife thirty-six acres of land, in section nineteen, township eleven and range twenty-one, Worthington's survey, for the purpose of a poor farm, paying therefor one thousand eight hundred dollars. Upon this suitable buildings were erected. This property was occupied for some years, but, not being conveniently located for the purpose, was eventually sold, and, for a time, the county was without an infirmary, and its poor were cared for by private individuals. The first meeting of the directors was held April 18, 1831, when there were present: George W. Doan, Andrew Huston, Joseph Olds, Robert Campbell and James R. Hulse. George W. Doan was elected president, and Andrew Huston, secretary, of the board.

August 6th, 1866, the county commissioners purchased a second poor farm, of Lewis and Susan H. Lutz, consisting of about one hundred and eighty acres of land, in section number six, in township number ten, range twenty-one, for which the sum of eighteen thousand and ninety dollars was paid. These lands were not occupied for the purpose for which they were purchased, and were disposed of on the eleventh of March, 1869, for a trifle more than was originally paid for the property. This farm was purchased agreeably to a vote of the citizens of the county.

September 8, 1868, the present county farm was purchased of Christopher F. and Magdalena Brandstatt. It consists of two hundred and fifty-six acres of land in section number fourteen, township number eleven, range number twenty-one, Worthington's survey, and cost eighteen thousand dollars. The present elegant infirmary building, one of the finest in the State, was completed in the summer of 1873, and cost, entire, about one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars. The gentlemen who have filled the office of infirmary director are: Henry C. Blacker, Solomon Reigle, David Terwilliger, Samuel S. Winstead, W. E. Bolin, Daniel E. Hosford, George Dungan and William Dick, the last three of whom are the present incumbents.

John Morris, jr., has been superintendent from the opening of the institution until the present. The number of inmates in March, 1879, was one hundred and seventy-four Directors were first elected at the annual State election in 1842. They consisted of, George Frankenberg for one year, Augustus S. Decker for two years, and Robert Riorden for three years, who continued in office, by re-election, until 1848, when John Walton succeeded Riorden. 1849, S. D. Preston and Arthur O'Harra; 1852, Amos L. Ramsey; 1853, Rufus Main; 1854, Orin Backus; 1855, L. J. Moeller; 1856, John Lysle; 1857, William Aston; 1859, James Legg; 1860, Moeller resigned and John Greenleaf was appointed. The same year Newton Gibbons and Philemon Hess were elected. 1862, Fred Beck; 1867, Jacob Grau; 1868, Fred Fornoff; 1869, Henry L. Siebert; 1870, W. H. Gaver; 1871, John Schneider; 1872, John H. Earhart; 1873, W. H. Gaver; 1874, John Schneider; 1875, John H. Earhart; 1876, W. H. Gaver; 1877, James Burns; 1878, John H. Earhart. The last three names are those of the present incumbents.

SUPERINTENDENTS OF INFIRMARY.

Robert Cloud, appointed in 1832 (resigned), was succeeded by William King, who remained in charge until October, 1837. He was succeeded by Edward Heddon. 1844, Dr. C. F. Schenck; 1851, Joseph McElvain; 1852, Charles Jucksch; 1853, Joseph McElvain; 1854, Daniel Evans; 1857, Dr. L. J. Moeller; 1860, S. P. McElvain; 1869, J. J. Fanston; 1871, S. P. McElvain.

INFIRMARY PHYSICIANS.

Drs. C. F. Schenck, L. J. Moeller, C. E. Denig, C. E. Boyle, Norman Gay, Starling Loring, John Dawson, C. H. W. Mahlmann, Van S. Seltzer, W. H. Drury.

CORONERS.

1805, Joseph Dixon; 1807, William Domigan; 1815, Townsend Nichols; 1817, Thomas Kincaid; 1818, Robert Brotherton; 1819, William Richardson; 1821, Adam Brotherlin; 1825, Jacob Ebey; 1830, Jonathan Neereamer; 1835, George Jeffries; 1839, James Walcutt; 1843, A. W. Reader; 1845, Horton Howard; 1849, A. W. Reader; 1851, James W. Barbee; 1853, A. W. Reader; 1855, Elias Gaver; 1869, Patrick Eagan, who is the present incumbent.

PICKAWAY COUNTY OFFICERS

PRESIDENT JUDGES.

1811, John Thompson; 1820, John A. McDowell; 1823, Gustavus Swan; 1829, Frederick Grimke; 1836, John H. Keith; 1850, H. C. Whitman; 1852, James L. Bates; 1859, Robert M. Briggs, Alfred S. Dickey; 1864, James L. Bates; 1867, John L. Green; 1868, an additional judge was ordered, and Joseph Olds was elected. The present judge is S. W. Courtwright, who was elected in 1875.

ASSOCIATE JUDGES.

1811, William Seymour, Thomas Barr and Jacob Shoemaker; 1825, William Florence and David Kinnear; 1830, Thomas Renick; 1831, Samuel Lybrand; 1838, John Entrekin, William McArthur and George Tallman; 1842, William Gill; 1845, William B. Thrall and John E. Vanmeter; 1847, Matthew McCrea and W. W. Bierce; 1849, Jacob D. Lutz. The last three named gentlemen continued in office until it was abolished by the adoption or the new constitution in 1852.

CLERKS OF THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

James Denny was appointed to this office, at a special court, holden April 6, 1810, by William Seymour, Thomas Barr and Jacob Shoemaker, associate judges. He was succeeded, in 1816, by Andrew Huston, who served until 1830, when Samuel S. Denny was appointed for seven years, who resigned in 1831, and Andrew Huston was appointed to fill vacancy. 1835, William P. Darst; 1842, William McColloch; 1845. Samuel A. Moore; 1851, Silas J. Ambrose, who died in office, June 1, 1854. Henry W. Warner was appointed to fill vacancy occasioned by the death of Ambrose. He resigned June 7, 1854, and C. C. Neibling was appointed to fill vacancy. He was succeeded, in 1855, by Daniel W. McPherson. 1858, Jacob J. Schryver; 1864, Oscar Ormsby; 1867, Palmer Lowe; 1873, Robert C. Peebles, who died November 14, 1878, and Fenley E. Dyas was appointed. Peter W. Brown, the present incumbent, assumed the duties on February 10, 1879.

PROSECUTING ATTORNEYS

The first to occupy this office was Richard Douglass, who was succeeded by R. Osborn in 1813; 1816, Joshua Folsom; 1820, Joseph Olds; 1824, Gerry W. Doane; 1826, Caleb Atwater; 1828, Joshua Folsom; 1832, John L. Green; 1838, Henry N. Hedges, sr.; 1840, Joseph H. Geiger; 1841, Joseph Olds; 1842, Milton C. Canfield; 1844, John C. Groom; 1845, James Green; 1847, Jonathan Renick; 1852, Julius L. Wyman; 1854, Henry N. Hedges, sr.; 1856, Palmer C. Smith; 1858, Joseph Olds; 1862, Lewis H. Bond; 1864, C. B. Mason; 1866, Joseph Olds; 1868, Samuel W. Courtright; 1872, Isaac N. Abernathy; 1876, Charles J. Delaplane, who is the present incumbent.

PROBATE JUDGES.

This office was created by the new constitution of the State of Ohio, adopted in the fall of 1852.

The first incumbent to this office was W. W. Bierce, who resigned, and Seymour G. Renick was appointed, and served until 1857, when Fred Cogswell was elected; 1863, John Walke; 1866, William C. Finkel; 1873, James Taylor, who died in office, and William C. Finkel was appointed, August 24, 1874; he was succeeded the subsequent October, by John Walke; 1876, Henry N. Hedges, sr., who is the present incumbent.

COMMISSIONERS.

David Kinnear, Peter Apple and Jonathan Holmes were the first commissioners of Pickaway county, elected as per section three of the act creating the township; David Kinnear was appointed clerk; 1811, William Florence commissioner, vice Peter Apple; David Kinnear clerk; 1814, Dan. Ludwig; 1817, Charles Cade; 1820, James Bell; 1821, Joseph Hedges; 1824, William King and David Leist; 1825, Adam Nigh; 1827, James Moore; 1828, Joseph Hays; 1829, David Leist; 1830, Daniel Dresbach and John Boggs; 1831, Isaac Radcliff and Jacob Zieger; 1832, John Mills; 1833, Daniel Dresbach; 1834, Jacob Lindsey and Jeremiah Brown; 1836, David Leist; 1837, Robert Reid; 1838, Peter Miller and Joseph Hays; 1839, Elliott Halstead and Henry Reedy; 1840, Peter Miller; 1841, Elliott Hallstead; 1842, James Porter; 1843, Jacob D. Lutz and S. R. Dawson; 1844, Nathan Denny; 1845, Nelson Crouse; 1846, Noble Porter and Benjamin F. Renick; 1848, Ezekial Morris; 1849, Joseph Hurst; 1850, John Yates; 1851, Ezekial Morris; 1852, John Boggs, jr.; 1853, John Crow; 1854, Ezekial Morris; 1855, John Walker; 1856, Z. N. Morgan; 1857, John Crow; 1858, John Morris; 1859, Jacob Hitler; 1860, William Fleming; 1861, C. F. Machir; 1862, James Reber; 1863, Joseph Hedges and Wm. J. Cochran; 1864, Samuel Strouse; 1865, C. F. Machir; 1866, Horace Keyes; 1868, Samuel Strouse; 1869, John Ruth; 1870, Horace Keyes. 1871, William Doane; 1872, John Ruth; 1873, Jackson Thomas; 1874, Jackson Hoover; 1875, J. S. Neff; 1876, Jackson Thomas; 1877, Jackson Hoover; 1878, J. S. Neff; 1879, Daniel Ludwig.

AUDITORS.

David Kinnear was, in 1810, appointed clerk for the commissioners; 1820, George Wolfly. June 4, 1821, David Kinnear, having resigned the office of commissioner, was appointed auditor for Pickaway county, and elected to the same office the following October. 1825, Samuel S. Denny; 1827, William McArthur; 1829, Joseph Hedges; 1834, Nelson Franklin; 1837, Thomas W. Morris, who deceased, and Thornton T. Vanmeter was appointed, July 28, 1840. He was succeeded, the subsequent fall, by Henry N. Hedges, jr. 1848, William M. McColloch, deceased, and Hiram Belson appointed, 1849. 1851, George Hetherington; 1855, Benjamin Bowman; 1859, Orsamus E. Niles; 1861, Conrad F. Bitzer; 1865, William Bowman; 1869, Edwin E. Winship; 1874, Henry B. Morris; 1878, Frank M. Shulze, present incumbent; M. A. Sweetman, deputy auditor.

TREASURERS.

Henry Nevill was appointed to this office, by the county commissioners, April 26, 1810. He was succeeded by Peter Apple, in 1811. The following are the succession until the present: 1816, John Ludwig; 1828, John Ely; 1831, William McCulloch; 1833, William McArthur; 1837, S. Diffenderfer; 1839, Nelson Franklin; 1841, John Denny (deceased); 1842, Hiram Belson; 1849, Thomas Campbell; 1853, William C. Taylor was appointed to fill vacancy, vice Campbell, deceased; 1853, John B. Moore, who deceased, and, January 10, 1857, William Doane appointed to fill vacancy, elected the previous October; 1860, James Dawson; 1864, Robert Morrow; 1868, Peter Huber; 1872, James Harsha; 1876, John L. Scall, present incumbent.

RECORDERS.

The first recorder of Pickaway county was William H. Puthuff, who was appointed April 6, 1810, by the associate judges of the county. 1813, Johnson Hunter; 1819, John Ely; 1823, George Wolfly; 1824, Joseph Kinnear; 1831, William McArthur; 1834, Daniel Dresbach, who died in 1850, on October 1st, of which year, Amos C. Bright was appointed to fill the vacancy. In the fall of 1851, Adam Kinney was elected; 1854, John Schleich; 1857, Jacob Firor; 1863, J. Wesley Rice; 1866, Terence C. Lynch, deceased, and, on January 28, 1875, Josiah B. Valentine was appointed to fill the vacancy. He was elected to the office the subsequent fall, and is the present incumbent.

The first act of the recorder was the entering upon the record (book A, pages 1 and 2), of a conveyance by Henry Massie and Helen, his wife, to George Renick (all of Ross county), a tract of land lying on the upper side of Darby creek, in Pickaway county, containing eight hundred acres, the consideration for which was two thousand dollars; which instrument was acknowledged before John G. McCan, justice of the peace. This land was situated in Jackson township.

SHERIFFS.

James Renick was appointed to this office, and gave bond to the county commissioners, April 21, 1810, in the sum of four thousand dollars. 1814, Samuel Lybrand; 1816, Charles Botkin; 1820, Francis Kinnear; 1825, Joseph Hedges; 1828, John Shoup; 1832, Jonathan Ellis; 1834, Augustus L. Perrill; 1836, M. H. Alkire; 1840, Jerome Wolfly; 1844, M. H. Alkire; 1848, Henry H. Howard, (died of cholera); 1850, John Boyer; 1854, Jacob H. Carper; 1858, Andrew Poulson; 1860, Patrick H. Delaplane; 1864, Wm. E. Bolin; 1868, Caleb Hall; 1872, Isaac M. Griest; 1876, Charles F. Hartmeyer, who is the present incumbent.

CORONERS.

John McNeal, first incumbent to this office, gave bond April 21, 1810. He was succeeded, in 1817, by John Ely. 1818, John Ludwig. The records are so imperfect of this office that we are unable to give the regular succession. We, however, find that the following have filled the office of coroner: John Irwin, John Hedges, Eleazur Kirkbride, Henry H. Howard, John Boyer, H. Dayton, George Hammel, W. H. Sturgeon, Jacob A. Long, Rollin Fletcher, and Jason Case, the present incumbent, who was elected the fall of 1875.

SURVEYORS.

The records of this office are also imperfect. Following are the names of such incumbents as we are able to procure: Jacob W. Burget, Samuel Lutz, Samuel and Daniel Kinnear, Philo N. White, Henry Gilbreathe, James Keyes, L. H. Sweetman and W. C. Rowe.

COUNTY ASSESSORS AND COLLECTORS.

April 26, 1810, Samuel Lybrand was appointed to this office; 1814, Asahel Heath; 1815, John Levell; 1817, Charles Botkin; 1818, Francis Kinnear; 1819, John Levill; 1821, Aaron Sullevan; 1824, William King appointed, refused to act, and Peter Lutz was appointed to fill vacancy; 1825, Thomas Renick; 1827, John T. Davenport; 1831, James Moore; 1837, William Littleton; 1840, Jacob D. Lutz.

CHAPTER XI.

EARLY MAILS AND STAGES.

For eight or ten years after the settlements were begun in Franklin and Pickaway counties, there was no post-office nearer than Chillicothe. It was a common thing for the people of Franklinton to raise means, by contributions, to send a man fifty miles to the post-office to mail their letters, and bring back those that might be in the office.

The first mail carrier between Chillicothe and Franklinton was Andrew McElvain, who, when a boy, emigrated with his father from Kentucky, in the year 1797. He was employed, when thirteen years old, as mail messenger, by Adam Hosack, who was the contractor and postmaster. This was in 1805. The route was upon the west side of the Scioto. Mail matter was sent weekly. The carrier left Franklinton Friday, stayed over night at Markley's mill, on Darby creek, and the next day reached Chillicothe, and returned as far as Darby creek. Sunday night he reached Franklinton. When the route was first established there was no post-office between Chillicothe and Franklinton, but, during the first winter, there was one established at Westfall, and, later, at Markley's mill. Sometime after this, a mail came directly from the east to Columbus. After the Cumberland road had been constructed, travel, which, up to that time, had been by the way of Wheeling, Lancaster and Chillicothe, to Limestone, upon Zane's trace, cut by order of Congress, in 1796, was diverted to Columbus, and lines of stage coaches began to bring mails and passengers with more frequency and rapidity.

During the administration of John McLene as postmaster general, and about the year 1825, William Neil, then cashier in the Franklin national bank, of Columbus, became a mail contractor and stage proprietor, having as chief associate his brother, Robert, who is still living in Columbus. Out of this firm grew the Ohio Stage company, which continued for a number of years in active existence, and did a large business. After its dissolution, the firm of Neil, Moore & Company was formed, which, for a term of about twenty years, beginning early in the thirties, was the most extensive company of mail contractors and stage proprietors in the western country, and, perhaps, in the United States. This firm carried mail and ran stages over all the leading roads in Ohio, including that from Cincinnati to Wheeling, and points as far east as Erie and Buffalo. Lines were also extended north to Detroit, and west to Indianapolis, and, perhaps, even farther. The general result of the operations of this company was that of making Columbus the center of the stage and mail system for Ohio, western New York and the States of the great northwest. The company was very prosperous. The business was under the almost constant management of William Neil until 1846, or the following year, he being the chief owner. About the year above designated, Mr. Neil retired from the company, transferring his interest to his children, who, in conjunction with others, continued the business until the stage coach was superseded by the railroad.

Associated with Mr. Neil were a number of prominent business men, among them being William S. Sullivant and David W. Deshler, who, for a number of years, was cashier and president of the Clinton, and other banks of Columbus.

Mr. Neil, the proprietor of the immense stage system by which, for a long term of years, a great many travelers were brought into and through Columbus from all parts of the country, was a Kentuckian by birth, and came to Ohio in 1812, settling at Urbana. About 1816 he removed to Columbus, with which city he has been prominently identified, contributing as much as, and possibly more than, any other citizen, towards laying the firm foundation of its future growth. Beside the organization and management of the extensive stage business, he had much to do with all of the leading railroads that centered in Columbus, thus being one of the pioneers in the establishment of two successive and successful means of communication. He was a man of extraordinary enterprise, rare judgment, indomitable energy, and iron will.

The time made by the stages in 1837, was forty-nine and a half hours from Columbus to Wheeling, and twenty-four and a half hours from Columbus to Cincinnati. The horse express was put upon the road between Frederickston, Maryland, and Cincinnati on July, 1, 1837, and brought to the West special mails from New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore. Each day and evening, at the hours for the arrival of the express mail, the people of Columbus gathered at their doors to see the fine blooded horses, ridden by boys, go through the streets on a run.*

From the same authority on which the above statement is based, we learn that the inaugral address of President Polk, delivered March 4, 1845, was carried from Columbus to Cincinnati, by a special express provided by Neil, Moore & Company, the Voohes Brothers, and Peter Campbell, in the surprisingly short time of nine and a half hours; the whole time from Washingington to Cincinnati being forty-two hours. No faster mail time was ever made in Ohio than this, until the steam horse came into use. The horses made an average of eleven and a half miles per hour.

The stage line down the Scioto valley remained in operation until 1877, when it was outstripped by the railway. It was, at the time of its discontinuance, the longest stage line in the State of Ohio—a lingering relic of the bygone age, and the older travelers, who rode, in later years, in its comfortable carriages over the excellent turnpike, were carried back, in their recollections, to the era when such was the common mode of journeying. This stage line was always a great source of convenience to the people of Portsmouth, Chillicothe, Circleville and the smaller villages along the route, and to the business man or visitor who wished to reach those places, or Columbus. It was well patronized, and a source of profit to its several owners. The facts of its early history we have been unable to obtain. Colonel John Madeira, of Chillicothe, was the original owner, and he sold out to Darius Tallmadge, of Lancaster, who superintended the business for several years.

In April, 1830, Dr. M. G. Krieder and Col. J. A. Hawkes purchased the Columbus and Portsmouth stage line of Mr. Tallmadge. They ran stages daily, as was required by the post-office department, and carried seven mails a week. After two years of earnest solicitation by the proprietors, the postmaster general consented to the discontinuance of the Sunday mail. The trip was then abandoned, and one day given to rest, and the fact developed itself that horses could do more work in six days than in seven, and remain in better condition. Dr. Krieder died in 1854. Some time prior to his death, Colonel Hawkes purchased his (Krieder's) interest, and associated with himself Dr. W. B. Hawkes. In 1855 the managers commenced running two stages a day between Columbus and Chillicothe, and increased their stock to one hundred horses. Branch lines, or "feeders," were established, and omnibuses were brought into use at Columbus, Circleville and Chillicothe. The line continued under the same management, that of Colonel Hawkes, from the time of his purchase (1858) until 1877. During these twenty-seven years' operations, the amount of corn consumed by the horses was three hundred and sixty thousand bushels, and the amount of hay, twelve thousand tons. The total expenditures reached the enormous sum of one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and there were carried over one million two hundred thousand passengers, no one of whom ever met with any injury.

* Henry C. Noble, esq., Historical Address.

CHAPTER XII.

THE OHIO CANAL.

It was in 1820 that public opinion first began to be stirred upon the necessity of a permanent water communication between the Ohio river and Lake Erie. Although an act relating to the subject of a canal had been passed by the general assembly two years before, and private individuals had endeavored to get charters for companies, there had been no general movement for the accomplishment of this purpose, and it was not until the fall of 1821 that the first step was taken in the series that really led to the construction of the Ohio canal. At that time, Micajah T. Williams, of Cincinnati, who had been reelected, by the people of Hamilton county, to a seat in the house of representatives, began to sound the minds of members upon the subject of the improvement we have under consideration; and, in the following December, he introduced a resolution, which provided for the careful consideration of so much of the governor's message as related to canals. The resolution was passed, and Messrs. Williams, Howe, Thomas Worthington, W. H. Moore, and John Shelby, were appointed the committee. The members of this committee attended strictly to their duty, and Mr. Williams, as its chairman, in January, 1822, presented an elaborate report, recommending the passage of a law authorizing an examination into the practicability of connecting the river and lake by a canal. Immediately after the reading of the report, Mr. Williams introduced a bill, which finally, after much opposition, passed the house and the senate, and became a law on the thirty-first of December, 1822. The commissioners named in the act were Benjamin Tappan, Alfred Kelly, Thomas Worthington, Ethan A. Brown, Jeremiah Morrow, Isaac Minor, and Ebenezer Buckingham, jr. Jeremiah Morrow, having been elected governor of the State, resigned his position upon the board, and Micajah T. Williams was appointed to his place. This board appointed the acting commissioners and the engineers. The commissioners at first employed Hon. James Geddes, of Onondaga, New York, who arrived in Columbus in June, 1822, having already made an examination of the Cuyahoga summit. In the following spring and summer Mr. Geddes surveyed a distance of nine hundred miles, being assisted by Samuel Forror, and by the commissioners themselves. They continued the examination of canal routes during 1823, and the following year, and early in 1825, determined upon the route commencing at Cleveland, and ending at Portsmouth, on the Ohio river. They also determined on making a canal from Cincinnati to Dayton. In the meantime a board of canal fund commissioners had been created by law, and money had been borrowed, in New York city, in sufficient quantity to carry on the work of excavation for the first year. Messrs. Kelley and Williams were appointed acting commissioners, and David S. Bates, of Rochester, New York, as chief engineer.

On the 8th of June, 1825, a public meeting of citizens, from various parts of the State, was held in Columbus, to adopt means for celebrating, with appropriate ceremonies, the commencement of constructing the Ohio canal. At this meeting Governor Morrow presided, and James K. Corry was secretary. A committee of arrangements was appointed, consisting of John C. Wright, of Jefferson county; Abram J. McDowell, of Franklin; Duncan McArthur, of Ross; Alexander Holmes, of Licking; Willis Silliman, of Muskingum; John Barr, of Pickaway; Daniel Shorton, of Knox; Charles C. Hood, of Perry; Adam Johnston, of Coshocton, and William W. Irvin, of Fairfield. The committee fixed upon the fourth of July as the time, and the Licking summit as the place, for the great demonstration. They also designated Thomas Ewing as the orator, the Rev. Ahab Jenks as the Chaplain, and General Adam Johnson and Colonels Sam F. McCracken and Abram J. McDowell as marshals for the occasion. Invitations were exteded to, and accepted by, Governor Clinton, General VanRensaellaer, and Messrs. Lord and Rathburn, of New York. The arrangements were made in a very satisfactory manner.

On the fourth of July, 1825, Jewett Clinton broke ground on the Licking summit, beginning the great work of connecting the Ohio with Lake Erie. The place was about four miles west of Newark. The day was fine, a good omen for the success of the mighty undertaking, and the large concourse of people were in most enthusiastic spirits. Governor Clinton, Governor Morrow, the several aids of each, who were present, and the State officers, went to the summit, and each and every one removed a few shovelfuls of earth. After this ceremony was performed, the Hon. Thomas Ewing delivered an address to Governor Clinton and the people. Governor Clinton responded in glowing terms, predicting a glorious future for Ohio, and was frequently interrupted by loud outbursts of applause. When he had concluded speaking there was a general and spontaneous expression of the enthusiasm of the people, and "one hundred guns told the people that the Ohio canal was begun." So great and overcoming were the demonstrations of respect and gratitude, and so overpowering the applause, that Governor Clinton, it is said, wept. A dinner was served in the shade of the spreading beech trees that surrounded the little clearing that had been made for the celebration of the day, and toasts were drunk and many fine things said. "When Governor Clinton's health was drunk, all the guns were fired, and the small arms too." Thus was the Ohio canal auspiciously commenced. The vast work begun in 1825, was not finished until 1832, and it cost over five millions. It has a minimum breadth of forty feet at water line, and twenty-six at the bottom, with a depth of four feet of water. In many places it exceeds these measurements. The walls of the locks are of solid masonry, which, as well as the culverts, are of fine construction and great solidity. The length of the main line is three hundred and seven miles. It has a navigable feeder of fourteen miles to Zanesville, one of eleven miles to Columbus, one of nine miles to Lancaster, one of fifty miles to Athens, the Waldhonaig branch of twenty-three miles, besides other short branches.

Chief Justice Chase, in his history of Ohio, says: "The effect of these improvements on the prosperity of the State cannot be developed in a few sentences. They have afforded the farmer of the interior an easy access to market, and have enhanced the value of his farm and his productions. They have facilitated intercourse between different sections of the State, and have thus made the people more united, as well as prosperous. They have furnished to the people a common object of generous satisfaction. They have attracted a large accession of population and capital. And they have made the name of the State of Ohio well known throughout the civilized world as a name and character of which her sons may be justly proud." Although Governor Clinton's predictions as to the profitableness of the Ohio canal were not fulfilled, the improvement undoubtedly paid the people of Ohio well for their investment. An effect worthy of mention in connection with this subject and, indeed, directly connected with it, is the change wrought in the policy of the State by the creation of the public debt. This was caused and compelled by the construction of the canals. A complete revision of the system of taxation in Ohio resulted.

Before passing from this subject we must allude to those occurrences in the history of the Ohio canal which were of great interest to the people of Columbus and Circleville and their vicinities. Work upon the branch, or feeder, from Lockbourne to Columbus, known as "the Columbus side cut," was commenced on the thirtieth day of April, 1827, with marked ceremony. In the afternoon of that day the people of Columbus assembled at the State house. A procession was formed, consisting of several military companies, and the State officers, and marshalled by Colonels McDowell and McElvain, marched to the river. A short address was delivered by Judge Joseph R. Swan. General McLene, the then secretary of state, and Nathaniel McLean, keeper of the penitentiary, removed the first shovelfuls of earth, and it was wheeled from the ground by R. Osborne, auditor of State, and H. Brown, State treasurer, while the people loudly applauded. A lunch was afterwards served by C. Heyl, on the brow of the hill, a few yards north of the penitentiary square. Among the toasts drank was this:

"The Ohio Canal—the great artery which will carry vitality to the extensive cities of the Union."

The heaviest jobs were the dam across the Scioto and the Columbus locks, the four-mile locks and the locks at Lockbourne. The first mile from the river was excavated by penitentiary convicts, who worked under guard, and many of them received remitments of their sentences for their faithful labor.

But little advancement was made until 1829, when Nathaniel Medbury and John Field took charge of the work, and pushed it ahead with all of the rapidity possible, and consistent, with thoroughness. It was finished in September, 1831, and upon the twenty-third of that month the first canal boat, "Governor Brown," with a number of leading citizens of Pickaway county on board, arrived from Circleville. The people of Columbus, in large numbers, visited the boat, exchanged greetings with the passengers, and expressed much interest in the new means of communication opened up between the two towns. The arrival of the boat was considered quite an event. It was the beginning of what proved to be a large and long-continued commerce.

Two or three days after the arrival of the first boat, the boats "Cincinnati" and the "Red Rover," both from the lake, by the way of Newark, entered the Columbus side-cut, where they were met by a committee appointed for the purpose. A national salute of twenty-four guns was fired, and then, while the Columbus band was playing its most inspiring airs, the boats proceeded to a point just below the national road bridge. Arrived there, an address was delivered by Colonel Doherty. A procession was then formed, and the whole company, going to Mr. Ridgway's warehouse, partook of a collation prepared by Mr. John Young. A third boat arrived not long after, and was given a similar salute and welcome. On the following day, the boats, having discharged their cargoes, took their departure for Cleveland, under ceremonies similar to those that had been observed on their arrival. Many ladies and gentlemen were passengers as far as the four-mile locks. There they met the "Chillicothe" and "George Baker," upon which they returned home. The canal branch to Columbus, from Lockbourne, cost, including the dam across the Scioto, about fifty-five thousand dollars.

About the twenty-fourth of May, 1828, came a crisis, says the Herald, on the issue of which depended the fortune, or the fate, of Circleville. The location of the Ohio canal past the town was then to be made. A variety of routes had been suggested, and all save three rejected. The location of the aqueduct necessarily carried with it the location of the canal for some distance adjoining, at each end, and three points were proposed for its site, viz: Keffer's point, below the mouth of Darby and above Hargus creek; the Circleville point, where the aqueduct now stretches across the Scioto, and a point just below the mouth of Yellow Bud. The contest narrowed down to a rivalry between the Keffer's point location and Circleville, with the advantage in favor of the former; for by that route the canal would cost seven thousand dollars less than by the Circleville way. The location was to be fixed, and the line placed under contract, in less than one week. It was a question of life or death to Circleville, and the fate of Westfall, Livingston and Jefferson—towns of some note when Circleville was laid out, but now cultivated fields—also hung upon the decision of location. Should the canal cross at Keffer's, it was apparent that its proximity to Circleville would be just sufficient to prove fatal to the interests of the town, and too remote to secure to it any advantages. The odds of seven thousand dollars against the town, it was decided, must be overcome. Messrs. Kelley and Williams, the acting commissioners of the canal, proposed that if the citizens of Circleville would raise one-half of the amount of the extra cost, they should have the location. This was a large sum, to be raised in a place of the then size of Circleville, but the people took hold of it with a will, and in less than a week the Herald was enabled to announce the success of the project, with an enthusiastic "ALL HAIL!" On the thirtieth of May the construction of so much of the canal as lay between Circleville and the Deer creek crossing, was put under contract.

That portion of the canal passing through Franklin, Pickaway, Ross, Scioto and Pike counties, was of much more value to the people along its line, than some other sections of the Ohio canal. Its usefelness was not so soon supersceded by the railroad, and the amount of traffic was well kept up until the building of the Scioto Valley railroad.

CHAPTER XIII.

FRANKLIN AND PICKAWAY TURNPIKES.

THE Columbus and Portsmouth turnpike is a thoroughfare that has been of vast accommodation and use to all the people along the Scioto valley. It is, all the way from Columbus to Portsmouth, a good gravel roadway.

The great expense of the turnpike roads made it impossible to construct them after the repeal of the law by which the State became a stockholder of one-half of the whole property, that is subscribing as much as all others combined. The Cumberland, or National road, which was built as far as Columbus about 1836, was made of stone, set upon edge, was perfectly straight, and thoroughly graded. The culverts were all of cut stone. This road cost about fifteen thousand dollars per mile. The road built about 1840, from the east to the west side of Pickaway county, cost five thousand dollars per mile. When the Columbus and Portsmouth turnpike was incorporated, a sufficient sum of money to build it upon the old plan could not be raised by subscription. William Renick, of Circleville, proposed a different plan—one much cheaper, but good enough for all practical purposes. The road was constructed, after long delay, upon the plan suggested and urged by him, and was the first of the kind in the State of Ohio, or west of the Alleghenies. Mr. Renick proposed that clean, unscreened gravel should be laid down on the line of the old road, except where it was necessary to straighten it, the gravel to be put on to the depth of four to six inches at each covering, until the road was covered with ten or twelve inches of gravel, each covering to be well packed and smoothed before the next was put on. He insisted that an ordinarily good road could be built on this plan at an expense not to exceed one thousand, two hundred dollars per mile, not equal to the perfectly constructed Macadam road, but such a road as would give all the advantages of the same, and with a little attention in repairs, would be kept so. Mr. Renick found no one to agree with him. In fact, the directors of the road deemed his plan so chimerical, that, during his absence east, they let the grading of ten miles of the road to a Mr. Robinson, who was a practical road-maker, on the old plan. On Mr. Renick's return home he so discouraged Mr. Robinson about his ever being paid for a road of that character, that he, Robinson, threw up his contract, although he had been at work on the road for a week or more, with considerable force. The directors then re-let the road to Mr. Robinson to grade, gravel and finish, for the same price per rod that the grading alone had been contracted for. Thus, the directors were compelled to adopt essentially the plan proposed by Mr. Renick. There was no help for it; there could not be money enough raised to make a more expensive road. Much comment, quizzing and unfavorable criticism was made during the progress. In fact, Mr. Goodman, who was deeply interested in the road, acknowledged that, at times, he felt ashamed of their road. In time, several sections were finished and put into use. The experiment was a success. The road became sooner packed, was less rough, and constructed at a cost not exceeding one thousand, two hundred dollars per mile, bridges included. The road from Circleville to Chillicothe was thus completed, and Mr. Robinson, the contractor, spent his life in building roads of the same character in other sections of Ohio.

The company was incorporated by an act of the general assembly of the State, passed February 7, 1831, and Samuel M. Tracy, William Kendall, Ezra Osborn, John Peebles, Nathan R. Clough and John Noel, of Scioto, county; John J. Vanmeter, James B. Turner, William Blackstone and Robert Lucas, of Pike county; James F. Worthington, David Crouse, Thomas J. McArthur, Thomas James, George Renick and Anthony Walhe, of Ross county; Andrew Huston, G. W. Doan, George Crook and John Cockran, of Pickaway county, and Joseph Ridgeway, Lincoln Goodale, Samuel Parnus, Robert W. McCoy and Joel Buttles, of Franklin county, were the commissioners named in said act. The said act was revised and amended several times before the completion of the road, and said road was built through this county in 1849 and 1850. The company divided the road into sections, or divisions, and these sections had their boards of directors, collected their tolls, kept up the repairs, and made dividends.

From Columbus to the intersection with the Zanesville and Marysville turnpike, five miles north of Chillicothe, constitutes the northern division, and of this Dr. M. Brown has been president since 1848.

OTHER TURNPIKES IN PICKAWAY COUNTY.*

The Circleville and Washington turnpike caused, when it was constructed, a great stir. Intelligence of the passage of the bill incorporating the Circleville and Washington Turnpike Company was received on February 25, 1839, at sunset, as is shown by the old Circleville Herald, and in half an hour after, the paper continues, the court house was brilliantly illuminated, and some six hundred citizens met spontaneously, to exchange congratulations on that event. The town council met in special session, and adopted resolutions felicitating their constituents. The required amount of stock having been procured, and notice given, the company was fully organized, on the eighteenth of May, by the election of John Leist, Philip B. Doddridge, Andrew Huston, Joseph Olds, W. B. Thrall, George Radcliffe and James Kirkpatrick as directors. This board subsequently appointed Joseph Olds president; George W. Doan, secretary, and Marcus Brown, treasurer.

The Circleville and Adelphi turnpike company was incorporated by an act of the general assembly of the State of Ohio, passed February 24, 1848, and the corporators named in the act were William Gill, Charles Shoemaker, Samuel Seals, Elias T. Leist, J. G. Doddridge, William P. Darst, N. S. Gregg and James Bell, of the county of Pickaway; and Samuel Hanniger, John Patterson and David Holderman, of the county of Ross. The capital stock was not to exceed thirty thousand dollars, divided into shares of ten dollars.

The first meeting of the corporators was held in the city of Circleville, May 8, 1848, at which time William P. Darst was chosen chairman, and T. C. Jones secretary. The first meeting of the stockholders, for the election of directors, was held at the Carlisle house, in Circleville, June 29, 1850, when William P. Darst, William Gill, P. B. Doddridge, T. C. Jones and Jacob D. Lutz were elected directors. The said directors subsequently organized by electing T. C. Jones president; S. A. Moore, secretary; and N. W. Doddridge, treasurer. Six miles of the road being completed, the board of directors, on the ninth day of December, 1851, appointed the first gate-keeper for the toll-gate near Circleville, and ordered tolls to be taken.

In 1853 and 1854 the road was extended to a point north of Adelphi, where the Salt Creek Valley turnpike begins. In 1855 the road was finished to Adelphi. The cost of building the entire road was over twenty thousand dollars, of which thirteen thousand, two hundred and twenty dollars were paid by subscriptions, in the form of stock, and the remainder with the money received as tolls.

The present directors are, James A. Hawkes, Daniel M. Pontious, Solomon Riegel, Robert Patterson and Samuel Lutz. The latter has held the office continuously since April 9, 1853. The present officers are, James A. Hawkes, president; Samuel Lutz, secretary; and J. A. Lutz, treasurer.

This turnpike has been a valuable improvement, as it affords an outlet, at all seasons of the year, for the produce of a large and fertile region of country. For a number of years J. A. Hawkes & Co. have run stages daily, carrying passengers and the mails between Circleville and Adelphi.

The Circleville, Darbyville and London turnpike company was incorporated by an act of the general assembly of the State of Ohio, passed March 14, 1849, and among the commissioners named were Nelson J. Turney, Samuel A. Campbell, Elias Florence, Felix Renick and Nelson Franklin. The first meeting of the stockholders was held at the National hall, in the city of Circleville, on the fifteenth day of May, 1856, at which the following directors were elected, viz.: Elias Florence, Thomas T. Renick, James R. Hulse, Nelson J. Turney and Samuel H. Ruggles.

On the seventeenth day of May, 1856, the directors elect met, and organized by electing Nelson J. Turney, president; Jonathan Renick, secretary; and John F. Jacobs, treasurer. Six miles of road was built by the company in 1856, and in 1865 it was extended to the village of Darbyville. From that place to London a fine turnpike was built in 1869. The capital stock is fourteen thousand, eight hundred and eighty dollars. The present board of directors consists of A. Hulse, L. E. Scovil, J. N. Renick, S. A. Moore and P. C. Smith. A. Hulse is president, and B. H. Moore, secretary and treasurer.

This road furnishes one of the principal outlets to market for the northwestern part of the county, and has paid four dividends on its stock.

The Circleville and Kingston turnpike company was incorporated by an act of the general assembly of the State of Ohio, passed prior to 1850, and the corporators named in the act were Jacob D. Lutz and others. The first meeting of the corporators was held August 6, 1851, when Jacob D. Lutz was chosen chairman, and T. C. Jones secretary. The first meeting of the stockholders, for the election of directors, was held March 27, 1852, at which time Jacob D. Lutz, Solomon Betz, Jacob Ludwig, Isaac E. Dresbach, and Samuel Evans, were elected directors. They organized the same day by electing Jacob D. Lutz, president; S. A. Moore, secretary; and Michael May, treasurer.

Five miles having been completed, tolls were ordered to be taken, April 1, 1853. In 1857 the road was finished to Kingston. The construction of the turnpike cost about twelve thousand dollars. Eleven thousand of this is represented by stock.

This road connected with the Zanesville and Maysville turnpike at Kingston, and was used by Hawkes & Co.'s stage line between Portsmouth and Columbus.

The present directors are M. E. Dresbach, Jacob Ludwig, Jacob Hitler, Henry Piper, and Thomas McGrady; and the officers are, M. E. Dresbach, president; J. D. Lutz, secretary; and Samuel H. Evans, treasurer.

The Zanesville and Maysville turnpike company was incorporated by an act passed March 7, 1836. Among the incorporators were Otis Ballard, John Herman, Thomas J. Winship, and John Entrekin, of Pickaway county. The first meeting of the corporators was held at Chillicothe, June 8, 1836, and John Entrekin was present. At this meeting the following persons were chosen to solicit subscriptions to the stock in Pickaway county: Henry May, sr., Thomas J. Winship, John Harman, Otis Ballard, Charles Shoemaker, James Black, Henry Haller, M. Taylor, John Shoemaker, and John Cox. The first board of directors was elected at Chillicothe, in 1838, but no member was chosen from Pickaway. Samuel F. McCracken was elected president. One treasurer was chosen for each county—Otis Ballard for Pickaway. In July, 1840, superintending committees were appointed for each county. That for Pickaway was composed of John A. Fulton, John A. Nye, John Augustus, and William Sill. In May, 1840, John A. Fulton, of Pickaway, was elected to the board of directors, and in 1842 J. Adams Nye was also chosen as a director. The company became disabled, through lack of funds, in 1842, and work upon the road was suspended. The affairs of the company subsequently passed through various conditions of good and ill, and finally, in 1852, passed into the hands of a new company. H. H. Hunter was elected president, and P. B. Ewing secretary. Otis Ballard became one of the directors, and held the position until his death.

*The facts in regard to the turnpikes in Pickaway county are almost entirely furnished by J. A. Lutz, esq.

The present officers of the company are, John D. Martin, president, and P. B. Ewing, secretary and treasurer.

The following is a list of free turnpikes in Pickaway county, and the date and cost of construction:

New Holland and Waterloo	1868	$23,280
New Holland and Clarksburg	1868	13,250
Deer Creek road	1869	19,700
Bloomfield and Darbyville	1869	——

TURNPIKES AND PLANK ROADS IN FRANKLIN COUNTY.

The principal turnpikes in Franklin county, other than Cumberland, or National road, and the Columbus and Portsmouth pike, are the Columbus and Sandusky, Columbus and Harrisburg, Columbus and Johnstown, Columbus and Sunbury, Columbus and Groveport, Cottage Mills and Harrisburg, and the Jackson and Franklin.

The first constructed, any part of which was in the county, was the Columbus and Sandusky pike. The Legislature, in 1823, passed an act incorporating a joint stock company for the construction of this road, consisting of the following men: John Kitbourne, Abram J. McDowell, Henry Brown, William Neil, Orange Johnson, Orris Parrish, and Robert Brotherton, of Franklin county, and nineteen others residing along the proposed line, in the vicinity of Delaware, Bucyrus and Sandusky. The capital was to be one hundred thousand dollars, and the company was authorized to increase it, if necessary, to twice that amount. It was divided into shares of one hundred dollars each. By an act of congress, passed in 1827, over thirty-one thousand acres of land were granted, in trust, for the use of the company. The company's charter required at least a width of eighteen feet of artificial road to be made, "composed of stone, gravel, wood, or other suitable material, well compacted together, in such manner as to secure a firm, substantial and even road, rising in the middle, with a gradual arch." Much trouble and hard feeling were caused by the different understandings of this clause of the charter. The company interpreted it to mean that a clay road could be constructed, and the general expectation of the public was, that in order to properly meet the requirements of the charter, the roadway must be composed of stone or gravel. The road was not finished until seven years after it was commenced. It was one hundred and six miles in length, and cost nearly seventy-five thousand dollars, a little over seven hundred dollars per mile. It was a clay or mud pike, not so good as the needs of the large travel demanded,—in wet seasons, in some places quite impassable. When completed, Nathaniel Merriam, who was appointed for that purpose by the governor, made an examination of the road, and reported that, in his opinion, it was constructed in accordance with the provisions of the legislative act. This report, however, did not make the actual condition of the road any better, in the eyes of the people who were obliged to travel upon it, and the disapprobation was occasionally made manifest by the tearing down of the toll gates. Much bitterness of feeling was created, and the trouble bid fair to be continued indefinitely, but in 1843 the legislature took hold of the matter, and on the 28th of February, of that year, an act was passed whereby the charter of the company was unconditionally repealed. Although this act made it unlawful to maintain the toll system upon the road, the toll-gates were kept up, and tolls collected, until 1845, when an act was passed establishing the road to be a public highway, and authorizing a State road to be surveyed and located, upon the bed of the clay turnpike, from Columbus to Sandusky. The company, relying upon the report of the examiner, which had been favorable to them, maintained that the acts of the legislature were unconstitutional, and numerous applications were made to succeeding legislatures for relief. They were unsuccessful, however, and the company, although trying by various means to secure its rights, failed to gain what it sought. The attorney general declared he thought a wrong had been done the company. At the session of 1856–7 a bill passed the senate to authorize the company to bring suit against the State, but it was lost in the house.

The Columbus and Worthington plank road, or turnpike company, was chartered by the legislature, March 23, 1849, to construct a plank road, or turnpike, from Columbus to Worthington, with the privilege of extending it to Delaware. The company consisted of Solomon Beers, John Phipps, John B. Piatt, Philip Fisher, Robert E. Neil, and others. The first directors were B. Comstock, William Neil and Alanson Bull. The company being authorized to construct a road upon any public highway, chose the old bed of the Columbus and Sandusky turnpike. The road was finished in 1850, and on the first of January, 1851, the first dividend was declared. The capital stock of the company was twenty-seven thousand, eight hundred and twenty-five dollars, with power to increase to fifty thousand dollars.

The Columbus and Harrisburgh turnpike was constructed in the years 1848 and 1849, by a company incorporated in 1847. The capital stock was twenty thousand, eight hundred and fifteen dollars, and the road cost thirty-five thousand, six hundred and two dollars, of which amount the county donated four thousand, five hundred dollars, to pay for the erection of the bridge over the Scioto. The company was left largely in debt, to the payment of which, a portion of the receipts of the road were devoted.

The Columbus and Johnstown turnpike was constructed in 1851, from Columbus to Walnut creek, opposite the village of Bridgeport. The company of incorporators consisted of Robert Neil, Windsor Atchison, George Ridenour, Jesse Baughman and Walter Thrall, with their associates.

The Columbus and Sunbury turnpike and plank road company was incorporated March 20, 1850, and constructed a road, diverging from the above about three miles northwest of Columbus, and extending to Central College. This road was made in 1852, and cost nearly seven thousand dollars. The incorporators of the company were William Trevitt, Christian Heyl, Peter Agler, James Park, George Wagler, John Dill, Peter Harlocker, Timothy Lee, W. G. Edmison, John Curtiss, E. Washburn and Stillman Tucker.

The Columbus and Granville turnpike, or, as it is commonly called, Brush's plank road, was made in 1852, from Columbus to Walnut creek, a distance of seven miles. The original members of the company were Jos. Ridgeway, Samuel Barr, Gates O'Harra, Wm. A. Platt and Samuel Brush. The fact that the last named gentleman was the first president of the company, and held that place for many years, was the cause of the road receiving its name.

The Columbus and Groveport turnpike company was incorporated by an act passed March 19, 1849, and consisted of William Harrison, Nathaniel Mesion, William H. Rarey, William Darnell, Edmund Stewart and William W. Kyle. About twelve thousand five hundred dollars' worth of stock was subscribed, and the road was completed in 1850, the cost exceeding that amount, and being paid out of the earnings of the road.

The Cottage Mills and Harrisburgh turnpike was made in 1852, and is about seven and a half miles in length. The incorporators were Adin G. Hibbs, Levi Strader, Solomon Borer, Isaac Miller and William Nuff, and their associates. The first board of directors were S. B. Davis, A. G. Hibbs, Isaac Miller, Levi Strader and Solomon Borer; and the contractor was A. Poulson.

The Franklin and Jackson turnpike was constructed from the Columbus and Harrisburgh pike down the river, to the Cottage Mills and Harrisburgh pike, a distance of ten miles, in 1852, at a cost of from seven to eight thousand dollars. The incorporators of the company were Samuel Landes, John Moler, Adam Miller, Jacob Huffman, John Stimmel, John Cherry, William L. Miner, Michael L. Sullivant and Gershum M. Peters.

The Columbus and Lockwin plank road, commencing at the intersection of the old harbor road with the Columbus and Johnstown turnpike, and extending seven miles, was constructed in 1853 and 1854, the cost being sixteen thousand, five hundred dollars—almost two thousand, four hundred dollars per mile. It was very strongly made, of plank eight feet long and three inches thick, and on four-inch stringers.

The Clinton and Bluden plank road company was organized under the general act passed in 1853, and in that and the following one the road was constructed. It runs from a point on the Lockwin road about four miles north of Columbus, and extends to the county line, half a mile north of Westerville, being a little over eight miles in length. The cost of construction was about sixteen thousand, six hundred dollars, or over two thousand dollars per mile.

CHAPTER XIV.

EARLY COMMERCE.*

MIGRATION to the territory embraced in Ohio commenced with considerable activity about 1799, and from the admission of Ohio as a State of the Union, it became extraordinarily active up to about 1807 or 1808, Virginia, Pennsylvania and Connecticut furnishing the greater amount of immigrants, though all of the States furnished representatives. Among them there was but few speculators in large locations of land; most came to secure a home in the fertile State, intending by their own labor to improve and enjoy it. There was comparatively little wealth in the hands of immigrants, and that little had to be expended in living, until the land should be cleared up and made productive. Many of the emigrants took boats on the Ohio, and in these they went down the river until they reached the Muskingum, the Hocking, the Scioto or Miami rivers, up which they worked their way to their intended location. Floating down the Ohio was comparatively easy, but pulling up the lateral streams was work indeed. Emigrants were not unfrequently delayed on the latter streams for want of sufficient depth of water.

The principal places where families and merchants stopped to prepare for embarkation were Brownsville, or Redstone, Pittsburgh and Wheeling. There were people in each of those places who made it their business to accommodate strangers descending the Ohio river, with any article that might be wanted, either provisions, farming utensils or boats, at a cheap and reasonable price. There were large boat-yards at each of these places, where boats were generally well made and strong. The price varied according to their make, length and strength; one, convenient for a family, between thirty and forty feet in length, cost from one dollar to one dollar and a quarter per foot, making, perhaps, thirty-five dollars for a complete family boat, well boarded up on the sides and roofed to within seven or eight feet of the bows. Exclusive of this expense was the price of a cable, pump and fire-place, perhaps ten dollars more. (See Navigator of 1818.) Besides these family boats, there were a number of keel boats on the Ohio and lateral rivers, used and employed by common carriers of merchandise, family goods, etc. It is said (in the Navigator before referred to) that what added to the commerce of Cincinnati was the line of barges running regularly from that city to New Orleans, descending, loaded with the produce of the country, and returning with cargoes of sugar, coffee, rice, hides, wines, rum, and dry goods of various kinds, and cotton from Natchez. Messrs. Baum, Perry & Biddle, of Cincinnati, had a line of barges constantly so engaged.

According to the census of 1810, Cincinnati, Ohio, contained one thousand, two hundred and seventeen males and one thousand and six females; total, two thousand, two hundred and twenty-three.

The principal articles constituting lading for the boats trading on the Ohio and Mississippi were flour, whiskey, apples, cider, peach and apple brandy, bar-iron and castings, tin and copper-ware, glass, cabinet work, mill-stones, grind-stones, nails, etc. The principal articles brought up the Ohio in keel boats were cotton, lead, furs, peltry, hemp, and tobacco from Kentucky.

The migration into Pickaway county from the year 1800 to 1807 was such as had no precedent in the west. The greater portion of the later emigrants came by land, bringing their families and necessary utensils in wagons. Their progress was slow, owing to the unimproved condition of the roads, and they generally took advantage of the early fall to make the trip, the roads being then comparatively dry, and the streams low. Usually several families were found in the same company, thus affording each other aid and society on their toilsome way. Arrived at the end of their journey, and making their locations of land, there was nothing to be done but grapple with the forest and prepare their lands for the plow and seed. It was during this preparation that the merchants had their harvest and profits. As before remarked, the large majority of the settlers were men of small means, and everything had to be purchased for cash. The merchant knew the wants of the people, and had prepared himself accordingly, and for several years his tribe multiplied and was prosperous. But as the little money had left the hands of the settler, and he had by this time been able to raise his bread and meat, and his family had learned to spin and weave, merchandizing grew rapidly less remunerative, and the majority of the merchants failed. Soon after the introduction of steam, the barges, the keel and family boats gave way, and the principal means of transportation was by steam, on the Ohio and Mississippi. The means of transportation with eastern cities, particularly with Philadelphia and Baltimore, was by large wagons, drawn, usually, by six horses.

The emigrants turned their attention to stock, which was easily cared for, as the pasturage was abundant, and, at an early day, the cattle and hogs raised in Ohio were driven on foot to the eastern markets.

Pickaway county, being about equally divided in two parts by the Scioto river, there was afforded ample means for the transportation of her surplus of corn, flour, whiskey, bacon, etc., to the Mississippi country and to New Orleans. These articles were shipped on flat boats, having a carrying capacity of from three hundred to five hundred barrels each. When these boats had floated to their destination, they were sold and broken up for the lumber in them.

I have before me the log-book of James Campbell, a partner of Henry Nevill, the old Jefferson merchant in the dry goods business, who entered the Ohio at Portsmouth in charge of a flat boat, on the twentieth of March, 1820, and landed at New Orleans the twentieth of April. He made daily memoranda of the state of the weather, the number of steamboats that passed him going up or down, and other incidents that interested him, with other matters; that he "caught a catfish of fifty pounds weight near island No. 73, in the Mississippi;" "that near island No. 82 he assisted George Kuder to unload the boat which he had charge of for Mr. Thomas Bell, of Circleville, of said county of Pickaway." The boat was stove in, in landing, and sank to the roof in three minutes. The flour in barrels was taken out of the water, emptied out, and repacked, there being lost, in the operation of re-packing, not over five per cent. He also recorded that he passed the boat of Mr. Wolf, of Pickaway county, Ohio.

About 1808 or 1809, by which time there was considerable surplus of horses, cattle, hogs, wheat, corn, and whiskey, for which no market could be had, except by driving the stock to the eastern cities, or floating it down the Scioto and thence to New Orleans, with the surplus of wheat, corn, etc. About this period (1808) the matter of the abundance of the surplus productions of the State was brought up for consideration by the Ohio legislature. Relief was sought by the charter of banks in the different portions of the State, some of which had success and aided the business of the country; others failed, thus making matters worse.

The next important transaction was the declaration of war, in 1812. This, of course, inflated prices, and made a demand for the surplus produce at home, at prices satisfactory. At the close of the war, or very soon after, the surplus of the country increased largely, prices of everything raised or produced in the State came down to the lowest level, with no market of a commercial character at any price that was remunerative. A large portion of the corn and rye was converted into whiskey, much of which was shipped south, and the balance consumed at home. (It was claimed that good whiskey, used moderately, was an anti-miasmatic. Quinine, in its present form, was then not known.) Because of the depression of prices, following, in a few years, the close of the war of 1812, there was but little trade. There was much surplus of stock and grain that it was difficult to convert into money, and this state of things continued growing but little better until the adoption of the canal system, in 1825.

It was after the war of 1812, up to the commencement and conclusion of the Ohio canal, that our farmers and merchants were engaged in the Orleans and Mississippi trade. Orleans, or flat boats, built to carry four and five hundred barrels, were built on the lateral waters of the Ohio, to visit the Muskingum, the Scioto, Little Miami, Great Miami, and the Wabash. In Pickaway county, as many as thirty boats were built in one year, and sent to New Orleans, loaded with the produce of the country. As early as the year 1810, a Mr. Rosewalt had on the stocks at Pittsburgh a steamboat of one hundred and thirty-eight feet keel, calculated for three or four hundred tons burthen. This steamboat was launched in March, and descended the Ohio and Mississippi, and landed at Natchez, December, 1811, and was in the trade from Natchez to Orleans until after the year 1818.

From this day steamboats increased rapidly on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, and, in a few years, supplanted the barges, keel-boats, and flat boats of the earlier days. In the year 1819, Jacob Hitler, lately deceased, made trips with produce, principally flour, and with his brother, George Hitler, now of Pickaway county, continued to make annual trips until 1830.

Lucas Sullivant sent boats from Franklinton, Franklin county, and William Neil went with cargoes from a point on the Olentangy or Whetstone, near Worthington, to New Orleans, and from thence to Liverpool.

Mr. George Fry, of Circleville, now seventy-seven years of age, who had been on five trips to New Orleans, and three times, in addition thereto, to the falls of the Ohio, says that the flat boats of the State of Ohio were from sixty to sixty-five feet long, sixteen feet wide, boarded up, and calked. The height of the boats was seven feet. Most of the Scioto boats had a triangular bow, while others were square in the front as in the rear. There were three oars on deck—one in the rear, called the steering oar, and two side oars, called sweeps. The sweeps were only used to pull out of an eddy, or to assist in avoiding objects that were dangerous. The steering oar was used only to keep the boats in their safe course. There was no thought of accelerating the progress of these boats after they reached the Ohio. They were simply put into the current and allowed to go with it.

CHAPTER XV.

RAILROADS.

On the twenty-third of February, 1830, William B. Hubbard, who for many years afterward was a resident of Columbus, prepared and submitted to the general assembly "an act to incorporate the Ohio canal and the Steubenville railway company." This was only one year after the successful experiments of George Stevenson, with his first locomotive engine, at Gadshill, England. New charters were granted at every session of the legislature, but up to the close of 1836 very little had been accomplished, owing to the financial depression. In 1837 the law afterward called "the plunder act," "to authorize a loan of the credit of the State of Ohio to railroad companies, and to authorize subscriptions by the State to turnpike, canal, and slack water navigation companies," was passed, and under it the railroads secured about seven hundred thousand dollars, yet not enough to build and equip thirty miles of road.* The act, becoming very unpopular, was repealed in 1840. The first railroad in Ohio was built in 1841. In that year there were but thirty miles in use. As late as 1840 there were only three hundred and fifty miles constructed, but from that time on, the increase was quite rapid. In 1877, the total length of the railroads in Ohio was four thousand, eight hundred and seventy-eight and forty-one one-hundredths miles.

The importance of Columbus as a railway center can be partially appreciated, when we state that fifteen hundred and forty miles of railroad center in that city, the passenger trains entering a depot not eclipsed, in size and appearance, by any in the west. This mileage does not include the far-reaching connections that all Columbus roads have, and no branches are counted. The railroad facilities of Columbus include three separate, direct routes to New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore, competing lines to the lake, and rail communication with the inexhaustible coal fields, lying to the southwest, only about sixty miles distant, and also with the iron ore region.

THE COLUMBUS & XENIA RAILROAD.

This was the first railroad leading into or out of Columbus. The company was chartered by a special act passed March 12, 1844, but the road was not constructed until 1848 and 1849. The first passenger train passed over it February 20, 1850. Soon after this date the members of the legislature took an excursion over this road, and the Little Miami, to Cincinnati and back. The Little Miami company obtained a charter March 11, 1836. The two companies, November 30, 1853, entered into a contract of union, or partnership, by which the roads of both were operated as one line. The two companies leased, January 1, 1865, the Dayton and Western road, and purchased, the same year, the Dayton, Xenia & Belpre road from Xenia to Dayton. The partnership, or union, was dissolved November 30, 1868, and a contract of lease entered into by which the Little Miami company leased, for ninety-nine years, the Columbus & Xenia road and the rights and interests of that company in the other roads that had been leased or purchased by the two companies. The condition was the promise of the Little Miami company to pay seven per cent. per annum on a capital of one million, seven hundred and eighty-six thousand, two hundred dollars, and the interest on the funded debt.

The Pittsburgh, Cincinnati & St. Louis railroad company, on December 1, 1869, leased of the Little Miami company, its railroad and its right in the Columbus & Xenia and other roads. The statement of the Columbus & Xenia company, in Poor's railway manual for 1878, has the following in regard to finances:

Capital Stock paid in	$1,786,200.00
Funded Debt	302,000.00
Total	$2,088,200.00

Per Contra.

Construction	$1,493,146.00
Equipment	321,624.96
Stocks and Bonds	103,050.00
Cash	920.52
Other Assets	169,458.52
Total	$2,088,200.00

The funded debt consists of first mortgage, seven per cent. bonds, due September 1, 1890. Officers: President, Joseph R. Swan, Columbus; secretary and treasurer, Robert S. Smith, Columbus. Further account of this road is included under the heading of the Pittsburgh, Cincinnati & St. Louis railroad.

CLEVELAND, COLUMBUS, CINCINNATI & INDIANAPOLIS RAILROAD.

This, leaving off the last addition to its title, was the second Columbus railroad put in operation. The company's original charter was dated March 14, 1836, but fifteen years elapsed before the road was built. An excursion train passed over it from Columbus to Cleveland February 21, 1851, carrying the members of the State legislature, the city authorities of Columbus and Cincinnati, and many other citizens. The company embraces four original corporations and lines, as follows: The Cleveland, Columbus & Cincinnati, the Springfield & Mansfield, the Bellefontaine & Indiana, and the Indianapolis & Bellefontaine roads.

The "Bee Line," as the road is popularly called, consists of three hundred and ninety-one miles of road, of which three hundred and seven are in Ohio, and located as follows: From Cleveland to Columbus, one hundred and thirty-eight miles; from Galion to Indianapolis, two hundred and three; from Springfield to Delaware (Springfield branch), fifty miles. This road, in 1877, run passenger trains, nine hundred and thirty-four thousand and ninety-four miles; freight trains, three million, sixty thousand, one hundred and ninety-nine miles, and other trains, one hundred and nineteen thousand, four hundred and eighty-nine miles, carrying a total of six hundred and ninety-five thousand, one hundred and twenty-eight passengers, and transported a total of one million, fifty-two thousand, four hundred and thirty-two tons of through, and one million, six hundred and twenty-four thousand, two hundred tons of way freight. The earnings of the road were:

From passengers	$ 680,918 78
" freight	2,453,803 56
" mail	75,717 78
" express	74,494 53
" rents, interests and dividends	149,424 30
Total	$3,434,356 15

The total expenditures were $2,770,344.28, leaving a balance of net earnings (19.92 per cent.) of $664,011.87. The net surplus was $61,901.92. The organization of this company is in Cleveland, where are located its principal offices. In its report on rolling stock, the company shows the possession of one hundred and thirty-nine locomotives, and a total of three thousand, eight hundred and fifteen revenue cars (including the equipment of the Cleveland & Sandusky railroad). The construction account amounts to over eighteen million dollars, and the capital stock is placed at about one millon, five hundred thousand dollars.

THE CENTRAL OHIO—(BALTIMORE & OHIO RAILROAD).

The Central Ohio railroad, now under lease to the Baltimore & Ohio company, and known as the central division of the Baltimore & Ohio railroad, was the third line opened out from Columbus. The building of this road was a project which had its inception at Zanesville. The company was formed under a special law, passed February 8, 1847, for building a railroad from Columbus, through Newark and Zanesville, to such a point on the Ohio river as the directors might select. The company was organized at Zanesville, in August, 1847, Solomon Sturges being elected president. John H. Sullivan was elected president in 1848. The road was put under contract in 1850. Delays followed, and it was not opened to Newark until the twenty-sixth of January, 1852, and to Columbus, until the eighteenth of January, 1853. In 1859, the road was placed in the hands of a receiver, and November 1, 1865, a new company was formed, to which the property was conveyed June 29, 1866. An agreement was made November 21, 1866, with the Baltimore & Ohio company, by which the road was to be operated for twenty years, the Baltimore and Ohio railroad company to retain sixty-five per cent. of the gross earnings for the first five years, and sixty per cent. thereafter, and out of the remainder to pay annually one hundred and sixty-six thousand dollars to the company, for interest on the funded debt. The lease was modified, in 1869, so that the Baltimore and Ohio railroad company were to retain sixty-five per cent. throughout the entire term, of twenty years.

While the road was in the hands of the receiver, March 14, 1864, a sale of half the line, from Newark to Columbus (thirty-three miles), was made to the Steubenville & Indiana (now the Pittsburg, Cincinnati & St. Louis railroad) railway company, for seven hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars. That portion of the line is now jointly owned by the two companies. This road is shown by Poor's manual to have made a total earning, in 1877, of $761,524.88. The expenditure was $612,237,-47. The net earning was thus $149,286.51; rentals received under lease, (thirty-five per cent.), $266,533.71. Actual deficit to lessees, $117,146.20. The rolling stock reported is as follows: Locomotive engines, thirty-one; cars—passenger, nineteen; baggage, mail and express, eight; freight, three hundred and forty-one. During the year, passenger trains were run 325,139 miles, and freight trains, 836,282. The number of passengers carried was 256,984, and the amount of freight moved was 608,486 tons. The construction account amounts to $5,500,000. Most of the officers are non-residents of Columbus.

The next railroad that was constructed in this section of country was the Columbus, Piqua & Indiana road.

The charter was dated February 23, 1849. The first train passed over the road, from Columbus to Urbana, July 4, 1843, and in a few months, ran from Columbus to Piqua. This was one of the several roads which, consolidated, made the line generally known as the

COLUMBUS, CHICAGO & INDIANA CENTRAL RAILROAD.

The Columbus, Piqua & Indiana company becoming embarrassed, it was re-organized under the name of the Columbus & Indianapolis railroad company. The road was sold August 6, 1865, under an order of court, and subsequently transferred by deed to the re-organized company. This company became the owners, in 1864, of the Richmond & Covington railroad.

The Columbus & Indianapolis railroad company, of Ohio, and the Indiana Central railroad company, of Indiana, were consolidated in September, 1864, under the name of the Columbus & Indiana Central railroad company. The company thus formed was consolidated with the Toledo, Logansport & Burlington railroad company, and the Union & Logansport company, both of Indiana. The new organization was consolidated, in 1868, with the Chicago & Great Eastern railroad company, taking the name of the Columbus & Indiana Central railway, thus made to extend from Columbus, Ohio, to Chicago; from Bradford Junction, Ohio, to Indianapolis; from Richmond, Indiana, to Logansport, and from Logansport to the western line of Indiana—in all five hundred and eighty-two miles. Of this, one hundred and thirty-seven miles are in the State of Ohio, extending from Columbus to Union City, on the State line, one hundred and sixteen miles, and from Bradford Junction to a point on the State line toward Richmond, twenty-one miles. The Columbus, Chicago & Indiana Central road is under lease to the Pittsburgh, Cincinnati & St. Louis railroad, the "Pan Handle" route, the lease having been in effect since 1869. The Pittsburgh, Columbus & St. Louis company also leases the Little Miami and the Columbus & Xenia roads. The length of the Columbus, Chicago & Indiana Central line from Columbus to Indianapolis is one hundred and eighty-seven and three-tenths miles, and from Bradford, Ohio, to Chicago two hundred and thirty miles. The other lines give it a total length of five hundred and eighty and five-tenths miles. The rolling stock is: Locomotive engines, one hundred and twenty-five; cars—passenger, sixty-one; freight, one thousand, six hundred and seventeen. The freight moved in the year 1877 was one million, five hundred and twenty-one thousand, one hundred and forty-one tons; number of passengers carried, six hundred and fifty-two thousand, seven hundred and sixty-seven. The total earnings were three million, three hundred and ninety-six thousand, two hundred and fifty-five dollars and fifty-eight cents, and the total expenditures two million, nine hundred and forty thousand, nine hundred and fifteen dollars and forty-five cents, leaving the net earnings four hundred and fifty-five thousand, three hundred and forty dollars and twenty-three cents. The construction and equipment of the road have cost (to the time of the last report) thirty-eight million, eight hundred and fifty-one thousand and ninety-seven dollars and forty-four cents.

PITTSBURGH, CINCINNATI & ST. LOUIS (PAN HANDLE).

This company was formed May 1, 1868, by the consolidation of the Pittsburgh & Steubenville railroad company, of Pennsylvania, chartered March 24, 1849; the Halliday's Cove railroad company, of Virginia, chartered 1850; and the Steubenville & Indiana railroad company, chartered in Ohio, in 1848. The road of the latter company was opened in 1858. The Pittsburgh & St. Louis railroad was re-organized December 28, 1867, under the name of the Pan Handle, and the road was opened in 1865. It was leased, on completion, to the Pennsylvania railroad company, by which it is now operated. The length of the main line, from Pittsburgh to Columbus, is one hundred and ninety-two and three-tenths miles; and there is a branch eight and one-tenth miles in length, from Cadiz Junction to Cadiz, Ohio. The rolling stock consists of one hundred and six locomotives and one thousand five hundred and twenty-three cars. The report of operations for the year ending December 31, 1877, shows that passenger cars were run five hundred and eighty-seven thousand, eight hundred and twenty-five miles, and freight cars a distance of one million, eight hundred and forty-one thousand, six hundred and seventy-nine miles. The total number of passengers carried was six hundred and eighty thousand and eighty-two, and the amount of freight moved, one million, seven hundred and twenty-two thousand, three hundred and eighty-six tons. The total earnings were $3,108,193.26, and the total expenditure, $2,022,913.15; leaving a net balance of $1,085,280.01. The construction and equipment have cost $19,942,294.81.

THE PITTSBURGH, FORT WAYNE & CHICAGO RAILROAD.

This company was formed by the consolidation of the Ohio & Pennsylvania railroad company, the Ohio & Indiana, and the Fort Wayne & Chicago. The road was opened, through its entire length, January 1, 1859, and the year after the consolidation was effected. The road was sold, under foreclosure, in 1861. A new company was organized in 1862, and in 1869 leased all of its railway and property to the Pennsylvania railroad company, by which it was subsequently transferred to the Pennsylvania company, by which it is now operated, the lessees paying seven per cent. upon the capital stock and funded debt. The rolling stock is reported to consist of two hundred and seventy-eight locomotives and five thousand three hundred and sixty-one cars. Passenger trains were run, during the year ending December 31, 1877, one million, five hundred and one thousand, three hundred and ninety-five miles, and freight trains, four millions, five hundred and ninety-six thousand, two hundred and two miles. The number of passengers carried was two million, ninety-six thousand, one hundred and thirty-one, and the amount of freight moved, two million, six hundred and ninety thousand, seven hundred and ninety-five tons. The total earnings were $6,928,856.11, and the total expenditures $4,064,398.34; leaving, as a balance of net earnings, $2,864,457.77. The cost of construction, rolling stock, real estate, and buildings, is given at $38,728,585.71.

THE COLUMBUS, SPRINGFIELD & CINCINNATI, AND THE CINCINNATI, SANDUSKY & CLEVELAND RAILROADS.

The first named company had its orign in the Columbus & Springfield railroad company, which was chartered February 16, 1840. A road was built from Springfield to London—twenty miles—under this charter, and leased, in 1854, to the Mad River & Lake Erie, since called the Cincinnati, Cleveland & Lake Erie railroad company. The road was sold May 8, 1868, under a decree of the United States district court, and bought by Jacob W. Pierce, of Boston, for one hundred thousand dollars. The Columbus, Springfield & Cincinnati railroad was incorporated May 1, 1869, with a capital stock of one million, five hundred thousand dollars, and Mr. Pierce transferred his purshase, soon after, to the new company. By an arrangement with the purchaser, the road was continued under the management of the Cincinnati, Sandusky & Cleveland railroad company, to which it was permanently leased July 1, 1870. It was subsequently completed to Columbus, a distance of forty-four and thirty-seven hundredths miles. The Cincinnati, Sandusky & Cleveland railroad company was incorporated by special charter as the Mad River & Lake Erie railroad company, for building a road from Dayton, via Tiffin and Bellevue, to Sandusky. The company became dissatisfied with this line and abandoned it, and built a new line, via Tiffin and Clyde, to Sandusky, and leased it to the Mad River & Lake Erie company. The company passed through many financial embarassments, the road was sold, the company re-organized, its name changed, etc. The company leased, March 25, 1871, that portion of its line, twenty-five miles in length, between Dayton and Springfield, to the Cincinnat & Springfield Short Line company, which took possession in 1872. The Cincinnati, Sandusky & Cleveland company has now a main line from Sandusky to Springfield, one hundred and thirty and two-tenths miles, a branch road from Carey to Findley, and the Columbus, Springfield & Cincinnati road, from Columbus to Springfield, forty-four and thirty-seven hundredths miles, making a total of one hundred and eighty-nine and thirty hundredths miles. The rolling stock (according to Poor's manual, 1878) consists of thirty-five locomotives, and eight hundred and eighty cars. Passenger trains were run a distance of three hundred and sixty thousand, five hundred and eighty miles. The total number of passengers carried was two hundred and eighty-five thousand, five hundred and thirteen, and the total amount of freight moved, three hundred and sixty-five thousand, three hundred and seventy-nine tons. The total earnings were $655,420.83, and the total expenditures, $504,266.05, leaving net earnings, $151,154.78. The construction and equipment to July 1, 1877, cost $6,217,055. Most of the officers and directors of the road reside at Sandusky.

CLEVELAND, MT. VERNON & COLUMBUS RAILROAD.

The main line owned by the Cleveland, Mt. Vernon & Columbus railroad company, extends from Columbus to Hudson, a distance of one hundred and forty-four and forty-two one-hundredths miles, and there is under lease by the company, twelve and a half miles, known as the Cleveland & Massillon railroad. The company was first chartered, in 1851, as the Akron branch of the Cleveland & Pittsburgh railroad company, and the road was opened, from Hudson to Millersburgh, in 1853. The same year the company was re-organized, under the name of the Cleveland, Zanesville and Cincinnati railroad. The road was placed in the hands of a receiver in 1861, and in 1864 was sold, under foreclosure, to George W. Cass and John J. Marvin, who, on the first of July, 1865, sold their purchase to the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne & Chicago railroad company, by whom the road was owned and operated, until leased, with that of the company's main line, to the Pennsylvania company.

The Pittsburgh, Mt. Vernon, Columbus & London railroad company, was organized May 11, 1869, and, in the following November, purchased so much of the old, unfinished road, right of way, etc., of the Springfield, Mt. Vernon & Pittsburgh road, as lies east of Delaware, and extending through Mt. Vernon in the direction of Millersburgh. The same company purchased the entire Cleveland, Zanesville & Cincinnati road, before known as the Akron branch, and obtained an assignment of the Cleveland & Massillon road. The name of the company was changed, by decree of court, December 28, 1869, to the Cleveland, Mt. Vernon & Delaware railroad company. The road, as now operated, was completed in 1873. Its rolling stock consisted, in 1877, of twenty-two engines, and six hundred and twenty-six cars. Passenger trains were run 187,366 miles, and freight trains 237,634 miles. The total number of passengers carried was 231,950, and the amount of freight moved, 240,507 tons. The total earnings of the road were $388,896.16, and the sum of the expenditures, $307,171.16, leaving a balance of net earnings of 81,725. The cost of construction and equipment, up to January 1, 1878, was $4,628,870.61.

THE COLUMBUS & HOCKING VALLEY RAILROAD.

This, one of the most valuable of railroads to Columbus, had its origin under the name of the Mineral railroad. A company by that title was incorporated April 14, 1864, to construct and operate a railroad from Athens to Columbus, with a capital stock of one million, five hundred thousand dollars. M. M. Greene labored, for some time, in southern Ohio to secure the necessary subscriptions, but was not rewarded with success. In January, 1866, he came to Columbus, and laid the matter before a number of leading citizens, and soon after a meeting was held, and Mr. Greene presented fully his views as to the importance of the proposed road, the benefit which would result to the city from the development of the coal and iron fields of the Hocking valley, etc. The meeting resulted in the determination to have a preliminary survey made, and Messrs. B. E. Smith, Wm. Davidson, Wm. G. Deshler, W. B. Brooks, Wm. A. Platt, B. S. Brown, Wm. A. Neil and Theodore Comstock each contributed one hundred dollars for this purpose. This was the beginning of an enterprise which fully sustained Mr. Greene in his representations, and which has been of great benefit to the city of Columbus and to the Hocking valley. After the report of the survey had been made, books were opened for the subscription of capital stock, and, after great effort "all along the line," the necessary sum, seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars, was raised. The stockholders met at the city hall, December 19, 1866, and organized the company by electing the following board of directors: Peter Hayden, B. E. Smith, Wm. G. Deshler, Isaac Eberly, George M. Parsons, J. C. Garrett, M. M. Greene, Wm. Dennison, Theodore Comstock, W. B. Brooks, D. Tallmadge, Wm. P. Cutler and E. H. Moore. This board elected the following officers: President, Peter Hayden; vice president and superintendent, M. M. Greene; secretary and treasurer, J. J. Janney; solicitor, Allen G. Thurman. Mr. Greene was directed to take charge of the road and to locate the line. In 1867 the name of the company was changed to the Columbus & Hocking Valley railroad company. The board of directors contracted, May 22, 1867, with Dodge, Case & Co., for the construction of the road, in the sum of one million, six hundred and sixty-five thousand dollars, payable in bonds and cash. The board authorized the issuance of one million, five hundred thousand dollars in first mortgage, seven per cent. bonds, to run thirty years, at the same time providing a sinking fund. In consequence of numerous delays, the road was not opened to Lancaster until January, 1869, to Nelsonville in September, 1860, and to Athens in July, 1870. As it was opened from point to point, business constantly increased, taxing the road to the utmost limit of its equipment. While yet unfinished, the earnings of the road were sufficient to pay the interest upon the bonds as they were required to be issued. The completion caused considerable excitement in the Hocking valley country. Lands advanced rapidly in price, coal companies, with abundant capital, were rapidly organized, new mines opened, and a general stimulus given to trade and the development of the country. There was a great demand for the opening of branch roads into the several coal valleys, and in 1870 the company, yielding partly to the demand, constructed a branch to Straitsville, thirteen miles in length, authorizing the issue of three hundred thousand dollars in ten year seven per cent. bonds, to provide funds for the same. Although built as a coal road, the other business, arising from the creation and growth of towns along the road, and in the increased production of lands in its vicinity, gave the road a large miscellaneous business. The road is decidedly a home enterprise, projected, built and owned by those living along its line. The larger part of its stock, and nearly one-third of its bonds, are owned by citizens of Columbus.

The report of the company shows that at the close of the year 1878, the capital stock was two million, thirty thousand, one hundred and fifty dollars. The construction of the main line has cost two million, eight hundred and thirty-two thousand, seven hundred and eighteen dollars and twenty-three cents, and its equipment over a million and a quarter more. The rolling stock consists of thirty-one locomotives, and one thousand, two hundred and twenty cars. The total number of passengers carried was one hundred and thirty-eight thousand, three hundred and seventy-two, and the number of tons of freight carried was over one million. The total earnings were $871,553.16, and the total expenses $480,425.73, leaving the net earnings for 1878, $391,127.43. Following are the officers and directors, as given in the last report: Directors, M. M. Greene, William G. Deshler, Henry C. Noble, B. S. Brown, P. W. Huntington, W. B. Brooks, Isaac Eberly, C. P. L. Butler, H. W. Jaeger and John L. Gill, of Columbus; John D. Martin, Lancaster; C. H. Ripley, Logan; S. W. Pickering, Athens. Executive committee, M. M. Green, Wm. G. Deshler, P. W. Huntington, Isaac Eberly, Henry C. Noble. Officers: President, M. M. Greene, Columbus; secretary and treasurer, J. J. Janney, Columbus; general superintendent, Orlando Smith, Columbus; superintendent, G. R. Carr, Columbus; auditor, T. J. Janney, Columbus; general freight and ticket agent, W. A. Mills, Columbus.

Under the same management as the above is the

the company of which was organized May 28, 1872. Construction was commenced in the summer of 1875. The line of rail is from Columbus to Walbridge, Ohio, one hundred and eighteen and two-tenth miles, and from that place to Toledo the company uses the track of the Toledo & Woodville railroad company. At Columbus it connects with the Columbus & Hocking Valley railroad. The rolling stock consists of eleven locomotives and nine hundred cars. The earnings for the year ending December 31, 1878, were $517,871.23, and the expenditures, $295,612.50, leaving the net earnings $222,258.73. The number of pessengers carried was one hundred and forty-five thousand, two hundred and eighty-three, and the amount of freight moved, over three hundred and forty-five thousand tons. The capital stock is $897,107.62; cost of construction, to January 1, 1879, $2,386,139.93; of equipment, $429,966.17; of real estate, $81,743.64. The organization is at Columbus, and is almost exactly identical with that of the Columbus & Hocking Valley railroad, already given.

THE SCIOTO VALLEY RAILROAD, is one of the most important which enters Columbus, although a short line, and of great convenience and value to the people of Franklin, Pickaway, Ross, Scioto and Pike counties. By its construction, an outlet was given the production of as rich a piece of country as there is in Ohio, and the people of Columbus, Circleville and Chillicothe, gained connection with that great trunk line, the Chesapeake & Ohio railroad. The line extends a distance of one hundred miles, from Columbus to Portsmouth, upon the Ohio river. It was completed to Circleville, May 1, 1876, and to Chillicothe in July, of the same year, thus securing a right to the title of the "Centennial Railroad, of Columbus." It was not opened for travel to Portsmouth until January, 1878. The company was organized in February, 1875, and the road from that time to the present has been under, essentially, the same management. The financial statement of this company shows that the capital stock authorized is $2,000,000; funded debt, first mortgage, seven per cent. bonds, due January 1, 1896, outstanding, $1,240,000; reserve, $50,000. The issue of bonds is limited to $13,000 per mile, or $1,300,000 in all. A sinking fund of one per cent. per annum is provided, which commenced January 1, 1879. The rolling stock of the company is, eight engines, ten passenger, and seventy-two freight cars. The total number of employees is two hundred and twenty three. The number of passengers carried, in 1878, was one hundred and fourteen thousand, five hundred and twenty-nine, and the number of tons of freight moved was ninety-eight thousand, three hundred and eighty-two. The gross earnings were $198,018.04, and the total expenses, $91,377.79, leaving the net earnings at $106,640.25. The total assets and liabilities are $3,027,885.43. The equipment cost $2,884,689.49. The principal office of the company is in Columbus. Following are the directors and officials of the road: Directors—William Moneypenny, E. T. Mithoff, T. Ewing Miller, John G. Mitchell, John C. English, Samuel Thomas, Columbus; Edward Smith, Circleville; L. G. Delano, Chillicothe; Wells A. Hutchins, Portsmouth; officers—president, T. Ewing Miller; general manager, G. T. Chapman; treasurer, F. C. Sessions; secretary, W. Neil Dennison; chief engineer, J. Huntoon; superintendent, J. B. Peters.

The foregoing gives an account of all the roads now in operation that center in Columbus, or identified with the interests of the county. The Columbus & Gallipolis road is partly constructed, and the Columbus & Sunday Creek and the Ohio & West Virginia are projected and in course of construction. All three of them have their organization principally at Columbus.

All of the roads that have been mentioned in this chapter enter Columbus; but there is one other in which the people of Pickaway are interested, and which runs through that county, from east to west, passing through Circleville –

THE CINCINNATI & MUSKINGUM VALLEY RAILROAD.

This company was chartered as the Cincinnati, Wilmington & Zanesville railroad company, February 4, 1851, and the road was opened in 1857. It was sold, under foreclosure, October 17, 1863, and re-organized March 11, 1864, under the title of the Cincinnati & Zanesville railroad company. It was sold again in 1869, and 1870 was re-organized the second time, under its present title. On the first of January, 1873, the road was leased to the Pittsburgh, Cincinnati & St. Louis railroad company, and has since been operated by the Pennsylvania company, lessees of the Pittsburgh, Cincinnati & St. Louis road.

The rolling stock consisted, in 1877, of fourteen engines, and three hundred and ninety cars. Passenger trains were run, in the year named, a distance of one hundred and ninety-seven thousand, three hundred miles, and freight trains, two hundred and sixteen thousand, nine hundred miles. The total number of passengers carried was one hundred and eighty-four thousand, seven hundred and sixty-nine, and the number of tons of freight moved was two hundred and forty-six thousand, six hundred and three. The total earnings were $366,773.86, and the expenses $340,888.90, leaving the net earnings $25,884.96. The construction account to January 1, 1878, was $5,540,164.38. The capital stock was $3,997,320, and the funded debt $1,500,000. Total assets and liabilities, $5,994,453.25.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE COURT AND THE BAR OF FRANKLIN COUNTY.

Lucas Sullivant, from Kentucky, early in 1797, with his corps of chain carriers, markers, etc., engaged in the surveying of lands and locating warrants in the Virginia military district, west of Scioto, in the month of August laid out the town of Franklinton. Here commenced the first settlement of the territory composing the county of Franklin, then in the county of Ross, under the territorial government.

The county of Franklin was stricken off from Ross, and organized under the act of March 30, 1803, which took effect April 30, 1803. At that date there were only nine other counties in the State, viz.—Adams, Belmont, Clermont, Jefferson, Fairfield, Hamilton, Ross, Trumbull and Washington.

The regular courts, for several years, were held in hired rooms in Franklinton, until the court house was erected, in 1807–8, by Lucas Sullivant, contractor, which continued in use until 1824, when the county seat was removed to Columbus, which, under the act of February 14, 1812, had become the capital of the State, where the legislature commenced, on Monday, December 2, 1816, holding its sessions in 1816–17, and a court house for the United States courts was built, in 1820, and those courts removed from Chillicothe, in 1821. The courts for Franklin county were held in the United States court house until 1840, when they were moved into the county court house, at the present location, on the corner of High and Mound streets.

In the early days of mud roads and log cabins, the lawyers rode from county to county, the circuit, with the judge on horseback, equipped with the old-fashioned leggings and saddle-bags, averaging about thirty miles a day. The party had their appointed stopping places, where they were expected, and, on their arrival, the chickens, dried apples, maple sugar, corn dodgers and old whiskey suffered, while the best story-tellers regaled the company with their humor and anecdotes. The courts held in Franklin county, including the United States courts, always attracted a large number of the most distinguished lawyers—Philemon Beecher, Thomas Ewing, Judge Irwin, Judge Spalding, Tappan, Wright, Hammond, in the State courts, and Henry Clay, Philip Doddridge, of Virginia, and other giant leaders of the bar from abroad, in the United States courts, in addition to the Ohio lawyers. In the early history of this county, which included Madison, land titles and the identity of hogs were the principal subjects of litigation, and to be master of special pleadings, under the old system, was the great ambition of the successful practitioner.

THE FIRST COURT.

"Be it remembered, that at a Court of Common Pleas, held in the town of Franklinton, in and for the county of Franklin, on the first Tuesday of May and the third day thereof, it being the first court thereof held in said county, and the day appointed for holding courts in the same by an act of the general assembly of the State of Ohio, entitled 'An act organizing the judicial courts,' John Dill, David Jamison, and Joseph Foos, esquires, having been duly commisioned by his excellency, Edward Tiffin, esquire, Governor of the State of Ohio, as associate judges of the Court of Common Pleas for the county of Franklin, and having first taken the oath of allegience, and also the oath of office, they assumed their seats.

"Present: John Dill, David Jamison, and Joseph Foos, esquires, aforesaid, judges.

"The Court then proceeded to appoint the clerk, whereupon Lucas Sullivant was apointed clerk pro tem., who also took the oath of office.

"Adjourned to the first Tuesday in September next."

SEPTEMBER TERM, 1803.

"At a Court of Common Pleas, begun and held in the town of Franklinton, on the first Tuesday in September, in the year of our Lord 1803, and of the State the first, before the Honourable Wyliss Sullivant, esquire, president, and David Jamison and Joseph Foos, esquires, two of the associate judges of said court.

"John S. Wills, Michael Baldwin, Philemon Beecher, William W. Irwin, and Jonathan Reddick, intending to appear as attorneys in this court, took the oath of fidelity to this State, the oath to support the constitution of this State, and the oath of an attorney-at-law, they were severally admitted to practice as attorneys therein."

"On the same day—September 6th—Jeremiah McLean, James Furgeson, and William Creighton, appointed commissioners by the legislature for that purpose, filed their report, selecting Franklinton as the permanent seat of justice.

"The grand jury presented two indictments, and John S. Wills was appointed prosecuting attorney, and the next day (September 7th) the court adjourned to the next term."

Messrs. Wills, Baldwin, Beecher, Irwin, and Reddick, were already regularly admitted attorneys under the territorial organization, but, on the transition from the territorial to the state government, were required not only to take the attorneys' oath over again, but to swear fidelity to the State especially, which indicates that the jurists of that day universally admitted that the states and the general government were each supreme within their own sphere, repudiating, as equally heretical, both the extremes of centralization and secession.

JOHN S. WILLS, whose name is the first in the list of attorneys who took the oath on the first day of the term, and the only one who became a resident lawyer of Franklin county, was born in Virginia, in the year 1773, and the only memorial to his early history is the license of his admission to the bar, on the twenty-seventh of May, 1794, in the Isle of Wight county, Virginia. The original, written on sheepskin, is in the possession of his grandson, John W. King, esq., of Georgetown, Brown county, Ohio, of which the following is a copy.

"Virginia to wit.——

WHEREAS, We have been appointed by the general assembly to examine into the capacity, ability and fitness of such persons as shall apply to us for license to practice as attorneys in the courts of this commonwealth, and whereas, John S. Wills, gent., hath applied to us for a license, and produced to us a certificate from the county court of Isle of Wight, of his honesty, probity and good demeanor, and we, having examined him touching his capacity, ability and fitness, and found him duly qualified; these are therefore, in the name of this commonwealth, to license and permit the said John S. Wills to practice as an attorney in the superior and inferior courts of this commonwealth. Given under our hands and seals, this twenty-seventh day of May, in the year of our Lord, one thousand, seven hundred and ninety-four, and of the commonwealth, the eighteenth.

JOS. HENRY. [SEAL.]

Shortly after he was admitted to the bar, in Virginia, he moved to Cincinnati, a frontier settlement in the northwestern territory. In 1797 he was married to Mary Gibson, daughter of Col. Thomas Gibson, then of Cincinnati, and had three children, all of whom are dead except one daughter, Mrs. King, widow of George King, late of Georgetown, Brown county, Ohio, and who was born at Chillicothe, April 16, 1802, to which place her father had removed from Cincinnati. He moved next to Franklinton, the county seat of the newly erected county of Franklin, and on September 6, 1803, was admitted to practice in the State courts, and, on the same day, was appointed prosecuting attorney of the county, and served until 1805, and again filled the same office, from 1810 to 1813, and was judge advocate general, attached to the headquarters at Franklinton, during the war. Mr. Wills was an excellent lawyer and practitioner, and master of the old system of pleadings, and criminal law. In 1818 he moved to Georgetown, Brown county, where he continued to practice until April 28, 1829, when he died, in the fifty-sixth year of his age—the pioneer member of the old Franklin county bar.

REUBEN BONAM was born in Maryland, and settled in Franklinton about the same time as John S. Wills. He was appointed prosecuting attorney by the court in 1805, and was a man of fine education, but giving way to intemperate habits, which was the vice of the times, he became too poor to dress even decently, got in some trouble about money that was missing, went off, and enlisted, at Cincinnati, as a private soldier, in one of the regular regiments, going to New Orleans. Tradition says that there he became a reformed and sober man, and, after his discharge from the service, died, a respectable citizen, and left descendants.

THOMAS BACKUS was born at Norwich, Connecticut, August 8, 1785. His father, Elijah Backus, was a native of the same place. After graduating at Yale college, and being admitted to the bar in Connecticut, in the year 1800, he removed to Marietta, Ohio, and engaged in the practice of the law in partnership with Wyllis Silliman, and established the Gazette newspaper there, and issued the first number November 30, 1801, with Elijah Backus as editor, who had been appointed receiver of public moneys of the United States. It sustained the administration of President Jefferson, and was the first Democratic paper issued in Ohio. Elijah Backus was a member of the Ohio State senate in 1803. Hon. Lewis Cass read law with him, and was admitted to the bar at Marietta. He was the owner of the island in the Ohio river below Marietta, which, afterwards, became celebrated as Blannerhasset Island, he having sold it to Mr. Blannerhasaet. Elijah Backus removed, in 1808, to Ruskin, Illinois, and was Judge of the court of claims when he died there, in 1812.

Thomas Backus was educated in Connecticut, and after graduating at Yale college, returned to his father's home at Marietta, Ohio, studied law in the office of Backus and Silliman, and was admitted to the bar, at Marietta, in 1808, by the supreme court. On November 10, 1810, he was married to Temperance Lord, and in 1811 removed to Franklinton, Franklin county, Ohio, and engaged in the practice of the law. In 1820 he was appointed prosecuting attorney by the court. He owned a large body of land, six miles up the Scioto from Franklinton, and was largely engaged in real estate operations. He removed, with his family, in 1823, to Union, Ohio, and was there appointed prosecuting attorney, and during his term of office died, October 25, 1825, and his wife soon after removed back with the family to Franklinton, and, in 1828, to Columbus.

Mr. Backus wrote frequently for the newspapers. He was an able and incisive writer. He sometimes indulged in poetry. His lines on the demolition of the beautiful Indian mound, on the corner of High and Mound streets, Columbus, that was used up in the manufacture of bricks for the first State house, and from which human bones were taken, became celebrated for their pathos, and were published in Martin's history of Franklin county, page 51.

GUSTAVUS SWAN, son of John and Sarah (Mead) Swan, was born July 15, 1787, at Petersborough, New Hampshire. His means of early education were limited, as his parents were poor, but, by his own perseverance and exertion, he obtained an excellent classical, mathematical and scientific course of instruction, at the Aurean academy, Amherst, Hillsborough county, New Hampshire. Dr. Reuben D. Murrey, son of Dr. John Murrey, and who subsequently settled in the city of Boston, and became one of the most celebrated surveyors in the country, was a fellow schoolmate. Judge Swan always said he was indebted to Dr. John Murrey's aid in his studies, and encouragement, more than to any one else, for his subsequent success in life. He studied law with Samuel Bell, a celebrated lawyer, at Concord, New Hampshire, who was afterwards governor of the State, and was admitted to the bar in New Hampshire.

He first came to Marietta, Ohio in 1810, and remained a year there, and was admitted to the bar of Ohio. In 1811 he came to Franklinton, then the county seat of Franklin, and commenced the practice of the law. His ability and industry soon gave him high professional reputation, and he was employed in all the important cases, which brought him in constant conflict with Beecher, Ewing, Irwin, Baldwin, Grimke, and other distinguished leaders of the Ohio bar, who then rode the circuit, and practiced in the courts held at the capitol of the State. Judge Swan, in these legal contests, involving nice questions, under the old rules of pleading, and requiring a thorough knowledge of the land laws, especially in the Virginia military district, soon took rank among the first at the bar. He was a diligent student, and fine speaker, having great power with a jury, and his practice extended through Fayette, Madison, Union, Delaware, Pickaway and Fairfield counties where his name is still associated, in the traditions of the people, with the pioneer lawyers of his day. He was the first representative elected by Franklin county, to the legislature, as soon as she was entitled to elect alone, in 1812, and was elected again in 1817. He was constantly engaged in the practice of his profession, until 1823, when he was appointed, by Governor Morrow, judge of the court of common pleas, in place of Judge J. Adair McDowell, deceased, and was elected by the legislature, on its meeting, for the term of seven years, and was the judge when the court was removed from Franklinton to Columbus, in 1824, and made an able one. In pursuance of the resolutions of the general assembly, passed January 22, 1825, he compiled the land laws for Ohio, including the State laws to 1815–16, an invaluable publication to the practitioner.

In 1820 he resumed the practice of law in Columbus, to which place he moved his residence, in 1815. He continued, from that date, in active practice, until 1843, doing a lucrative and extensive business. By this time he had acquired a large fortune. He had been president, from 1823, of the old Franklin bank, of Columbus, incorporated by the legislature, February 23, 1816, whose charter expired January 1, 1843. On the organization of the State bank, of Ohio, and its branches, under the act of February, 1845—the old Franklin bank, on July 1, 1845, organized as one of its branches—Judge Swan was elected one of the directors, and afterwards president, of the State bank of Ohio, he being considered one of the ablest financiers in the State. The duties of the place required his whole time, in connection with his other large private interests, and he retired from practice.

The last time he appeared as counsel, in court, was in defense of William Clark, a convict in the penitentiary, tried for the murder of Cyrus Sell, one of the guards, by a single blow with a cooper's axe. He was tried at the December term, 1843, of the supreme court for Franklin county, reported in the eighth volume of the Ohio State reports, and convicted of murder in the first degree, and hung on February 9, 1844, with a female colored convict, Esther, who had killed another prisoner. The The defense was insanity, and there was an array of eminent counsel on both sides, Judge N. H. Swayne conducted the prosecution, examinining the medical experts for the defense, including his own family physician. Judge Swan, who had been generally successful in criminal cases, put forth his full powers, and confidently remarked, it is said, that he had never had a client hung in his life, and if Clark was, he never would put his foot in the court house again, as a lawyer; and he never did, unless on his own business.

Judge Swan, from this time, devoted himself to his duties as president of the State bank of Ohio, and the management of his large estate. He was very fond of books and philosophical discussions. On October 14, 1819, he was married, by Rev. Dr. James Hoge, to Mrs. Amelia Weston, daughter of George and Mary Aldrich, born at Meriden, Massachusetts, December 20, 1785; died, November 5, 1859, and is buried under the same monument, in Green Lawn cemetery, with her husband, who died February 6, 1860. Judge Swan had two sons, both of whom died before him. George was lost at sea, on the ill-fated steamer, Lexington. It was a great grief to his father, which was intensified by the death of Charles, who, he hoped, would have lived to take his position. He had two daughters, Mrs. Sarah Whitney, of New York city, and Mrs. Jane Parsons, wife of George M. Parsons, of Columbus, Ohio.

David Scott was born in Peterborough, New Hampshire, in 1786, came to Franklinton in 1811, engaged in the practice of the law, and was appointed prosecuting attorney from 1813 to 1814, by the court, in which last year he died. He was married.

David Smith, son of John and Elizabeth Smith, was born at Francistown Hills, Conough county, New Hampshire, October 2, 1785, came to Franklinton in 1812, and moved to Columbus in 1816, and practiced law. In connection with Ezra Griswold, in 1812, he commenced publishing the Ohio Monitor, and remained sole editor thereof until 1836, when he sold out to Jacob Medary, and the paper was merged into the Hemisphere—a weekly Jacksonian Democratic paper—and finally became the Ohio Statesman, when Samuel Medary was elected State printer. Mr. Smith was elected associate judge in 1817, and resigned, on his election to the legislature, in 1822. He was a member, also, in 1822, and State printer in 1831–1834. He was a fine writer, and was engaged mostly in newspaper enterprises. In the latter years of his life he was absent, most of his time, from Columbus, visiting his children, but returned, and died here on February 3, 1863, in the seventy-eighth year of his age, and was buried in Green Lawn cemetery.

William Doherty was born in Charleston, South Carolina, November 30, 1790, from whence he came, during the war of 1812, to Franklinton, and took up his residence in Columbus in 1820. He married, on July 10, 1821, Eliza, a daughter of General Jeremiah McLene, and made Columbus his residence the balance of his life, and practiced law. He studied law in Columbus, and also previously, and, possessing a turn of mind for public business, and being a man of fine address, he became very popular. For seven years in succession he was clerk of the house of representatives in the Ohio legislature—one session in Chillicothe and six in Columbus. He was, for a number of years adjutant-general of Ohio, and United States marshal for the district of Ohio for four years. In 1831 he was elected senator from the district of Franklin and Pickaway, and chosen president of that body at his first session—a compliment rarely bestowed on a new member. He died on February 29, 1840, in the fiftieth year of his age.

Orris Parish was born in Canterbury, Windom county, Connecticut, in the year 1782. His father was Reuben Parish, and his mother Zurilla Bishop. Orris received the early part of his education in the common schools of Connecticut. In 1790, his father's family, with those of his grandfather and uncle, Levi Parish, settled in Middletown (now Naples), Ontario county, New York, where Orris attended such schools as were found in the first settlements in the wilderness, and he may have attended the academy a few terms, in Canandaigua, New York. In 1807, or 1808, he entered the law office of the late John C. Spencer, but, before completing his course, his parents died, and he left Spencer's office, and finished his studies with his cousin, John Parish, in Windom, Windom county, Connecticut. In 1811, or 1812, he emigrated to Ohio, and settled in Franklinton, Franklin county. He was there during the war, and, in 1815, moved to Columbus, after the capitol was fixed there. He acquired some distinction as a practitioner, especially in jury cases, where his style of oratory was very effective, His services were consequently in large demand, and he had a large practice on the circuit, which, in those times, was traveled, on horseback, from court to court, even to distant counties, by the jolly lawyers of the olden time, among whom he was noted. He was a very eccentric man, and many stories are related of him, his free translation to a jury of the legal phrase "nectus in coma," which he gave as "coming into court head and tail up," was long remembered by the fun-loving generation of that day, and has descended as a bon mot in the profession. In 1816 he was elected president judge of the court of common pleas for this district. At the legislative session of 1818–19 charges were preferred against him calling for an investigation of his official conduct. They were referred to a committee, and the judge published his address to the committee, in which he says: "To you, gentlemen, I submit my official conduct, and of you I solicit the most rigid inquiry and the severest scrutiny;" concluding, "I neither ask nor desire, any other justice at the bar of my country, or Heaven, than that which I have contributed my best exertions to measure out to those whose rights have been confided to my hand." The committee reported in his favor, and afterwards he resigned, and returned to the practice of the law, at which he continued with great success, as his reputation as a jury lawyer was co-extensive with the State.

On ———, 181–, he was married to Aurelia Butler, daughter of Judge Butler, of Madison county, New York, at the residence of her brother-in-law, Richard Douglas, in Circleville, Ohio. He built, on Fourth street, Columbus, a residence known now as the Whitehill property, at present the residence of Chauncey N. Olds, a leading lawyer of the city. He and Gustavus Swan, David Scott and David Smith, were the first four lawyers, and that located in Columbus after it was laid out in 1812.

John A. McDowell, son of Samuel McDowell and Ann Irvin, was born near Harrodsburg, Kentucky, May 26, 1780. He studied law, and served with distinction on the staff of Governor Shelley, in the war of 1812. At the battle of the Thames, in Upper Canada, the British commander, General Proctor, escaped from the field of battle, leaving his carriage and personal baggage, which was captured. Among the spoils was a heavy old-fashioned silver watch, with a seal, which was presented to Governor Shelley, who detached the seal and gave it to his aid-de-camp, Major John A. McDowell, who retained it, and often exhibited it in after life as a trophy. It is now in possession of his relative, Joseph Sullivant, of Columbus, who preserves it as a memento.

On November 9, 1809, he was married to Lucy Todd

Starling, youngest daughter of Colonel William Starling and Susannah Lyle, and at the solicitation of his brother-in-law, Lucas Sullivant, removed, with himself and wife, to Franklinton, in 1815, or early in 1816, and became a prominent and successful lawyer, and in 1819 was appointed by the court as prosecuting attorney for Franklin county, and in the session of 1818 and 1819 was a member of the lower branch of the legislature, and in 1820 was elected president judge for his judicial district. He died September 30, 1823.

He was a fine-looking, handsome man, of great talents, and very popular, and if he had lived would have risen to a higer position. He left two surviving children.

JOHN R. PARISH, son of Roswell Parish, was born at Canterbury, Windom county, Connecticut, in 1786. He was educated in the common schools and in the Plainfield academy, in a town of that name, next north to Canterbury. He read law in the office of his uncle, John Parish, in Windom, and was admitted to the bar. He emigrated to Ohio, and settled in Columbus, in 1816, and commenced the practice of the law. He was a man of vigorous mind, and a good lawyer, and had a fair share of the litigative business. In 1820 he was elected a member of the house of representatives from Franklin county, in the legislature and re-elected in 1821, and made a popular legislator, and on the expiration of his term, was appointed by the court as prosecuting attorney, continued for several years.

Mr. Parish married Mary Phillips, of Columbus. Like many of the lawyers of that period, he indulged in the convivialities of the times. He died in June, 1829, in the forty-third year of his age. He was a cousin of Judge Orris Parish, and is said to have been much the abler lawyer, and better versed in the legal learning of the profession.

James K. Corey was born near Cooperstown, New York, in 1797. Came to Columbus in 1819, read law with John R. Parish and was admitted here. He was a promising young lawyer, but died on the first of January, 1827, in the twenty-ninth year of his age. He married Miss Samson, who, after his death, married the Rev. William Preston, of Trinity Episcopal church.

PHINEHAS BACON WILCOX, was the only son of Seth Wilcox and his wife, Molly Bacon, and was born September 26, 1798, at Westfield, Connecticut, about ten miles west of the town of Middletown, on the Connecticut river, where his father, a substantial farmer, resided on his farm at "Forty Rod Hill."

His ancestors were of Saxon origin, located at Bury St. Edmunds, Suffolk county, England, one of whom emigrated to America and settled in Boston, Massachusetts, two of whose sons settled in the north part of Middletown — quaintly styled "Middletown Upper Housen"—in 1675, from one of whom his father, Seth, was descended.

He assisted his father in the usual duties of a New England farmer's son, until about the age of sixteen, when he attended Cheshire academy, Connecticut, and Middlebury academy, Vermont, to be fitted for Yale college.

He entered Yale, and was graduated in the class of 1821, at the age of twenty-three, and soon after married Sarah D. Andrews, of Wallingford, Connecticut, who was a sister of the late Samuel C. Andrews, of Columbus, and also a relative of John W. Andrews, and of the wife of Judge J. R. Swan, of that city. The new couple started, for their bridal trip, to the then unknown and far distant wilderness of the "Ohio country," not fully determined where they would settle, but making for the new town of Columbus, on the "waters of the Scioto," where his father owned lands, and where they arrived, after a long and somewhat perilous journey, in the fall of 1821.

Pleased with the prospects of Columbus, he concluded to make it his home, and commenced the study of the law with Judge Orris Parish, whose office was a small frame building on the southwest corner of High and State streets, where the National Exchange bank now stands.

He was a close and diligent student, entering very little into the convivialities so prevalent in the new settlement, and so destructive of many of the bright intellects of his day.

He was admitted to the bar in 1824, and commenced practice in the old court house in Franklinton, where he entered the lists against the "old lawyers," David Scott, Joshua Folsom, Gustavus Swan, and Orris and John Parish, and very soon, by close study, diligent attention to business, and unswerving integrity, he took rank with them and secured a large practice in Franklin, Madison, and Delaware counties, through which the bench and bar of that day rode circuit on horseback, with saddle-bags and leggings.

He soon became eminent as a "land lawyer," having mastered all the intricacies of the Virginia military land titles, that perpetual source of litigation for so many years. He was also distinguished as a chancery lawyer, which practice he preferred. Nothing afforded him higher gratification, or more aroused his powers, than to track out some high-toned scoundrel who was attempting to oppress the widow and the fatherless, or defraud confiding creditors, and "sift his conscience" by means of a good old bill in chancery, with its charges and searching interrogatives. He was master of common law pleading, being familiar with all the learning and subtleties of the old English special pleas, and a constant student of English common law.

In 1833 he published his work—"Ohio Forms and Practice," and an enlarged edition of it in 1848. This book was the standard on law and equity practice and pleading, both in the State and the United States courts, until the adoption of the code of civil procedure in 1853, and was in universal use by judges, lawyers and clerks, in this and other States, under the old practice.

In 1849, when the matter of a new constitution and code was in agitation, he published a pamphlet, entitled "Tracts on Law Reform," with a view of moulding public opinion as to the proposed changes in our law system. The following motto, which he adopted for the tract from an ancient author, indicates the conservative char acter of the work—"We know already the worst of what is—we know not the worst of what may be."

Like many lawyers of the old school, he could not abide the new code; but, upon its adoption, accepted the situation, and, in 1862, published his "Practical Forms Under the Code of Civil Procedure," intending, eventually, to enlarge it into a work similar to his "Ohio Forms and Practise," under the old system.

He was prosecuting attorney for Franklin county from 1834 to 1836, and wrote out numerous forms for indictments etc., which were long in use by his successors, as it required considerable skill to draft such instruments under the technicalities of the criminal law at that time. He was reporter of the supreme court of Ohio in 1842, reporting the tenth volume of Ohio reports, where his knowledge of law, and remarkable accuracy and terseness of statement, are conspicuous. It not unfrequently happened that the court, after deciding some difficult questions, would remark to the reporter: "We have decided so-and-so in this case, and depend upon you to give the reason."

His note upon assurances of title, in the case of Foote vs. Bennet, page 317, of the tenth volume, has been considered one of the ablest and most perspicuous expositions of that abstruse subject, at that time not well understood by even good lawyers, and received a high enconium from Chancellor Kent.

He was United States commissioner for the district of Ohio for many years, which office he resigned, about the year 1858, rather than be made the instrument of remanding a fugitive slave to bondage.

His law library was very large and varied, for the times, especially in English reports, which were his delight and pastime. For many years it was the only library of any consequence in the West, and was constantly resorted to by judges and lawyers, whom he was always ready to assist in looking up difficult points—especially the younger lawyers, to whom he was, at all times, a kind and sympathizing friend and a willing adviser. Rare discussions, intermitted with rare wit and hilarity, were often had in that old library, at his residence on Vine street, when Ewing, Stanbery, Hunter, Goddard, Lane, Swayne, and others of his "brothers" met there.

Although he was a fine classical scholar, especially in Greek, which he kept up through life, and was a student of the civil law and history, yet he was pre-eminently a lawyer, a common-law lawyer, devoting his life to the study of law as a science, which he loved for itself, and considering the practice of the law as the highest and most ennobling of callings, above all petty tricks and mercenary purposes—a grand and noble profession, to be pursued, not for personal ends, but for the good of his fellow-men. It was once said of him, by a friend, that he lived upon Coke and the Bible.

With politics he had nothing to do. He was a staunch whig, perhaps a little leavened with old Federal doctrines, and afterward a decided Republican.

Upon the breaking out of the rebellion, in 1861, he was much disturbed as to the ultimate result upon our institutions. Never doubting that the North would conquer, he believed that the greatest perils would then arise, having little faith in the loyalty of the South to our general government thereafter. After a long investigation on the subject, from Magna Charta down, suo more, he settled upon certain principles, which he had embodied in a brief, and sent to his friend Stanton, secretary of war, in 1862. Although quite radical as a remedy, and somewhat arbitrary, recent events, to the minds of some, seem to justify them; and, at least, they serve to show what doubts troubled good and thinking men, outside of politics, in that trying time. They are as follows:

1. Let the president, at the proper time, by a single blow of the war power, abraze, and forever annihilate, all organizations, political and civil, together with the metes and bounds of all the rebel States—reducing that province to a mere out-lying military province.

2. After the war, let that province be re-surveyed, somewhat after the manner of the Doomsday book, in England.

3. Offer, now, to any soldier, a bounty of —— acres of good land, to be selected by him or his heirs, anywhere, east or west, in that entire country.

4. Let real union men, now owning lands there, have an equivalent out of the re-surveyed lands.

5. Let the residue of the lands be exposed to public sale, and apply the proceeds towards paying the expenses of the war; and so re-people that whole country.

6. Do with the negroes as the British do—set all at work where they now are, except those who may choose to leave the country, giving them protection, compelling them to work, and securing to them the payment of reasonable wages.

7. In all cases, let patents for lands emanate, de novo, from the government, thus avoiding all danger from strict construction of tax laws, and acts of confiscation, in any of our courts.

8. Unless something of the sort be done, shall we not, of necessity, drift into a military despotism?

9. Has our worthy president ever seen Swift's "Discourse of the contests and dissensions between the nobles and commons in Athens and Rome?" It will bear study.

Just before this time, he called Stanton's attention to the gunpowder plot of Guy Fawkes, to blow up the house of parliament, and suggested precaution against a like danger to our national capitol.

He was a man of deep and sincere religious convictions, maintaining through life the principles instilled into his mind by a most excellent and sensible mother, who trained him in the strict views of the Puritans of New England; so that he was in reality, as an old covenanter would put it, a man "fearing God, hating iniquity, and despising covetousness."

A few years after admission to the bar, he made a public profession of religion, and united with Trinity Episcopal church, of Columbus, under the Rev. William Preston, where he was active for many years as vestryman, superintendent of the Sunday-school, as well as of a mission-school in the north part of the city, then a destitute locality called "Jonesburgh," and was a frequent attendant upon the ministrations of Dr. Hoge, of the First Presbyterian church, and of Dr. Smith, of Westminster, both of whom he highly respected and admired.

A distinguished legal friend in Cincinnati, hearing of his profession of religion, wrote him as follows: "So you, too, have become a Christian. I had thought that a business man could find something better to do. Let me have your reasons."

To this he replied by writing a little tract, afterwards published by the American Tract Society, styled, "A Few Thoughts," wherein he set forth, in very simple but earnest and forcible language, the cardinal truths of the Gospel and the reasons for the faith that was in him.

He carried his religious principles into all his affairs. He would never engage in any cause he did not deem just, and usually advised his clients to settle their differences and avoid litigation. He practiced unusual benevolence, giving systematically to all worthy objects, and never turning any poor man from his door. His character, in this respect, was once well summed up by one who knew him, as follows: "He was a man of high character and personal integrity, of great benevolence and charity, a fine type of a conscientious, christian lawyer, attending, with great diligence and fidelity, to the cases of his clients, when, in his opinion, they had a just cause, but discouraging litigation, for the mere sake of litigation or procrastination, and utterly refusing to lend himself or his great legal attainments to any unjust cause, however large the fee, or tempting the glory."

He died on March 25, 1863, at his residence on Third street, in the city of Columbus, in his sixty-fifth year, leaving his widow, who survived until January 2, 1873, and two only children—General James A. Wilcox, hereafter mentioned, and Anna Maria, wife of Robert Ellis, of New York.

Joseph R. Swan, son of Jonathan and Sarah (Rockwell) Swan, was born at Westernville, Oneida county, New York, December 28, 1802. He is of Scotch-Irish ancestry (from Londonderry) and received an academic education at Aurora, New York, where he commenced the study of law, which he completed at Columbus, Ohio, with his uncle, Gustavus Swan, and was there admitted to the bar in 1824. He immediately commenced the practice of his profession in Franklin and the adjoining counties, and soon gained the reputation of a learned, honest, and safe lawyer and counsellor.

In 1833, he was married to Hannah Ann Andrews, of Rochester, New York, daughter of Samuel S. Andrews, one of the early residents of that city from Darby, Connecticut, and has three sons and two daughters, one of whom is married to Major R. S. Smith, of Columbus. Mrs. Swan died in 1876. Mr. Swan was prosecuting attorney of Franklin from 1830 to 1834. In 1834 he was elected by the legislature as common pleas judge for the district composed of the counties of Franklin, Madison, Clark, Champaign, Logan, Union and Delaware, and re-elected in 1841, and by his satisfactory and impartial discharge of the duties of the office, obtained the reputation of being one of the best judges in the State. Judge Swan, on the expiration of his second term, resumed the practice of law in Columbus, and formed a partnership with John W. Andrews, which did a large business under the firm name of Swan & Andrews.

In 1854, the opponents of the repeal of the Missouri compromise, by the Kansas-Nebraska act, which created quite an excitement in Ohio, nominated and elected him supreme judge, by over seventy-seven thousand majority. On the bench, he maintained his distinct characteristic of great conscientiousness, that neither personal interest nor sympathy could, in any manner, influence his judgment of right or law. This was strikingly illustrated in May 1854, when S. P. Chase, then governor of Ohio, brought a strong pressure to bear upon the judges of the supreme court, to obtain a decision declaring the fugitive slave laws unconstitutional and void, that the enforcement of them might be resisted by the State; the court stood, two judges in favor of nullifying, and three opposed. If there had been a majority in favor, and the United States marshal had re-arrested the discharged prisoner, as he was instructed to do, and the governor had resisted the re-arrest with military force, as he proposed to do by orders issued to the military to be ready for service, a conflict might have been brought on that would have changed the subsequent history of the loyalty of Ohio to the laws and constitution of the United States. Great excitement prevailed—party passion and prejudice ran high in the political convention that was to pass on the question of his renomination, and to assemble on the day after the opinion of the court was delivered. Rising to the importance of the coming crisis, Judge Swan, then chief justice, in delivering the opinion of the court sustaining the fugitive slave law, in his closing remarks says:

"As a citizen I would not deliberately violate the constitution or the law by interference with fugitives from service. But if a weary, frightened slave would appeal to me to protect him from his pursuers, it is probable I might momentarily forget my allegiance to the law and the constitution, and give him a covert from those who were upon his track. * * * And if I did it, and was prosecuted, condemned and imprisoned, and brought by my counsel before this tribunal on a habeas corpus, and were then permitted to pronounce judgment in my own case, I trust that I should have the moral courage to say, before God and the country, as I am now compelled to say, under the solemn duties of a judge, bound by my official oath to sustain the supremacy of the constitution and the law—THE PRISONER MUST BE REMANDED.

In the convention, the next day, the prejudices and passions of the hour defeated his nomination, but the judgment of the bar of Ohio sustained him. The politicians who raised the issue never reached the presidency. Ohio made Abraham Lincoln president, and resistance to the constitution and laws of the Union, pronounced valid by its highest court, came from those who took the sword to defend the right to extend slavery, and broke their idol in pieces by their own folly.

Judge Swan, in 1859, resumed the practice of law, and soon after became connected with the Columbus & Xenia railroad, and afterwards the general solicitor of the Pittsburgh, Cincinnati & St. Louis railway company, in which capacity he is still engaged. Governor Brough appointed him to the vacancy on the supreme bench, occasioned by the death of Judge Gholson, which he declined, as he did also the same position tendered him since the war. Judge Swan has prepared the following elementary law books, which have been accepted by the profession in Ohio as the best authority on the subjects upon which they treat: In 1835–36, "Swan's Treatise"—an indispensable companion of every justice of the peace—which has passed to the tenth edition; 1843, "Guide for Executors and Administrators"; 1841, "Swan's Revised Statutes"; 1854, a revised edition of the statutes; 1860, a revised edition of the statutes, to which L. S. Critchfield annexed notes of the decisions of the supreme court; in 1868, a supplement to the edition of 1860 was compiled and published, with notes of the decisions of the supreme court, by Milton Sayler; 1851, "Swan's Pleadings and Practice," two volumes; 1862–63, "Swan's Pleading and Precedents under the Code." None of the decisions of the supreme court rendered by him have ever been overruled. As a jurist, his opinions stand high with the profession. His well known integrity has secured him the universal respect of the people where he resides, and of the State where his books have made his name a household word. For years he has been an active member of Trinity Episcopal church.

SAMUEL C. ANDREWS was born at Wallingford, Connecticut, in 1794. He was educated at Middlebury college, Vermont, and removed to Columbus, Ohio, at the instance of his brother-in-law, P. B. Wilcox, about the year 1828, and soon after entered upon the practice of the law, but did not pursue it with much diligence, being a man of literary tastes, and poetical temperament. He took an active interest in our public schools, and was, for many years, a leading member of our board of school examiners.

He was adjutant-general of the State, under Governor Lucas, in which capacity he accompanied the governor upon his famous military expedition to Toledo, in March, 1835, to assert the claims of this State in respect to the Michigan boundary line.

He died at Columbus, on March 13, 1863, and, by his dying request, was buried in the Andrews family burial lot, in the old graveyard, at Wallingford.

LYNE STARLING, son of William Starling and Mary (McDowell) Starling, was born March 3, 1806, in Mercer county, Kentucky; came to Columbus, Ohio, in 1830, entered the clerk's office, studied law with P. B. Wilcox, esq., and entered upon the practice, and in 1838 was appointed clerk of the court of common pleas, supreme court, and court in bankruptcy; was re-appointed March 15, 1845, and resigned in February, 1846. Having secured a competency by successful business operations, he went to New York and became a wholesale merchant, and afterwards removed to Illinois, where he had purchased a large body of land, then returned to Kentucky, joined the Union army, and was appointed chief, on the staff of General Crittenden, his personal friend; served with distinction throughout the war, and was noted for his courage and capacity in battle, and was promoted to the rank of brigadier-general, March 25, 1835. He was married to Maria A. Hemley, of Frankfort, Kentucky, and became a cotton planter in Arkansas, and died in 1877.

NOAH H. SWAYNE, youngest son of Joshua Swayne, was born in Culpepper county, Virginia, December 7, 1804. His father was a prosperous farmer and a member of the society of Friends. His earliest American progenitor came over with William Penn, and settled on a farm near Philadelphia, which is still in the hands of his descendants. Joshua Swayne died in 1808, in Jefferson county, Virginia, to which he had removed, leaving his children to the care of his widow, an excellent woman of marked vigor of mind, who carefully watched over the education of her sons. Noah went to school in the neighborhood until thirteen, when he entered the academy of Jacob Mendenhall, at Waterford, in London county, then in high repute with the society of Friends. He was placed at Alexandria, in his fifteenth year, with Dr. George Thornton, a physician of eminence, with the intention that the studies commenced here should be continued in a hospital at Philadelphia; but the death of Dr. Thornton, a year later, led to the abandonment of the plan, and circumstances fixed the purpose of the student in the study of law. He returned to school, to Alexandria, where, under a good classical instructor, a thorough preparation for college was accomplished, at which time the pecuniary losses of his guardian deprived him of the means to carry out his purpose. He entered at once, as a student, in the law office of John Scott and Francis P. Brooks, at Warrenton, Fauquier county, Virginia, finding there, as a fellow-student, Henry S. Foote, afterwards governor and senator from the State of Mississippi. A lasting intimacy between the two arose from this association.

Admitted to the bar in 1823, the non-slaveholding example of his father, enlivened with his own views, determined him to remove immediately to Ohio. The journey was made on horseback. The year of preliminary residence, required by law, before attorneys from other States were permitted to practice in Ohio, was passed in Zanesville; when he opened an office, in 1825, at Coshocton, the county seat of an adjoining county. His success was immediate and considerable. He was appointed prosecuting attorney of the county the first year, and he was occupied with this, and private practice, until 1829, when he was elected from the county to the house of representatives. During the next year President Jackson appointed him United States attorney for the district of Ohio, and he removed to Columbus, where the courts of the United States, in Ohio, were then held. These and the supreme court of Ohio offered ample and inviting occupation, in view of which he declined the office of presiding judge of the common pleas for that district, to which, two years later, he was elected by the general assembly.

In 1832 he was married, at Harpers Ferry, Virginia, to Miss Sarah Ann Wager, daughter of ———— and Catharine (Bates) Wager. His wife, who had imbibed this principle of the old Virginia school of emancipation united with him in immediately liberating a number of slaves, who had become his property by the marriage.

In 1839 he was appointed, by President Van Buren, United States district attorney—the division in the Democratic party, in reference to the sub-treasury, having led to the change. From this time he devoted himself, with untiring labor, to his profession; uniting the learning of the books with the eloquence of the advocate, he soon acquired the reputation of being one of the best jury lawyers in the State. His peculiar forte was in the examination of witnesses, and in skillfully analyzing the testimony in each case. His cross-examination, for four days, of Sydney Burton, the prosecuting witness in the celebrated trial of William Rossane and others, in the spring of 1853, indicted in the United States circuit court at Columbus for burning the steamboat "Martha Washington," to procure the insurance, in which Henry Stanbery, since attorney general of the United States, was pitted against him, will never be forgotten by those who heard it. Judge Walker, Ewing, Pugh, Pendleton, and a brilliant array of counsel were in the case.

In 1839 he formed a partnership with James E. Bates, doing a large business, under the firm name of Swayne & Bates, which continued until 1852. On the adoption of the new constitution, Mr. Bates was elected judge of the common pleas court of the sub-division composed o the counties of Franklin, Madison and Pickaway. On January 1, 1853, he formed a partnership with Llewellyn Baber, a relative of his wife, who had read law with him. The new firm, under the firm name of Swayne & Baber, until its dissolution, April 1, 1860, still continued to hold its business in Columbus and ruputation in the courts throughout the State, in which its senior partner was employed as co-counsel in many important cases. In May, 1859, Judge Swayne appeared as co-counsel, with Belden, the United States district attorney for the northern district of Ohio, and argued, against Attoney General Wolcott, the celebrated fugitive slave cases, ex parte Langston, on habeas corpus, in the supreme court at Columbus, reported in ninth volume Ohio statutes, pages 78–199, in which Judge Swan delivered the opinion of a majority of the court, sustaining the constitutionality of the fugitive slave laws, which defeated his renomination in the Republican State convention, and resulted in the movement from Ohio which nominated Abraham Lincoln for president, in 1860.

Wager Swayne, his eldest son, now General Swayne, of Toledo, Ohio, succeeded as the partner of his father, on the dissolution of the firm of Swayne & Baber, but at the breaking out of the rebellion, immediately entered the service, raised the Forty-third Ohio volunteer infantry, and served with distinction throughout the war. Judge Swayne, after retiring from the office of United States district attorney, took no active part in politics until 1856; he had been a Democrat, of the old Jeffersonian school, and his education, naturally, led him to oppose the extension of slavery, and he made speeches for Fremont, and, also, supported Lincoln for the presidency. He, however, was ready to do anything to promote the public interest, and from 1837 to 1840 served as a fund commission, with Alfred Kelly and Judges Graham and Swan, under a resolution of the legislature, appointing them to take charge of the State debt, and endeavor to restore the public credit, then badly broken down, and supply means to complete the public works, both of which objects were economically carried out, they declining any compensation for the service. In connection with William Allen and another prominent gentleman, he was sent to Washington, by the governor, to adjust the disputed location of the east portion of the boundary line between Ohio and Michigan, which was effected, leaving the disputed territory in Ohio.

In 1840, William W. Awl, Noah H. Swayne and James Hoge, was appointed a committee by the legislature to report upon the condition and number of the blind in Ohio. Their labors resulted in the establishment of the famous asylum for the blind at Columbus, with which, as also the asylums for the deaf and dumb, and for lunatics, Judge Swayne was actively connected as trustee for many years.

At the outbreak of the war for secession, his whole time was given to the service of the governor, in inviting the Ohio lines to the field.

Judge McLean, who presided at that time over the sixth circuit of the supreme court of the United States, composed of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and Michigan, had for years been a warm friend of Judge Swayne, and frequently expressed the wish that he might be succeeded by him. This idea, originating with himself, had spread from him to leading members of the bar within the circuit, and some recent arguments at Washington, made before the supreme court by Judge Swayne, had had a like effect with the other judges. Consequently, on the unexpected death of Judge McLean, the expression from both the bar and the people was in favor of his appointment, which was recommended to the president unanimously by the Ohio delegation in congress, without distinction of party. President Lincoln appointed Judge Swayne in February, 1862, and he was unanimously confirmed by the senate, a result especially gratifying to his friends, who, at one time, feared a cabinet intrigue to substitute a lawyer from some other State.

Judge Swayne's circuit covered a large extent of territory, and part of the time he has had assigned to him another circuit, which required his holding court in New Orleans. His labors have been arduous and constant, and the accuracy and erudition of his opinions found in the reports, have been promoted by accumulated stores of many years' research, resulting from the habit of noting down whatever ought to be preserved.

On the question of the constitutionality of the legal tender acts he dissented, with Justices Miller and Davis, from the opinion of the majority, delivered by Chief Justice Chase, holding unconstitutional the legal tender greenbacks Mr. Chase had issued as secretary of the treasury. He united in the opinion of the court, delivered by Mr. Justice Strong, overruling that decision (in 12 Wallace 457) in the legal tender cases.

Judge Swayne has always been an enthusiastic student of ancient and modern literature, and the degrees of LL. D., conferred on him by Yale, Dartmouth and Marietta, were a recognition of the studies of a lifetime. But he seems always to enjoy himself most in the domestic circle, so long and happily presided over by a most intelligent and excellent wife. He has four sons—General Wager Swayne, Henry Foote Swayne, Noah and Frank Swayne, residing in Toledo, and a daughter, Mrs. Edwin Parsons, of New York city. Four daughters, Catharine, Rebecca, Virginia and Sally, who died in childhood, sleep near together, in the Green Lawn cemetery, Columbus. Judge Swayne preserves, in a remarkable degree, the health, presence and vigor of intellect, that result from good habits and a well-spent life.

HENRY STANBERY was born in the city of New York, on the twentieth of February, 1803. His father was Jonas Stanbery, a physician. Henry Stanbery was educated in a select school, in New York, until he removed, with his father's family, to Zanesville, Ohio, in 1814. After some preparation at home, he went to Washington college, Pennsylvania, from which he was graduated in 1819. When sixteen years old he commenced the study of law, with Ebenezer Granger, at Lancaster. On his death he continued his studies with the late General Charles C. Goddard. As he could not be admitted to the bar until he was twenty-one years of age, he had the advantage of nearly five years preparatory study, which he always considered of especial value. In May, 1824, he was admitted to the bar, by the supreme court of Ohio, on circuit in Gallia county. On his return from that county, on horseback, in company with the many noted lawyers who had been present, he was cordially urged, by the late Hon. Thomas Ewing, to commence practice in Lancaster, and ride the circuit with him. He accepted this flattering invitation. The circuit extended from the counties of Washington and Gallia, on the Ohio river, to Delaware and Marion counties, including those adjoining the direct line. The system of circuit practice was such that a lawyer had little opportunity to examine his case, between his retainer and the trial. It therefore required great readiness in the use of his knowledge, and a reliance upon his own resources to be successful. That Mr. Stanbery was equal to these emergencies, is evident from his rapid rise in the profession; and that such practice suited his talents, is apparent from the wonderful quickness, both of attack and defence, by which he has always been characterized in the trial of cases. Mr. Stanbery remained in Lancaster, contemporary with Judges Sherman Beecher and Irwin, and with Thomas Ewing, the elder, Hocking Hunter, John T. Brassee, Thomas King, and many other lawyers then residing there, and in the adjoining counties, whose distinguished efforts at the bar have shed an enduring glory over its early history, that has not since been eclipsed by brighter lights.

In 1846 the office of attorney-general of the State of Ohio was created, and Henry Stanbery was elected, by the general assembly, to be the first occupant of this office. The term was five years. He accepted the place, and at once, early in 1846, removed to Columbus, where he resided for more than five years, and so became a member of the bar of Franklin county.

At this time the United States courts were located in Columbus. He had a very large and valuable practice in these courts, and in the supreme court of Ohio. These were the days that the lawyers of Ohio had the opportunity of a large arena in which to make their best efforts, and thus become known to the bar of the entire State. Columbus was often full of lawyers, young and old, who remained for weeks, attending these courts.

In 1850 Mr. Stanbery was elected one of the delegates from Franklin county to the convention which framed the present constitution of Ohio. It was first held in Columbus, and then removed to Cincinnati. In this convention he was conspicuous in debate. Naturally conservative, and belonging to the Whig party, he assisted greatly in checking the extreme radicalism openly urged by some of the ablest and most brilliant of the younger members.

In 1853 he removed to Cincinnati, where he has ever since had an office, but his residence is on the hills of Kentucky, opposite the eastern part of the city, and a few miles east of Newport, where he has ample room to indulge his love of nature and engage in horticultural pursuits, of which he has always been fond.

His practice of the law in Cincinnati was similar to that in Columbus, his largest cases being in the United States courts and in the highest State courts.

In 1866 he was appointed attorney general of the United States by President Johnson. He accepted this office, after consultation with his friends, with the sole desire to assist in carrying the government safely through the perilous times following the war. He resigned this office, to become one of the counsel of the president, upon his impeachment. He was in such delicate health at the time that most of his arguments in that trial were submitted on paper. After the termination of the trial, he was renominated by the president to the office of attorney general, but the senate had not magnanimity enough to confirm him. Since then he has held no public office. He has been president of the law association of Cincinnati. His pen has been used on some of the questions of the day, and sometimes he has made public addresses, but in later years, as in early life, he has been too much of a lawyer to be a successful politician.

Henry Stanbery is a man of fine appearance, tall and straight, with dignified bearing and a very pleasant face, though his features are large and strongly marked.

He was, from the first, a most accurate lawyer, fond of technichalities and ready in applying every refinement of pleading, and all the nice rules of evidence and practice. It was, however, in the discussion of the general principles of the law, which arose in his cases, that he especially delighted. Upon all young men who studied the law, he would urge the essential importance of mastering general principles in order to attain the highest success. He was especially fond of the Latin maxims, which he regarded as the very embodiment of terse wisdom. In his manner as a practitioner, Mr. Stanbery was a model. Always courteous and dignified, he was, nevertheless, as alert and ready as a soldier on guard. He was quick to perceive the slightest weakness in his opponent's cause, and on it dealt his blow with overwhelming suddenness. His manner, in the examination of witnesses, was admirable. He never bullied or attempted to mislead him, but with sincere frankness, and winning address, would secure from the reluctant or the unfair witness often full and true answers to his questions. His language is of the purest English, and his style free from all glitter of mere words. To court and jury alike, his speeches were clear. His arguments on the law were models of orderly arrangement and logical force, often eloquent from their very qualities. His addresses to the jury were masterly discussions of the facts, ingeniously mustered to sustain his views, and were exceedingly attractive.

In writing, he was a marvel of accuracy. Often his manuscrips were printed from the original draft, with scarcely a correction. He was systematic and thorough as a worker, never putting off anything for a more convenient season, but at the earliest moment analyzing his case and settling the law and the facts which would control it.

In personal character he is, and has ever been, a man of the highest honor, integrity, and probity—to be trusted implicitly. While he was devoted to the interest of his client when he was willing to undertake his cause, he never mislead the court or jury, or deceived an opponent by any misstatement of law or fact. His word was truth. He has always been a courteous gentleman to all ages and ranks, and especially kind to the younger members of the profession. He never lost his self-control, or indulged in petulance or passion. He is a member of the Episcopal communion.

In all these respects Henry Stanbery was, and is, one of the foremost lawyers, not only of Ohio, but of the United States, and as a man, entitled to the highest veneration and regard.

Mr. Stanbery married twice; first, Frances, daughter of the Hon. Philemon Beecher, of Lancaster. The children of this marriage were Philemon B., Henry, George, and Frances, now the wife of Francis Avery, of San Francisco. Henry died just as he was entering upon the study of the law, to the deep grief of his father. His second wife is Cecilia, daughter of the late William Key Bond, a lawyer of distinction, formerly of Chillicothe, and afterwards of Cincinnati.

Mr. Stanbery has retired from the law, and, in the enjoyment of ample means, he is spending the decline of life amid his family and friends, in otium cum dignitate.

SAMUEL BRUSH, son of Platt and Elizabeth (————) Brush, was born January 13, 1809, in the town of Greene, Chenango county, New York, his father being, at that time, a practicing lawyer in Oxford, in the same county, where they resided until 1815, when the family removed to Chillicothe, Ohio, and his father formed a partnership, in the practice of the law, with his brother, Col. Henry Brush, then a member of congress.

In 1820 he removed, with the family, to Delaware, Ohio, his father having received the appointment of register of the land office, for the sale of government lands in the seven northwestern counties of Ohio, and resided there until 1828, when his father returned to Chillicothe to live, on his removal by General Jackson, and he himself took charge of the State land office, at Tiffin, Ohio, until his father resigned his office as register thereof.

He was a clerk in his father's office from his early youth, and received a classical education, through three private tutors, graduates of colleges, one of whom was General John A. Quitman, afterward governor of, and member of congress from, Mississippi. He read law with his father, who, in the spring of 1830, had removed, with such of his family as were then living, to his farm, near Fremont, Ohio. He was admitted to practice law at Tiffin, Ohio, by the supreme court, August 30, 1830—his uncle, Judge Brush, being one of the judges on the bench. The court was held at Tiffin, but the judges and lawyers boarded at Fort Ball, where his examination took place, before a committe of the ablest lawyers of the bar, on the favorable result of which Judge Brush, his uncle, congratulated him, as he had feared that he would not be found qualified. He was admitted to practice in the circuit and district courts of the United States, for Ohio, in 1831, and in the supreme courts of the United States and district court of the District of Columbia in the winter of 1840–41.

In the spring of 1831 he left Fremont, on account of his health, and went to reside in West Union, Adams county, Ohio, and there practiced law, and was elected prosecuting attorney in October, 1833, serving as such two years. He then went to Batavia, Clermont county, Ohio, and there practiced until the fall of 1836, when he removed to Columbus, Ohio, and opened an office in December, of that year, on State street, adjoining the office of Starling & Gilbert, who dissolved partnership in 1837, when he formed with M. J. Gilbert, under the firm name of Brush & Gilbert, which firm did a large and lucrative business in Columbus for several years. He acquired the title of major while in Columbus, by holding the commission of brigade inspector. He was elected vice-president upon the organization of the Franklin County Agricultural society, and was afterwards elected president, and served two years, during which period the fair grounds were purchased and buildings erected thereon, at a cost of over six thousand dollars, and when he retired the society was out of debt and had a surplus of two hundred dollars in the treasury.

He was president of, and built, the Columbus and Granville plank road.

In 1859 he retired from the practice, and removed to Canandaigua, New York, and engaged in farming, residing on a farm at the head of the main street of the village. Duriug the civil war, although foreseeing the demoralization that would result therefrom, he contributed all in his power to aid in its prosecution, for the purpose of restoring the Union, and maintaining the laws of the United States, and purchased a substitute for his son, who was in college, and not liable to the draft. His son, Henry Brush, having graduated at Hobart college, studied law, and being admitted to the practice, in the fall of 1868, he opened a law office with him in the city of Buffalo, New York, where they practiced two years, and, their health failing them, they returned to Canandaigua, and continued the practice until the death of his son Henry, on July 17, 1879. His death, so unexpected, at the time when he had acquired a reputation as a sound lawyer and able advocate, was the greatest misfortune of his life, as he was an only child. In consequence of this sad blow, he retired from the active practice of law.

Mr. Brush, as a lawyer, was a superior special pleader, no case prepared by him having ever been lost, or judgment reversed for defective pleading. His mind possessed great powers of concentration, and he handled with ability a great number and variety of facts and points, in the trial of important causes. He was a man of great industry in pushing his business, being always ready for trial in his cases, but never encouraged litigation, unless confident that his client had a case.

He was always true to his friends; a man of undoubted integrity of character, and sincere in his opinions, conservative and independent in his politics, and anti-sectarian in his religious views.

He was married June 7, 1843, at Port Gibson, Ontario county, New York, to Cornelia A. Jenkins, daughter of Lewis Jenkins, esq., and grand-daughter of Judge Moses Atwater, of Canandaigua, New York. His wife is still living.

MATTHEW J. GILBERT was born at New Haven, Connecticut, in 1810, and was graduated at Yale College in 1829. Having taken the course of study, and attended the lectures, at the law school connected with said college, he came to Columbus, Ohio, in 1830, and after reading law with P. B. Wilcox, esq., was admitted to the bar, in 1831, by the supreme court of Ohio. He immediately commenced the practice, at Columbus, and continued engaged therein until his decease, which occurred suddenly, while temporarily absent from home, at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, in May, 1848. Mr. Gilbert was an excellent lawyer, and will long be remembered by old clients for refusing, when offered, to take fees that he thought were too high for the services rendered.

WILLIAM W. BACKUS, son of Thomas Backus, and Temperance (Lord) Backus, was born on his father's farm, near Franklinton, in Franklin county, Ohio, on October 12, 1814. He was educated at the primary school, and graduated at Kenyon College, Ohio; studied law in the office of Judge Gustavus Swan, and immediately entered into the practice of the law at Columbus, with his brother, Elijah Backus. He was elected prosecuting attorney of Trumbull county, in 1838, and re-elected in 1840. He was married to Sarah P. Fuller, of Delaware, Ohio, May, 1842, and died, at Columbus, Ohio, in the twenty-ninth year of his age.

ELIJAH BACKUS, son of Thomas Backus and Temperance Lord Backus, was born on his father's farm, near Franklinton, Franklin county, Ohio, on March 3, 1812. He was educated in the primary schools at Columbus, studied law with his brother, W. W. Backus, and was admitted to the bar by the supreme court at Columbus, in 1838. He went into the clerk's office, and, in 1838, was appointed crerk, pro tem., and continued until the spring of 1839, when he entered into the practice of his profession with his brother, William W. Backus, under the firm name of E. & W. W. Backus, which continued until the death of his brother, in 1842. After this Mr. Backus practiced his profession alone, doing a large and lucrative business, not only at home, but on the circuit. He was well versed in the common law, and thoroughly posted in the technicalities of the old practice, which he especially delighted to play off on the younger members of the profession. But as soon as, under the instruction of dear-bought experience, they had fully mastered all the catches and fine points of special pleading, and he found himself often beaten at his own game, he would laugh and say, "These young cubs are so fast learning my hand that I will have to throw up." Mr. Backus was especially familiar with the law on the subject of land titles in the Virginia Military district, and was largely employed in cases arising out of it. Much of his success was owing to his great nerve and calculating coolness in trying a case before a jury. He understood perfectly the system of examining and handling witnesses to the best advantage. He argued his points directly and without wasting words.

His early death, on March 3, 1855, in the forty-fourth year of his age, prematurely cut short a career of great promise. From March, 1852, General Joseph Geiger was in partnership with him until his death.

He was married to Caroline V. Wheeler, on November 1, 1843, at the then residence of her brother-in-law, where the beautiful Ohio lunatic asylum is built. One son and three daughters survive him.

Thomas Sparrow was born at Utica, New York, in July, 1818. His father Samuel Sparrow, was a gentleman of fine ability, as a scholar and man of business; polished in manners and cultured in mind. He was a landholder in Wicklow county, Ireland—a county adjoining Dublin where he married Mary Roe, a sister of the Rev. Peter and Dr. Henry Roe, gentlemen of high standing in Dublin. She came with her husband, first temporarily, in 1799, and, having returned to Ireland in 1803 or 1804, removed permanently to America in 1817, and they settled at Utica, New York. Samuel Sparrow, having purchased a large tract in the "Fire-lands" of northern Ohio, the family removed to Huron county in 1820, and located in what is known as the Woodward neighborhood, and were active in organizing the first Episcopal churches in that part of Ohio. Mrs. Sparrow died in September, 1821, of malarial fever, leaving five children: Susan (Mrs. William Woodward), William (Rev. Dr. Sparrow), Edward,) at present a lawyer at Lake Providence, Louisiana), Anna (Mrs. M. H. Mitchell, now living at Mount Vernon), and Thomas, who was three years old. In 1823 his father took him to Worthington, at that time the seat of Kenyon College, and placed him under the instruction of Mrs. Ingraham, a sister of Bishop Chase's wife, who subsequently married Dr. Sparrow, a professor in the college, and from that time he was constantly a member of the preparatory schools until he entered the Freshman class, after the removal to Gambier, where he graduated in 1837. He studied law with Mr. P. B. Wilcox, at Columbus, Ohio, and was admitted to the bar on July 8, 1840, by the supreme court, at Tiffin, Seneca county, Ohio, Judges Hitchcock and Lane on the bench. He commenced the practice of law in Columbus, in 1842; first, for one year, in partnership with Fitch James Mathews, and then with Pierrepont, in 1844, which continued two years. He then practiced alone until he was appointed postmaster by President Pierce, for four years, from the fifth of September, 1853, when he formed a partnership with Otto Dressel, which continued two years, and he again practiced alone until 18—. He formed a partnership, about 1860, with James E. Wright, esq., which continued until 1869. Mr. Sparrow was elected prosecuting attorney in 1848, and served two years.

He was a man who eminently possessed the confidence of the community, in the honesty and integrity of his character. He was twice selected a commissioner to investigate alleged defalcations in the treasury of the State, first in the case of Joseph Whithall, and again in the great Breslin and Gibson defalcation, in 1857, and his reports in the matter established his reputation as an impartial seeker after the truth, doing his duty without fear or favor. When the finances of the county were in a suspicious situation, he was elected county commissioner, and, without compassion or mercy, scattered the vampires who had fastened on the treasury.

Mr. Sparrow was not an advocate, but in the business of the profession, he stood among the very first. He was accurate, and gave general satisfaction to his clients. He was a man of culture, and a constant reader of books. Masonry, which he entered in Magnolia lodge, in 1857, seems to have struck the sympathetic cord of his nature, and, in a very short time after he joined the order, he rose to the highest position, and throughout the State was a marked man, and regarded as one of the ablest expounders of the views of the order.

In 1842, he married Martha Sisson, daughter of Dr. P. Sisson, of Columbus, and, after her death, he married, on March 31, 1869, Mrs. Anna (Purshall) Stokes, the accomplished widow of Horace M. Stokes, his predecessor in the office of grand master of Masons. Mr. Sparrow's health had been failing for some time before his death, which occurred on August 7, 1871, at his residence in Columbus.

Mr. Sparrow was a strong Episcopalian, and from early life identified with the Democratic party of Ohio, and consistently adhered to that organization. His funeral, on August 10, 1871, was attended by the Masons and Knight Templars from different parts of the State, and was the largest and most imposing Masonic funeral that ever took place in Columbus, and will long be remembered by those who took part in it.

Edwards Pierrepont was born in North Haven, Connecticut, in the year 1817; graduated at Yale college in the year 1837; studied law in the New Haven law school, under Judge Dagett; was admitted to the bar, in the State of Ohio, in 1841, and entered into partnership in the practice, at Columbns, with his friend, P. B. Wilcox, upon whose suggestion he had come to Ohio, which continued until 1844, and then with Thomas Sparrow, until 1846, when he removed to New York city, and soon established a large practice there.

In 1857 he was elected judge of the superior court, of New York, in place of Chief Justice Oakley, and held that position until 1860, when he resigned.

In 1862 he was appointed, with General Dix, to try prisoners of state, confined by the United States government in the various forts and prisons; and, in 1867, was employed as counsel for the government in the famous Surratt case, who was tried at Washington for complicity in the assassination of President Lincoln. He was appointed, by President Grant, United States attorney for New York; and, in 1875, was appointed attorney-general of the United States. In May, 1876, he was appointed United States minister to the court of St. James, England.

He is still living, in New York city, highly esteemed as a counsellor, and a gentleman of superior legal and scholarly attainments.

J. William Baldwin was born at New Haven, Connecticut, April 30, 1822, and was graduated at Yale college, August, 1842. After graduation, he continued to attend the law school connected with said college, until September, 1843, when he came to Ohio, and, having read law for one year, under the direction of Samuel Brush and Matthew J. Gilbert, attorneys, of Columbus, Ohio, he was admitted to the bar by the supreme court, of Ohio, at its September term, 1844, in Wayne county, Ohio. He immediately commenced the practice, at Columbus, Ohio, and has continued therein ever since, with the exception of a short period, in which he served as judge of the superior court, of Franklin county, Ohio, by appointment of Governor Tod, after the resignation of Judge Mathews.

Judge Baldwin is one of the oldest, and most experienced practitioners in the profession, and especially versed in the learning of the old system of special pleading, and has little liking for the modern innovations. He is decidedly the best chancery lawyer at the bar, in Columbus, and his services are in great demand, whenever a patient and laborious investigation of the matter is required. In 184– he married a daughter of the venerable Dr. Hoge, the pioneer minister of Presbyterianism in Central Ohio.

Otto Dressel was born September 21, 1824, in Detmald, the capital of the principality of Lippe, Germany, and only about four miles from the battle-field where, about the time of the Saviour's birth, Arminius delivered Germany from the Roman yoke, by defeating Varus and his legions. His father, Adolf Dressel, was director of the teacher's seminary at Detmald, and his mother, Caroline Dressel, was born at Siebert. He was educated at the college (Gymnasium Leupuldinum) at Detmald, from 1833 to 1842; studied law at the University of Lena from 1842 to 1845; in 1846, on State examination, at Detmald, was admitted to the bar, and the same year was appointed assisant judge of the city court at Detmald.

In 1848, he took part in the revolution, the ultimate object of which was to republicanize Germany. He was president of the Democratic central committee for the district embracing the principality of Lippe, and part of the adjacent Prussian province of Westphalia, and editor of the Wage (Scale), a Democratic newspaper. On March 24, 1849, criminal prosecution was commenced against him, on account of participation in the revolution, and, on September 24, 1849, he was sentenced to imprisonment. He barely escaped, by precipitate flight, in disguise, and taking refuge on the first vessel he reached, not knowing its destination. His pursuers were close on the track, and searched the vessel, but, by the kindness of the captain, he was concealed effectually. Fortunately, the ship was bound for the United States, and sailed for Baltimore, where he arrived the last of November, 1849, a stranger, poor and friendless; but his talents and energy were equal to the emergency. He went West, settled at Massillon, Ohio, in 1850, studied law with Hurlburt & Wales, and, in 1852, was admitted to the bar by the supreme court, under special act of the legislature, allowing him to apply for admittance, and to practice, before naturalization, and practiced law in Massillon until 1853. He then came to Columbus, and for two years practised, in partnership with Thomas Sparrow, and afterwards with Judge R. B. Warden.

In 1855 he was married to Louisa M. Silbernagel, the daughter of Jacob Silbernagel, an old and influential German citizen of Columbus.

In 1861 he was elected a represantative in the general assembly from the county of Franklin, on the Democratic ticket, and took a prominent part in that body, and was re-elected in 1863. On the fourteenth of December, 1864, he resigned his seat that he might more fully devote himself to the practice of his profession.

Columbus contains a large German population, and as a member of the board of education, Mr. Dressel has exercised a thoughtful supervision over the schools. Being a fine scholar, Mr. Dressel possesses a natural and highly cultivated taste for music, and for some years has occupied the position of musical director of the Maennerchor of Columbus. Mr. Dressel is one of the most popular and successful German stump orators in the west, and his services are in great demand by his party during political campaigns. He is a man universally held in high respect by his fellow citizens, and a good lawyer.

SAMUEL GALLOWAY was born March 20, 1811, at Gettysburg, Pennsylvania. His parents were John and Margaret (Smith) Galloway. His ancestors on the maternal side emigrated to the United Colonies early in the eighteenth century, and were then recognized as connected with that portion of the people usually called Scotch-Irish. They belonged to a good old Presbyterian stock. He lived in his native town until near his majority, obtaining his education in the schools there, and on the death of his father, who was a ruling elder in the Presbyterian church, he removed to the State of Ohio, to make his home among relatives in Highland county. From his home he entered Miami university, Oxford, and graduated with distinguished honor, in the class of 1833, and immediately entered upon the study of the law at Hillsboro. He did not at once complete his legal studies, but accepted, for a term, the chair of Greek in his Alma Mater, Miami university, and went from there to South Hanover, Indiana, to enter upon the congenial pursuits of literature and language. His success in teaching these departments is attested by his colleagues. He soon renewed and completed his preparation for the bar, during which time he became zealously identified with the Washingtonian temperance movement, of which he was a most eloquent advocate.

He was admitted to the bar, and, in 1843, began the practice of the law with Nathaniel Massie, of Chillicothe, and was distinguished as an eloquent advocate before a jury. During the same year he was chosen, by the State legislature, secretary of State, and, removing to Columbus, he entered upon the duties of his office, with the added responsibility of commissioner of common schools.

In his first report he began arranging the chaotic materials found in the crude, imperfect, and very partial reports of the county auditors and school boards, and, in conjunction with Prof. Calvin E. Stone and Horace Mann by personal exhortation and stirring addresses, successfully put in operation the system of popular education in the State, of which the people of Ohio are so justly proud.

When the slavery question loomed up, in 1832 and 1840, he promptly ranged himself in the anti-slavery ranks, though never identified with the "Liberty party," and with patriotic veneration he did not sunder the tie that bound him to the Whig party. From the outset of his political career he began to make his mark. As the eloquent speaker, he is most vividly recalled by those who knew him. No description can convey a just idea of his manner and style. No man could sway more successfully the feelings of a crowd.

In 1854–5 he represented the Columbus district in congress, and in two other congressional contests, his personal popularity was demonstrated by a large vote, irrespective of party ties. In congress, he added renown to his name, as the advocate of freedom in Kansas, and his speech on the Kansas bill was a theme for eulogy in this country, and in foreign periodicals, such as Blackwood, and the North British Review. He took a prominent part in the Ohio movement, originating in Columbus, which nominated Abraham Lincoln for president at the Chicago convention, over both Chase and Seward, and in the correspondence with Lincoln after Judge Swan's defeat for renomination, in 1859, by the ultra wing of the Republican party. During the war, Mr. Galloway received a commission as judge advocate for the examination of military and naval prisoners at Camp Chase, and in that service he continued until the close of the war, the duties of which office he performed faithfully, "with malice towards none, and charity to all." He filled the position of trustee in several of the benevolent institutions of the State, and at the time of his death, was trustee of the deaf and dumb asylum. Mr. Galloway, as a lawyer, had great power with the jury, especially in cases where his wit and inimitable humor was brought into play, and his fame as an orator will never die. That his great services were not more fully recognized by those he raised to the highest seat of power, is another illustration of the ingratitude of party leaders.

He died in 1872, at Columbus, in the fifty-first year his age. He was a prominent member of the old school Presbyterian church, and often a representative in its ecclesiastical bodies.

JAMES A. WILCOX was born in Columbus, on September 23, 1828. He is the only son of the late P. B. Wilcox, hereinbefore mentioned. In 1841 he attended school at Milnor Hall, Gambier, and completed his education at Yale college, in the class of 1850. Upon returning from college he read law under his father, and was admitted to the bar at Delaware, in 1851, and at once entered upon the practice of law with his father, at Columbus, and, in due time, established a good business. He was city solicitor of Columbus from 1854 to 1859, and, at the request of the city council, compiled, for publication, the city charter and ordinances, which had never been collated, but lay scattered through the various journals of council.

In September, 1872, while in full practice, he was appointed, by Governor Tod, colonel of the hundred and thirteenth Ohio volunteer infantry, then organizing at Camp Chase, near Columbus. Having, as a matter of recreation, given some attention to military tactics in previous years, he was soon able to bring his regiment into a fine state of discipline during the time it was stationed at Camp Chase, Camp Zanesville, and Camp Dennison.

On December 27, 1862, he was ordered from Camp Dennison to Louisville, Kentucky, where danger was anticipated from a raid by Morgan. In January, 1863, he moved his regiment from Louisville to Muldraugh's Hills, a wild region thirty miles south of Louisville, on the Louisville & Nashville railrod, where he remained about a month, guarding the reconstruction of the railroad trestles there, which had just been destroyed by Morgan. Then he was ordered back to Louisville, and from there to Nashville, Tennessee, by river, forming a part of a re-inforcement of about twenty thousand men sent "to the front" under General Crook, and from Nashville to Franklin, Tennessee.

Soon after his arrival, he was prostrated with camp fever, and lay for about two months in hospital at Nashville. Being entirely incapacitated to endure the exposure and hardships of a soldier's life in the field, and his father, having suddenly died in the meantime, he resigned, in April, 1863, and returned home.

Finding the practice of law dull in those war times, he accepted the office of United States provost marshal for the seventh (Columbus) district, where he served until September 3, 1864, when, without any solicitation on his part, and upon the urgent recommendation of Governor Brough, who was much dissatisfied with the conduct of that branch of the service, he was promoted by the secretary of war to the office of United States assistant provost-marshal-general of the State, which also embraced the duties of superintendent of recruiting and chief mustering and disbursing officer; and, afterward, when General Cox took his seat as governor, he was also assigned, in his place, to the command of the military district of Ohio.

In these several capacities he had charge over all the camps and troops in the State, as well as of the draft, arrest of deserters, recruiting and equipping new regiments and forwarding them to the field; and, upon the close of the war, of receiving, paying, mustering out and sending to their homes all the Ohio troops—duties which were difficult and arduous, and, at times, when political excitement ran high, not without peril to those who enforced military law.

He pursued a steady and firm course through all the difficulties of the situation, guided by his knowledge of law, as well as military affairs, and integrity of purpose, so that even the most "disaffected" had no just cause to complain of his administration, or of the extraordinary power in his hands.

At the close of the war, on October 19, 1865, he was mustered out of the service, having been brevetted brigadier general by the department, "for meritorious services in the recruitment of the armies of the United States," forwarded to him with the complimentary notification that his office had ranked second in the United States for promptness, fidelity, and efficiency in its management.

He immediately resumed the practice of law in Columbus, which he pursued with fair success, gradualiy building up a good business, and was appointed United States commissioner for the southern district of Ohio, in 1869. In August, 1872, he accepted the position of general attorney of the Columbus & Hocking Valley and Columbus & Toledo railroad companies, tendered him by their president, M. M. Greene, gave up his practice, and has since devoted his time to the duties of that office.

In 1874, he compiled the "Railroad Laws of Ohio," with annotations of the decisions of courts, which was published by Clarke & Co., of Cincinnati, and has proved a valuable assistance to lawyers and others engaged in railroad business.

In 1853 he married Lucy, daughter of Joseph Sullivant, of Columbus, and has four children—a daughter, Mary, married to A. H. Morehead, son of the late Governor Morehead, of Kentucky, and three boys—James B., Starling S., and Sherlock A.

He is a member and vestryman of Trinity Episcopal church, in the room of his father before him.

HERMAN B. ALBERY was born in Wayne county, Ohio, January 23, 1826. His parents were Peter Albery and Esther (Braun) Albery, and he came with them to Jefferson township, Franklin county, Ohio, in 1828. He was brought up on a farm, and, from the time he was able to do anything, engaged in all the work incident to farm life and labor. He was educated chiefly in common schools, supplemented by some academical or select school advantages, and private instructions under the tuition of a fine scholar and teacher, Uz Freeman. Mr. Albery taught the common school in his home district, in Jefferson township, in the winter of 1844-5; also taught district school in the winter of 1848-9, in Jefferson township, Franklin county, and in the winter of 1852-3 in Jersey, Licking county. He went to the State of Kentucky in the spring of 1846, and during the year 1846 and part of 1847, had charge of a school in Bourbon county, Kentucky, called "Cane Ridge Seminary." He resigned his position in that school and returned to Ohio in 1847. He went to California in March, 1850, and returned in 1852, with the benefit of a good deal of rough experience in his quest of the golden fleece, and but little else, except improved health. Mr. Albery had read a very little law previous to his trip to California. His first regular study of the law, with the expectation of becoming, at sometime, qualified to practice, was in 1852. Then Judge Joseph R. Swan and Hon. John W. Andrews, at the time partners in the practice, kindly loaned him some elementary books, and he has ever since gratefully regarded them as his first preceptors in the law. But in June, 1853, he was appointed clerk of the probate court of Franklin county, Ohio, by Hon, William R. Rankin, then judge of that court, and from that time until his admission to the bar, he prosecuted his legal studies under Judge Rankin and Fitch James Mathews, afterwards judge of the Franklin county superior court. Mr. Albery was greatly assisted in his studies by the use of books, which he was unable to buy, from the library of Messrs. Swayne & Baber. He was admitted to the bar at Columbus in the fall of 1855, and, except during the time he was on the bench, has practiced in Franklin and adjoining counties. He held the position of clerk of the probate court of Franklin county under Judges Rankin and Jamison nearly three years. He was appointed a member of the board of school examiners of Franklin county in 1855, and resigned after holding the office for a little more than a year. He was elected judge of the probate court of Franklin county in October, 1857, and re-elected in October, 1860, serving two terms.

On retiring from the office of probate judge, in February, 1864, he engaged in, and has ever since devoted himself to the practice. He was appointed director of the in Ohio penitentiary by Governor (now President) Hayes, 1876, and held the position two years. He is one of the trustees of Green Lawn cemetery. He was married to Julia Frances Smith, October 14, 1847; she died April 14, 1865. He married his present wife, Clara Smith, July 29, 1867. He had two children by his first wife—Faxon F. D. Albery, a lawyer, and William H. Albery, assistant cashier of the Commercial bank. He has no children by his present wife.

Judge Albery enjoys a large practice, especially in the settlement of estates and chancery business, and possesses the universal respect of the community.

John M. Pugh, son of David Pugh and Jane (Murphy) Pugh, was born November 7, 1823. His parents were among the pioneers of the country. His father emigrated from Radnorshire, Wales, in 1801, and in 1802 first settled in what was then Ross county, now Delaware county, which was then a wilderness, and had the township named Radnor, after Radnorshire, Wales, and in 1814 moved in what is now Truro township, Franklin county, Ohio, eight miles east of the city of Columbus, on what is now Broad street, and was largely engaged in farming. He died in 1857, in the eighty-ninth year of his age.

Judge Pugh received an elementary education, in the common schools, taught a year, and in 1848 commenced the study of the law, in the office of Samuel Brush, in Columbus, and was admitted to the bar in 1851, and the same year was elected clerk, for Montgomery township. In 1853 he was elected auditor of Franklin, and re-elected in 1855. Upon the expiration of his term, as auditor, he entered into the active practice of his profession, in the city of Columbus.

In 1863 he was elected to the office of probate judge, and has since been re-elected four times, filling the position, which requires large business qualifications, in a great railroad centre like Columbus, fifteen years in succession. On the expiration of his last term, he opened a law office in Columbus, in partnership with his son, John C. L. Pugh, a graduate of Princeton College, and the firm is largely employed in business connected with the settlement of estates. Judge Pugh has been prominently identified in many of the most important public improvemens in central Ohio, and always takes an active interest in every thing that will tend to the development of the interests of Franklin county.

For ten years he was the treasurer of the Franklin County Agricultural society, from 1861, and was made its president, subsequently. In 1874, he was elected a member of the State board of agriculture, and in that position has done much to improve the State fair at Columbus. In 1875, he was appointed, by Governor Allen, one of the trustees of the State reform farm, near Lancaster, re-appointed by Governor R. B. Hayes, and, again, by Governor Bishop. Judge Pugh ranks as one of our most public-spirited citizens, with an indomitable perseverance, that promises success in whatever he undertakes. He was married, December 25, 1851, to Martha F. Cook, of Delaware, Ohio, who has had by him eight children, seven of whom are living—four sons and three daughters.

James L. Bates was born near Canandaigua, New York, June 4, 1815. His father was Stephen Bates, and his mother Naomi Bates; the former from Granville, Massachusetts, and the latter from Guilford, Connecticut, both descendants from old revolutionary stock. His grandfather settled in New York, in 1790, where he was born.

He was educated at the Canandaigua academy, and Geneva college, New York; read law with John C. Spencer two years; came to Columbus in October, 1835, and read a year with Orris Parish and N. H. Swayne, and was admitted to the bar in the winter of 1837; commenced practice, and formed a partnership with N. H. Swayne, in the spring of 1847, which continued until he was elected, in 1851, on the adoption of the present constitution, judge of the common pleas, for the third subdivision of the fifth judicial district, composed of the counties of Pickaway, Franklin and Madison, and was re-elected in 1856, and 1861, the last time without opposition—a handsome compliment in a district politically against him, serving thus fifteen years continuously. Judge Bates made a safe and excellent judge, was a sturdy worker, and alone did the business of the three counties, satisfactorily, without allowing the docket to accumulate, with undisposed business. The population of the district has increased about thirty per cent. since he left the bench, and the judicial force tripled, but the docket is not kept down, as it used to be, under the old-fashioned system, of compelling every case to be tried, continued or dismissed.

Judge Bates held the office of director, of the Ohio penitentiary, from 1866 to 1874, and was a member of the board of education, of the city of Columbus, from 1844, six years, consecutively, being secretary of the board, the first four years. He was active in advancing the city school system, of Columbus, to a high state of perfection.

On October 18, 1837, he was united in marriage to Miss Maria Kelley, eldest daughter of Hon. Alfred Kelley, one of theablest and most prominent men in Ohio.

Since Judge Bates has retired from the bench, he has principally been employed in the management and settlement of large estates involving the interests of minors and widows, without engaging in general practice. His straightforward honesty and known integrity especially qualify him for trusts of this kind, and the community where he has lived over forty years, fully appreciate the fact.

LORENZO ENGLISH, son of John English and Laura (Sweet) English, was born in Herkimer county, New York, May 22, 1819, on a farm, and lived thereon until the spring of 1837, when he removed, with his father's family, to Mt. Vernon, Knox county, Ohio, traveling, all the way in a wagon, the bad roads of that day. He worked, then, for two years, at ordinary labor, such as driving a team between Mt. Vernon and Newark, hauling produce to the canal, and returning with goods.

Having had the advantage of a good common school education in New York, he determined to pursue a college course, went to Oberlin in the spring of 1839, worked for his board at the college farm, and taught school in the winters of 1839–40 and 1840–41, and graduated in August, 1843.

He came to Columbus in September, 1843, studied law in the office of Edwards Pierrepoint, afterwards attorney general of the United States, and was admitted to the bar in September, 1845, by the supreme court, at Mt. Vernon, Knox county, and entered at once upon the practice of the law, at Columbus. He formed a partnership with B. F. Martin, in 1847. In 1850, he was elected mayor of Columbus, and held the office, by successive re-elections, until the sping of 1861, once as an independent candidate, beating the regular nominees of both the Whig and Democratic parties—a decided proof of his popularity with the mass of the people. Mr. English, after retiring from the office of mayor, occupied the same office with Judge J. William Baldwin, though they were never partners. His practice has continually been on the increase, as he enjoys the confidence, especially, of the business men of the community, as a wise and safe legal adviser, in whose hands his client's interest will never suffer from neglect.

Mr. English is an industrious lawyer, preparing his cases carefully, and presents them forcibly to the court and jury; is popular with his brethren of the bar, and is employed, on one side or the other, in most of the important cases in the Franklin common pleas court.

In the spring of 1869 he was elected to the city council from the fourth ward, (which is politically opposed to him), and county treasurer in October, 1870, by eight hundred majority, where there is over one thousand, eight hundred majority for the opposite party politically. In the congressional election of 1878 he carried, as an Independent candidate, the city of Columbus by forty-two majority, though the Democratic State ticket had eight hundred and sixty-six majority at the same polls.

Mr. English was married first, in September, 1852, to Cynthia A. Cole, who died in 1855, and a second time, in April, 1859, to Mary Keen. One child by the first wife and five by the second are still living.

The chief cause of his success in life lies in the fact that he has been the architect of his own fortune, and that he is always true to his friends, and his confidence cannot be shaken in those he knows, by the tongues of evil disposed mischief makers.

STACY TAYLOR, son of Stacy and Ruth Taylor was born, August 6, 1806, in Loudon county, Virginia, and was educated at Locust Thicket Academy, near Hillsborough—a Quaker school. He was married in May, 1820, to Mary Hollingsworth; he taught school, and moved to Clarksville, Clinton county, Ohio, where he took charge of a graded school, in December, 1826. He remained there two years, and moved to St. Marys, Knox county, in 1828; he commenced the study of law with Judge Brown, of Dayton, and was admitted to the bar by the supreme court in circuit, in 182–, Judges Hitchcock and Jones on the bench. He was elected circuit judge by the legislature, in 1830; resigned in 1835, and was elected to the house of representatives in the general assembly—the sole member from the counties of Darke, Shelby, Mercer, Allen, Van Wert, Putnam, Williams and Lucas, on the Whig ticket, and re-elected in 1837. He was the first mayor of St. Marys, and practiced law there. In 1846, he removed to Columbus, and has practiced law there ever since. Mr. Taylor is a veteran practitioner before justices' courts, where he especially delighted in pricking up the young fledglings of the bar, making their debut before his favorite court, in which his opinions were wont to carry the weight of law. He is one of the few old pioneers left, and is still in a good state of preservation, in his seventy-third year.

WILLIAM DENNISON was born in Cincinnati, December 23, 1815. His father was a native of New Jersey; emigrated to Ohio, and became a prominent business man in the Miami valley; his mother was of New England descent. He graduated from Miami University with distinction, in 1835, and became a student in the office of Nathaniel G., father of George H. Pendleton; he was admitted to the bar in 1840, and soon thereafter married Anne Eliza Neil, daughter of William Neil, of Columbus, and commenced the practice of law in that city, which he diligently pursued until 1848, when he was elected to the senate, on the Whig ticket, from the district composed of the counties of Franklin and Delaware. He was nominated for president of that body by his party, and came very near being elected, and during his service in the general assembly took a very prominent and influential part in all its proceedings.

In the spring of 1850 he resumed his law practice, and in 1852 accepted the presidency of the Exchange bank, of Columbus; was chosen president of the Columbus & Xenia railroad, and from that time forth became actively engaged as a director in all the railway lines centering in Columbus. His prominence in the politics of the State and his popularity with his party increased constantly. In 1859, after a warm contest with his distinguished opponent, Judge Rufus P. Ranney, in which he held a series of joint debates, the result of which wonderfully surprised even his political friends; he was elected governor of Ohio by over fifteen thousand majority, succeeding Salmon P. Chase in 1860.

During the war of the rebellion he gave his most vigorous support to the cause of the Union, and by promptly filling the call for troops did much to make Ohio's reputation in the war, and saved West Virginia from the control of the Confederate government, by sending thither Ohio volunteers.

He was president of the convention which renominated Abraham Lincoln and made Andrew Johnson vice-president, mainly by the unanimous support of the Ohio delegation.

On Montgomery Blair retiring from the cabinet as postmaster-general, Governor Dennison was appointed his successor. President Johnson retained him in that position, but differing with the president on his southern policy, he resigned, and returned to his home in Columbus, and passed several years in private life.

In 1875 he was appointed, by President Grant, a member of the commission to examine into the financial affairs of the District of Columbia, and in this occupation aided in bringing something like order out of chaos.

Governor Dennison is a man of courtly manners and dignified presence, and popular with all who have the pleasure of his acquaintance. He is now living at his home in Columbus, and possesses the universal esteem of his fellow citizens.

Joseph H. Geiger was born November 11, 1818, in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania; was educated at the academy of Alfred Brooks, in Harrisburg, and graduated in September, 1836; went to Philadelphia and read law with John M. Read, then United States district attorney, and afterwards chief justice of Pennsylvania. He came to Circleville, Ohio, July 1, 1836, and read law with Judge John L. Green eighteen months, and was admitted to the bar at Cincinnati in 1840, and elected prosecuting attorney of Pickaway county in October, 1840, and served one term. In 1850 he was elected senator from Ross and Pickaway, on the Whig ticket. He came to Columbus in March, 1852, to practice law; formed a partnership with Elijah Backus, esq., and has lived here since. He was appointed clerk of the United States circuit court in June, 1862, and held the office twenty months.

General Geiger is one of the most effective speakers at the bar, and possesses great powers of wit and ridicule. He is a formidable opponent before a jury, and a favorite speaker with the people, before whom he is often invited to lecture on temperance and other topics. It is sufficient to draw a large crowd anywhere to let it be known that "Joe," as he is familiarly called, is going to speak. He has been married three times.

Llewellyn Baber was born at Ronton, a country seat in Jefferson county, Virginia, near Summit Point, on August 3, 1823, being the only son of Rev. James Baber, an old school Presbyterian minister, and of Maria Jordan Llewellyn, a woman of sincere piety and great intelligence. His maternal ancestor, John Llewellyn, came to America with Lord Baltimore in 1634, and the family settled in St. Mary's county, Maryland, at the organization of the colony, where they held large grants of land. Richard Llewellyn, his grandfather, removed from Virginia to Kentucky, in 1818, and died there, in Louisville, in 1832. His father was born in Hanover county, Virginia, in 1794, and was a descendent of the earliest English settlers. He died at Columbus, Ohio, in the seventieth year of his age, August 19, 1863, his mother having died in Virginia, October 6, 1850.

Col. Baber's education was conducted by his mother until he was nine years old, and by his father subsequently, who was a fine classical scholar. While his father was in charge of the Presbyterian church at Carmichaeltown, Greene county, Pennsylvania, he was sent to the academy, in 1836–8; and to the thorough drilling in Latin syntax and Greek roots, received from its worthy principal, Mr. Lochran, and his assistant, Mr. McFarland, since a Presbyterian minister, he owes the habit of investigating everything thoroughly, until the facts are dug out. In 1838 his father returned to Jefferson county, Virginia, and his preparation for college was completed at the Berryville academy, Clark county, Virginia, and at two private schools, taught respectively by Messrs. Caldwell and Hitchcock, both graduates of Amherst college, Massachusetts, and thorough teachers in mathematics and the languages. In June, 1831, he entered Princeton college, New Jersey, in the sophomore class, half advanced, and graduated in September, 1843, with the honors of Greek orator.

On leaving college he came to Columbus, Ohio, and commenced, in January, to read law in the office of N. H. Swayne, now an associate justice of the supreme court of the United States, whose wife is a relative. His going to Ohio was decided by a mother's influence; she belonged to the old school of Virginia emancipationists, and under the belief that civil strife must eventually follow in the slaveholding States of the South, unless the institution was put into process of extinction, desired her son's destiny to be with the far west. Columbus was comparatively a small town, when he entered upon the study of the law, in the office of Swayne & Bates, but the holding of the supreme court of the State, the United States courts, and the sessions of the legislature, brought Ewing, Stanbery, Walker, Wright, Spalding, and many other distinguished lawyers, to the capital, and afforded a diligent student most excellent opportunities for preparing himself for practice.

He was admitted to the bar at the December term, 1845, of the supreme court, on the circuit of Lancaster, Ohio, after a rigid examination.

He first commenced practice in Piqua, Miami county, in May, 1846. He removed to Xenia, January 1, 1847, and remained there until 1850, when he opened a law office in Columbus, and in January, 1853, became the law partner of N. H. Swayne, on the election of James L. Bates, esq., to the common pleas bench.

For seven years he continued in the laborious practice of the profession, in the firm of Swayne & Baber, which was engaged in most of the important cases in court. The preparation of cases for trial, by hunting up the testimony, arranging the evidence, and securing the witnesses, devolved mainly on him, as junior partner. He also took an equal part in presenting the authorities, and arguing the cases in hand, in connection with Judge Swayne, a discipline and experience which have been of infinite service to him, professionally. In the spring of 1860, the partnership was dissolved, and in the fall of that year, Col. Baber was engaged in stumping the State, as one of the presidential electors on the Lincoln ticket. From boyhood he had always evinced a decided taste for politics, and was a decided Whig, but conservative in his ideas.

In 1846, during the Mexican war, he took sides with that wing of the party which was in favor of prosecuting the war vigorously, and holding the party in power responsible after it was over; consequently he was a warm supporter of the nomination of General Taylor for president, and labored to secure it. Dissatisfied with the "old fogy" doctrine of the danger of the acquisition of territory, he wrote, on July 22, 1846, at Piqua, Ohio, an article for the Ohio Statesman—the Democratic State organ, then edited by the Messrs. Huswells—in favor of the acquisition of California, by treaty, and the application to the territory acquired, of the provision of the ordinance of 1787, forbidding slavery, arguing that the South had no right to complain that slavery was prevented from being introduced into territory where it did not exist, as it was a State, not a national, institution. This article was written before the introduction of the Wilmot proviso into congress, and was published over the signature "H," in the Ohio Statesman, August 28, 1846, under the editorial head. This doctrine was practically carried out in the admission of California as a free State, and thus opening up the great Pacific slope by a railroad across the continent.

Before the nomiuation of Taylor and Fillmore by the Whig national convention, at Philadelphia, in an article advocating their nomination he set out a table of the probable electoral vote by States, which was afterwards verified in detail by the returns, except that Taylor and Fillmore carried Florida, which gave them three additional electoral votes. His subsequent course as president, in opposition to Toombs and other ultraists, proved that, like "Old Hickory," he would stand by the Union at all hazards. In 1853, upon the repeal of the Missouri compromise, Col. Baber, who had been secretary of the old Whig State central committee, labored for a co-operation of all the opponents of the repeal in the anti-Nebraska movement. In 1855 he declined to support Chase for governor, on account of his course when elected United States senator in 1849, under the Townshend and Morse bargain and sale. He refused to affiliate with the Know-Nothing movement, and was one of the few hundred old Whigs of Franklin county that stuck to their allegience to the last.

In 1859, when Chase, Seward, Bates and Cameron were rivals for the presidential nomination, the thought occurred to him, after reading the Douglas-Lincoln debate, reported in the Chicago Tribune, that Abraham Lincoln would be the most available candidate. He communicated this opinion to Hon. Samuel Galloway and it was agreed that he should write Lincoln on the subject, which he did. Lincoln responded in a letter, dated July 28, 1859, disapproving of the action of the Republican convention, repudiating Judge Swan for a judicial decision, urging that the Republican national convention should take a conservative course in making the fight against the extension of slavery, adding that he "was not fit for president." This led to his invitation to Ohio, to take part in the gubernatorial contest in 1859, and the subsequent publication of the famous Douglas-Lincoln debates, by special invitation of the Republican State central committee State officers, in all of which Colonel Baber's active agency is well known. The nomination of Lincoln at the Chicago convention was owing to the movement in Ohio, and the strong support she gave him in that body. In the presidential election he carried the State by over forty thousand majority.

At the commencement of the war, Colonel Baber was appointed paymaster in the United States army, and brevetted lieutenant-colonel for military services. He was stationed first at Washington, then ordered to Cumberland Gap with General George W. Morgan, and finally to New Orleans, in October, 1863, where he remained on duty until June, 1864, spending a large part of his time in the field with General Washburn in the Bayou Teche country. From New Orleans, he was transferred to Cincinnati, and put in charge of Camp Dennison until mustered out. He took an active agency in securing the nomination of Andrew Johnson for vice president in place of Hamlin, which was effected by the solid vote of the Ohio delegation in the Baltimore convention in 1864.

He sympathized with the Philadelphia convention movement, in 1866, believing the only wise plan was to adhere to the old "Lincoln policy." It being ignored by the Republican leaders, in their fight against President Johnson, he, with others who had voted with the Union organization, in 1867 supported the Democratic ticket, assisting in defeating negro suffrage by fifty thousand majority, and securing the election of Allen G. Thurman to the United States senate, in place of Benj. F. Wade. Since then, Col. Baber has been an active member of the Democratic party. He was elected a representative in the general assembly, from Franklin county, in October, 1869, and took a prominent part in the proceedings. On September 24, 1871, an act was passed, introduced by him, to protect political organizations from fraud in their primary nominations, which, under the familiar title of the "Baber law," is used largely by both parties in their nominations, especially in cities. In 1873, he was chosen a delegate, from Franklin county, to the constitutional convention, and took a prominent part in its debates and proceedings. The judicial article adopted being, substantially, his proposition, introduced early in the session.

In 1875, as a member of the executive committee of six, appointed at a meeting of the bar of the State, to secure judicial relief, he drafted the constitutional amendment creating the judicial committee of five, with like powers as the supreme court, to dispose of the old business on the docket of that court, then five years in arrears.

By his activity, the amendment was submitted by the legislature, with only two dissenting votes, and indorsed by all the judges of the supreme court, in a correspondence with the committee, recommending its adoption. It was printed on both party tickets, and ratified by the elections in October, 1875, only ninety-eight thousand votes being cast against it, out of six hundred thousand polled, the only amendment to the present constitution ever ratified. It proved a most salutary relief. The commission appointed, cleared up all the old cases adjudged to them within the three years.

On the resignation of his seat in congress by Hon. Hugh J. Jewett, at the Democratic minority convention to fill the vacancy, he received seventy-three votes, to seventy-five cast for Hon. Wm. E. Fink. He is still practicing law in Columbus, and has the reputation of being an able orator and debater, as well as an industrious lawyer.

Henry C. Noble was born in Lancaster, Fairfield county, Ohio, on the twenty-eighth day of February, 1826. His parents were John and Catharine (McDill) Noble. His father and grandfather, originally of Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, emigrated to Ohio in 1811, from Hagerstown, Maryland. In March, 1832, his father and family removed to Columbus, Ohio, where they resided until 1840, when they removed to Cincinnati. In 1845 the family returned to Columbus, and again to Cincinnati, in 1846, whence, after a few years residence, from 1846 to 1851, they finally returned to Columbus.

Henry C. Noble attended such private schools as were then to be had, in Lancaster and Columbus. Upon removing to Cincinnati, in 1840, he attended the Cincinnati college, and for the first time, had the benefit of wider instruction. Prof. Orsmby Mitchell, afterwards distinguished as a general in the war of the rebellion, was his instructor in mathematics, for whom he formed a warm attachment, and to whom he attributes a great influence in forming his character.

In 1841 he entered a store in Columbus, for a year, to acquire knowledge of practical business, but cheerfully returned to the Cincinnati college, where he continued until the spring of 1843. He then entered the junior class, in Miami university, and graduated in 1845; came at once to Columbus, where he has ever since resided, and, in the fall of 1845, commenced the study of law with Edwards Pierrepont and Thomas Sparrow, who were then partners. After a few months, he entered the office of Henry Stanbery, who had just been elected the first attorney-general of the State of Ohio, and completed his law studies with him, and remained in his office until he left Columbus. He was admitted to the bar on the fourteenth day of December, 1848, by the supreme court of Ohio, and has continued in the practice without interruption ever since. In the beginning of his practice, Mr. Noble had a large number of patent cases in the United States courts, then held in Columbus. After these courts were removed, he gave up the practice, and has confined himself, with very few exceptions, to the practice of law, in Franklin county, and his own cases in the supreme court of Ohio.

Henry C. Noble was married on the twenty-eighth day of September, 1848, to Elizabeth J. Edmiston, the daughter of Dr. John M. Edmiston and Matilda J. (Gwynne) Edmiston, who were among the first settlers in Columbus. Mr. Noble's practice was a very general one, including some important criminal cases, until 1876, when he retired from general practice, confining his attention to special cases and business affairs. He was city solicitor for a short time in 1856, and trustee for the Institution of the Blind from 1866 to 1878, during which time the main building was erected. Mr. Noble, from the time he commenced practice, devoted himself exclusively to his profession, and his successful career is another example that the law bestows its favors chiefly on its own devotees. The universal respect in which he is held by all classes of the community, and the confidence his brethren of the bar place in his varied and high legal integrity, are the just rewards of a life devoted to the duties of his profession. Mr. Noble is a zealous and active member of the First Presbyterian church.

Fitch James Mathews, son of Matthew Mathews and Lucy (Kilbourn) Mathews, was born at Worthington, Franklin county, Ohio, November 17, 1818. His father was from Milford, Otsego county, New York, and his mother, a daughter of James Kilbourn, from Connecticut, one of the first settlers in that part of the country. His father moved to Columbus in 1822, and formed a partnership with Jurl Brothers in the mercantile business.

Young Mathews went first to a school supported by private subscription, and taught by Cyrus Parker, and completed his education at Gambier, in 1838–9.

In the fall of 1839 he commenced the study of the law with P. B. Wilcox, and in 1841 was admitted to the bar. He formed a partnership in the practice of the law at Columbus, with A. B. Buttles, and then with William R. Rankin, in 1850, and after Rankin was elected probate judge, in 1851, with Samuel Galloway, which continued until he was elected judge of the superior court, in April, 1857. He was re-elected without opposition in April, 1862, and resigned shortly afterwards, his health being very bad, and removed to Dayton, Ohio, where he died, May 4, 1866.

Judge Mathews was an excellent lawyer, and possessed in a large degree the confidence of the people. He had an affable manner, which endeared him to all who knew him. He performed well his duties on the bench, and his decisions bore the impress of a fairness and honesty, that satisfied even the litigants and their counsel of the impartiality of his judgments. His death, at the early age of forty-eight, caused universal regret in his large circle of connections and friends.

Judge Mathews was married three times: On October 13, 1842, to Louisa, daughter of William W. Irwin, a distinguished lawyer of Lancaster, Ohio; on September 7, 1847, to Elizabeth Ralston, and on May 30, 1857, to Augusta Parrott, of Dayton, Ohio. The only surviving children—Edwin Parrott, Lucy Kilbourn and George Thomas Mathews—are the issue of the last marriage.

Benjamin F. Martin was born on the twenty-second of June, 1819, in Columbus, Ohio. His parents, William T. and Amelia Martin, were pioneers in the city of Columbus, having emigrated from Bedford county, Pennsylvania, in 1815, first to New Philadelphia, Tuscarawas county, and, early in the spring of the same year, to Columbus, which had only been laid out in the spring of 1812. He received his early education mainly in the common schools, and attended the Blendon academy, at Westerville, Franklin county, now known as Central college. After leaving college he was appointed clerk of the city council of Columbus, in 1840, and continued, by reappointment, until 1857. He was also deputy clerk of the court of common pleas, and while prosecuting the duties of that office, he read law with Judge Mathews. He finished his course of reading in 1847; and in November of that year was admitted by the supreme court, and commenced the practice of his profession in partnership with Lorenzo English, which partnership continued nearly twelve years.

In the fall of 1850 Mr. Martin was elected prosecuting attorney of Franklin county, on the Whig ticket, and re-elected again in 1852. The old system of criminal law was then in force, and in the discharge of his duties, as prosecutor, he never failed on account of his indictments not sticking.

He continued the practice of law until August, 1865, when he was appointed, by President Johnson, to the office of collector of internal revenue for the seventh district of Ohio, which he held until 1869, when he was removed by President Grant. Mr. Martin has dealt largely in real estate in and about his native city, as his many "additions to Columbus" bear evidence. He has faithfully and honestly performed the various public duties and trusts committed to his charge, and won a high reputation for his integrity and qualifications in the management of large monied interests.

James Overton Reamey, son of Col. Daniel Reamey and Susannah Lyne Starling, was born in Henry county, Virginia, October 17, 1832. His father was of French Huguenot descent, and from 1559, when they gave in their adherence to the "Confession of Faith," set forth by the national synod of the reformed churches in France, took part in all the bloody contests in France, under the Protestant banner. After the repeal of the edict of Nantes, in 1655, Jean, second son of Ravul De Reamey, of Piccadilly, with other exiles, settled in South Carolina, about 1690–2. Pierre, son of Jean, afterwards removed to Loudon county, Virginia, and is the ancestor of the Henry county family of Reamey, and Col. Daniel Reamey was one of his descendants. In 1848, a short time before his death, his grand-uncle, Mr. Lyne Starling, sent for him, in order (if he found him worthy), that he might be educated for a profession. His manly bearing, and personal qualities, at once won the hearts of his Ohio relatives, and he was educated at Kenyon College. He read law with Swan & Andrews, was admitted to the bar in ——, and served a term in the clerk's office, as an assistant clerk, to make himself familiar with forms and practices. In 1856 he was elected prosecuting attorney of Franklin county, re-elected in 1858, and again in 1860, serving six years in succession. He discharged the duties of the office with success and fidelity, and to the satisfaction of the people, as is demonstrated by the fact that he was the first prosecuting attorney in Franklin county that was ever elected for three terms.

On May 18, 1861, he married Alice DeForrest Hayden, the attractive daughter of Peter Hayden, esq., and soon afterwards took charge of the largest and most extensive coal mines in the Hocking valley, and the property of Mr. Hayden. Here he had a career of usefulness opened before him, leading to wealth and influence. Of apparently vigorous constitution, handsome person and popular manners, he seemed destined to a long life of honor and enjoyment. But he was suddenly cut down in the fortieth year of his age, August 30, 1872. The regret expressed at his death was universal. He was an honorable, high-minded gentleman, scorning, in his soul, every thing like deceit, meanness, littleness, falsehood or equivocation; true to his friends, and loved and respected by them. He leaves one surviving child—Alice B. Reamey —born October 18, 1865.

Chauncey N. Olds was born at Marlboro, Vermont, February 2, 1816. When four years of age his father removed from Vermont to Ohio, and located on a farm in Cuyahoga county, a few miles south of Cleveland. At the age of fourteen he removed, with his father's family, to Circleville, in Pickaway county, visiting and passing through Columbus for the first time in the month of May, 1830. In the fall of that year he began his academical course at the Ohio university, Athens, for three years. At the end of the sophomore year, his close application to study had so impaired his health that he was obliged to suspend his college studies for a year. In the fall of 1834 he entered the junior class in Miami university, at Oxford, Ohio, and graduated in 1836, with the highest honors of his class. He was at once called to a tutorship in the college, and in the following year was elected to a full professorship, in the chair of Latin language and literature, which he occupied until 1840, when failing health again compelled him to abandon the sedentary life of a college recluse. He had already commenced the study of the law, which he pursued the following year in the office of an older brother, Joseph Olds, at Circleville, Ohio, and was admitted to the bar by the supreme court of Ohio, on the circuit sitting at Newark, in the spring of 1842. He entered at once on the practice of the law in partnership with his brother, at Circleville, where he resided until the spring of 1856, when he removed to Columbus, which he has since made his home, and where he is still engaged in professional pursuits.

He was twice elected to the general assembly, from the district composed of the counties of Ross and Pickaway, and served in the legislature in the years 1848, 1849 and 1850, the last term in the senate, during the heated political controversy that grew out of the (so-called) "Hamilton county question," and under circumstances which gave him great prominence in that body. But he had little taste for political life, and resigned his seat in the senate, towards the close of the year 1850, and has repeatedly declined all political preferment and public office since that time; except that by appointment of Governor Tod, he acted as commissioner for exemptions from draft, in 1863, and under appointment by Governor Brough, he held the office of attorney-general, for the year 1865, and, by like appointment, held the office of trustee for one of the benevolent institutions of the State, for ten years. During the first and second years of the great rebellion, he also devoted a large part of his time to the discussion, before the people, of the patriotic duties of citizenship, and the heresy of State rights, when in conflict with national sovereignty, and in its assaults on the life of the nation.

During the course of a very active professional life, Mr. Olds has given much time and labor to the cause of popular education, of temperance, and Sunday-school and church work, having been called to deliver many literary addresses af college commencements, to take part in teachers' and Sunday-school conventions, in the work of young men's Christian associations, and other christian and church work. When most actively engaged in such labors, he has delivered as many as fifty or sixty addresses and speeches in a single year.

In 1839, three years after his graduation from college, he received the second degree, of A. M., from his alma mater, and was a trustee of that institution, by appointment of the State authorities, for twenty-five years. He has been elected an honorary member of many college societies, and in 1869, received, from Marietta college, the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws.

He became a member of the Presbyterian church at the age of sixteen, and has held the office of ruling elder in that church, for the last forty years, being first elected at the age of twenty-three. He has been frequently chosen as a delegate to the presbyteries and synods of that association, and has served several times as commissioner, in the general assembly, the highest judiciatory of that church. In 1877 he was appointed, by the general assembly, a delegate to the Pan Presbyterian council, which met at Edinburgh, Scotland, in July of that year. This council was composed of three hundred and thirty-three delegates, representing all parts of Christendom, and was in session about two weeks. In connection with this trip, he spent several months in travel through Great Britain, and on the continent. At the last general assembly, he was again appointed a delegate to this triennial council, which is to meet in the city of Philadelphia, in September, 1880.

He has been actively engaged in the general practice of his profession, at Columbus, since 1856, and, for the last nine years, has also acted as solicitor, for the Pittsburgh, Cincinnati & St. Louis railway company, having charge of their litigated business in the courts of this county.

Mr. Olds is, undoubtedly, the most accomplished orator, and best belles-lettres scholar, at the Franklin bar, and, at the same time, learned in the legal lore of the books, which enables him to command the best class of professional business.

WRAY THOMAS, son of Benajah and Rhoda Thomas, was born in Richmond, Virginia, June 15, 1810, and was admitted to the bar, in 1832, at Richmond, having studied law under John G. Williams, esq., of that city. He came to Ohio, and settled in Columbus, in the year 1833, and practiced law, in partnership with an old schoolmate, John D. Munford, deceased; afterwards, he engaged in the sale of Virginia military lands, with Lyne Starling. He was elected a representative in the general assembly, in 1850, on the Whig ticket, from Franklin and Delaware counties, and was mayor of Columbus from 1851 to 1865. His ancestors, on his father's side, were from Plymouth, Massachusetts, one of them being Ruth White, a descendant of Peregrine White, the first child born in the colony of Plymouth. Mr. Thomas has retired from the practice of the law.

KENDALL THOMAS was born in Richmond, Virginia, in July, 1821; joined his brother, Wray Thomas, in Columbus, in 1829; studied law with John W. Andrews, and was admitted to the bar in the fall of 1842. He was elected, in 1851, the first clerk, under the new constitution, and was also ex officio clerk of the common pleas court. He was married, in 18—, to a daughter of William Miner, clerk of the United States circuit and district courts, and died at Columbus, in February, 1878.

ALBERT B. BUTTLES, son of Joel Buttles, was born April 25, 1823. He was educated at the preparatory school at Gambier, entered Yale college, Connecticut, and graduated in 1842. He attended the law course three years at Yale, and was admitted to the bar, in Connecticut, in 1845, and afterwards by the superior court of Ohio.

He formed a partnership with Fitch James Mathews, and immediately commenced the practice of the law in Columbus. The partnership was dissolved in 1850, and Mr. Buttles practiced alone until 1854, when he was elected clerk of the court of common pleas of Franklin county and ex officio clerk of the superior court. On the expiration of his term of office, in 1858, he devoted much time to horticultural pursuits, and moved on to a farm near Columbus.

He was married on November 27, 1849, to Mary E. Ridgeway, daughter of Joseph Ridgeway, jr., of Columbus, Ohio, who yet survives him. Mr. Buttles was a popular man with the people, and very energetic in whatever he undertook.

M. A. DOUGHERTY, son of Patrick and Ann Dougherty, was born November 27, 1816, at Baltimore, Maryland. His parents emigrated, in 1810, from the North of Ireland. He completed his education at the Baltimore academy, of which he is a graduate. In 1836 he removed to Ohio, located at Lancaster, and read law with the Hon. John Garaughty, beginning in 1838, and was admitted to practice by the supreme court of Ohio, on the circuit at Dayton. He began the practice of his profession at Lancaster, and gained an honorable position at a bar the most celebrated in the State, and, in 1855, formed a partnership with Hocking H. Hunter. In 1870 he was elected, on the Democratic ticket, to the State senate, and re-elected in 1872, and served on the judiciary committee. In 1873 he ran for attorney-general on the same ticket with Governor Allen, but was defeated by a small majority. In April, 1875, he was appointed a member of the codifying commission, by Governor Allen, and is the only one of the original commission remaining.

Mr. Dougherty is one of the soundest and most learned lawyers in the State, and will long be remembered for the laborious work he has performed in putting into shape the conflicting statutes of the State.

On May 25, 1843, he was married to Mrs. ——— McCalum, daughter of John Wood, of Maysville, Kentucky.

LEANDER J. CRITCHFIELD was born January 13, 1827, in Danville, Knox county, Ohio. When about eight years of age he removed, with his parents, to Millersburg, Holmes county, Ohio, where he spent his early youth, attending such schools as the village afforded. He was, at the age of fifteen years, employed about two years in the office of the clerk of the courts of Holmes county, in making records and in various other duties pertaining to that office, and thereby acquired a practical knowledge of legal forms, and became confirmed in his purpose to give his attention to the law as a profession. With that purpose in view, he prepared for college, and entered the Ohio Wesleyan university, at Delaware, and graduated in the regular classical course. Having completed the requisite legal studies, Mr. Critchfield was admitted to the bar by the court in bankruptcy, at Columbus, in December, 1849, and located in Delaware, Ohio, as a practicing lawyer, and was the next year elected prosecuting attorney of Delaware county, and was subsequently re-elected, serving four years.

Mr. Critchfield was married November 7, 1850, to Miss Sarah J. Mansur, of Delaware.

In December, 1856, he was appointed by the supreme court of Ohio, reporter of its decisions, and continued in that office, by re-appointment, for five consecutive terms of three years each, preparing and publishing in that time seventeen volumes of the Ohio State reports, being volumes five to twenty-one, inclusive. At the end of that time, being desirous of giving his undivided attention to the practice of his profession, he declined a further appointment. Soon after entering upon his duties as reporter for the court, Mr. Critchfield took up his residence at the capital and opened a law office, giving such attention to the general practice as his official duties would permit.

In 1858, at the request of Judge Joseph R. Swan, Mr. Critchfield joined him in the preparation of Swan & Critchfield's "Revised Statutes of Ohio," with notes of the decisions of the supreme court. The work was completed and published in 1860, and was received by the bench and bar, and public, with great favor. It has continued in use to the present time, and will be superseded only by the codification of the statutes of the State, soon to be issued, under the supervision of the commissioners appointed to codify the laws. It is well known that Governor Hayes offered Mr. Critchfield a place on that commission, and that he declined the offer, fearing that he could not do justice to the duties of the office, without neglecting prior obligations to his clients.

Mr. Critchfield has never held any political office, but only such as have been in the line of his profession, and since locating in Columbus, he has steadily pursued the exacting profession of the law, allowing nothing to interrupt his strict attention to the profession, except his duties as reporter of the court, the duties of that position aiding those of the profession, and only interrupting them by the consumption of time.

He was a partner of Hon. N. H. Swayne when the latter was appointed a justice of the supreme court of the United States, but since then has been without a professional partner. While Mr. Critchfield has given most of his attention to the practice in the State courts, he also attends to business in the United States courts. He is one of the most careful attorneys in the preparation of his cases, and, from his experience as reporter of the supreme court, readily uses the Ohio authorities in point, and practices a good deal in railroad cases.

Although Mr. Critchfield has given very strict attention to the profession of the law, he has also devoted much time and labor to promote the interests of education, as a college trustee, and also as a member of the Columbus board of education. He takes great interest in the public schools and has done much to promote their welfare. He was also connected with the movement to organize and establish the present public library of Columbus, and was a member of the committee that reported to the city council the plan upon which the library is organized and operated with such great success and promise of growing usefulness.

GEORGE L. CONVERSE, of Columbus, Ohio, was born at Georgesville, Franklin county, Ohio, June 4, 1827. His father, Dr. George W. Converse, a practicing physician at that place, died a few months after the birth of the subject of this sketch, leaving his family in straitened circumstances. The widow, Mrs. Cassandra Converse, (nee Cook) was a lady of unusual strength of character and indomitable will, qualities inherited by her son. By teaching school, she was enabled to support herself and son, until the latter was old enough to work at farm labor. The rudiments of his education he obtained in the country school, living at various times in Delaware, Franklin and Licking counties. During the greater part of each year, he worked at farming, teaming, and such other employment as he could find, and for such modest wages as the times afforded. He was entirely dependent upon his own exertions for his support, and for means of completing his education. When fourteen years of age he entered Central college, located at Westerville, in Blendon township, Franklin county, where he pursued his studies in the classical department for years, living economically, and working during vacations for the farmers in that vicinity. At the close of his junior year he entered Dennison university, at Granville, Ohio, where he graduated with the class of 1849.

In 1850, Mr. Converse entered the law office of Gen. Joel Wilson, at Tiffin, Ohio, with whom he continued his studies until he was admitted to the bar. Soon afterwards he opened an office at Napoleon, Ohio, but, on account of failing health, occasioned by the malaria of that part of the State, he was compelled to leave that locality, and soon afterwards removed to Columbus, where he quickly established himself in a lucrative practice.

In 1852, he married Miss Sarah Patterson, of Columbus, Ohio, since which time he has continued his practice and residence in Columbus.

Mr. Converse early took an active part in politics, and in 1854, was nominated by the Democrats of Franklin county, for the office of prosecuting attorney. He was elected, and filled the office creditably. It was while occupying this position that he acquired that thorough familiarity with the principles and practice of the criminal law, which has since marked him as one of the foremost advocates of the State. Declining a renomination, he devoted himself entirely to his profession, until he was elected, in 1859, to the Ohio house of representatives, where he served two successive terms with honor and distinction. In 1863, he was elected to the State senate, in which body he was the leader on the Democratic side, and took rank as one of the best debaters and parliamentarians on the floor.

In 1873, Mr. Converse was again elected to the house of representatives, of which body he was elected speaker, a position which he filled with marked ability, establishing his reputation as one of the best parliamentarians and presiding officers in the State. He was re-elected to the house in 1875, where he was the leader of the Democrats, then in the minority.

In 1877, Mr. Converse was a prominent candidate, before the Democratic State convention, for governor, the vote being nearly evenly divided, on the first three ballots, between George L. Converse, R. M. Bishop, and Durbin Ward. The following year, Mr. Converse was elected to congress from the ninth Ohio district, composed of the counties of Franklin, Pickaway, Fayette, Madison and Delaware, receiving seventeen thousand, seven hundred and eighty-six votes, against sixteen thousand, seven hundred and ninety-eight votes for Lorenzo English, the Republican and Independent candidate. In the organization of the forty-sixth (the present) congress, Mr. Converse was appointed chairman of the committee on public lands, one of the most important of the standing committees in the house.

As a lawyer, Mr. Converse has been remarkably successful, and has acquired a wide and enviable reputation. He is a man of great industry, close application, is courteous in his personal and professional intercourse, easily grasps the salient points of a case, has an intuitive knowledge of human character, and rare attainments as an advocate. As a public speaker, Mr. Converse has acquired more than a State reputation. In nearly, if not quite, every political campaign during the last twenty years, he has taken an active part on the stump, and in his style of speaking, is fluent, earnest and convincing, qualities which have placed him in the rank of the ablest public speakers in Ohio.

Mr. Converse has sprung from the people, and is a man of the people. Born poor, thrown early upon his own resources, taught economy and charity, by early poverty and adversity, overcoming all obstacles, by patient effort and a strong will, acquiring a finished education, and gaining an honorable position in his profession, in society and in public life, he is, in the best sense of the word, a self-made man.

ALLEN G. THURMAN was born in Lynchburgh, Virginia, November 13, 1813. His father was the Rev. P. Thurman, and his mother the only daughter of Colonel Nathaniel Allen, of North Carolina, nephew and adopted son of Joseph Hewes, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. In 1814 he removed, with his parents, to Chillicothe, and remained there until he removed to Columbus, his present residence. He was educated at the Chillicothe academy, and by the private instruction of his mother. He studied law with his uncle, William Allen, then United States senator, and late governor of Ohio, and with Noah H. Swayne, now a justice of the supreme court of the United States. He was admitted to the bar in May, 1835, at Washington, Fayette county, Judges Hitchcock and Lane being on the bench, and practiced his profession in Chillicothe, and extensively on the circuit, where his industry, legal learning and ability caused his employment in almost all important cases.

In 1844 he was elected a member of the house of representatives for the twenty-ninth congress, and in November, 1844, was married to Mary, daughter of the late Walter Dun, of Fayette county, Kentucky. In 1851 he was elected a judge of the superior court of Ohio, and was chief justice from 1854 to 1856, when his term expired. The "Ohio Reports," containing his decisions during the four years he was judge, gave him great reputation, as a sound lawyer and jurist, with the profession. While on the supreme bench he removed to Columbus, in October, 1853; and resumed the practice of the law at the close of his judicial term. His opinions on important legal questions were much sought after and relied upon by the bar all over the State, and he was retained as counsel, in the supreme court, in many of the most important cases. He has always been a laborious student; indefatigable in the preparation of his cases, and a forcible and direct speaker, who wastes no time on immaterial points. In 1868 he was elected a senator of the United States, and took his seat November 4, 1869, and in January, 1874, he was re-elected.

He has been a member of the judiciary committee ever since he took a seat in the senate, and is now chairman of the same; as a member of that committee, in the session of 1877–8, he reported the bill, commonly known as the "Thurman bill," to compel the Pacific railroads to secure their indebtedness of nearly seventy millions to the government, and supported it by a written report, sustaining its constitutionality and propriety, and, also, by elaborate and able arguments in the debate that followed. The constitutionality of the bill was relentlessly assailed by its opponents, but the law has been sustained, and the question put at rest, by a decision of the supreme court of the United States, in a case brought by the Central Pacific railroad.

Judge Thurman has always been a Democrat of the straitest sect, and not inclined to run after temporary expedients in politics. He firmly believes that the safety of the country depends upon the preservation of the organization of the Democratic party. At the same time, he is liberal and courteous in his treatment of political opponents. Though in a minority of less than one-seventh of the senate, when first elected, he has exercised great influence, and obtained, among the thinking men of all parties, the character of a pure and honest man, who would expose fraud and corruption, no matter where the exposure might hit. He has had the satisfaction of seeing the small minority he found in the senate, grow into a majority that, in 1879, elected him president, pro tem., of the senate. Since his election to the senate, no man has risen more rapidly in public estimation ; his name is frequently mentioned in connection with the presidency ; but those who know Judge Thurman best, believe he would rather stand before the country as the bold and upright senator, in this age of corrupt and truckling politicians, than swerve a hair-breadth from his conscientious convictions of right, even to be president.

Richard A. Harrison was born April 8, 1824, in the city of Thirsk, Yorkshire county, England, where his parents then resided. In the spring of 1832, the family removed to the United States, and settled in Clark county, Ohio. He was educated in the common school, the Republic printing office, and in an academy under the charge of Rev. Chandler Robbins, Springfield, Ohio. He was obliged, on his arrival at twelve years of age, and until he commenced the practice of the law, to earn, by daily labor as a typographer, the means requisite for his support and education. He studied law in the office of Judge Rodgers, Springfield, Ohio; graduated from the Cincinnati law school, April, 1846, and was admitted to the bar, May 23, 1846, at a term of the supreme court, on the circuit held at London, Madison county, by Judges Hitchcock and Wood. He at once began the practice of the law in London.

He was married, December 25, 1847, to Maria Warner, daughter of Henry Warner, of Madison county, and, in the spring of 1848, he commenced a circuit practice, which he has ever since kept up. He was a member of the legislature, from Madison county, during the sessions of 1858–9 and 1859–60, and served on the judiciary committee; was a member of the senate, from the district composed of the counties of Madison, Clark, and Champaign, during the sessions of 1859–60 and 1860–1, serving as chairman of the judiciary committee, and president, pro tem., of the senate; was elected a member of congress from the district composed of the counties of Madison, Fayette, Clinton, Warren, and Greene, at a special election held in May, 1861, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Governor Corwin, upon his appointment as minister to Mexico; served during the special session held in July, 1861, and until the expiration of his term, March 3, 1863. He was nominated for judge of the supreme court, in 1870, by the Democratic party, but was defeated, with the rest of the State ticket, which reduced the Grant majority, in 1868, of forty-one thousand, five hundred and forty-six, over twenty-five thousand votes.

In January, 1876, he was appointed and commissioned, by Governor Hayes, a member of the judicial commission, provided for in the amendment, of article four, of the constitution of the State, but he declined the appointment. In the spring of 1873, he formed a partnership with Joseph Olds, who had just retired from the common pleas bench, and removed to Columbus, in the spring of 1874. His son-in-law, Mr. Marsh, is also now a member of the firm, of Harrison, Olds & Marsh.

Mr. Harrison attributes much of whatever success he has met with, to the encouragement and assistance which he received, in his early struggles at the bar, from Judge Rodgers, Judge J. R. Swan, P. B. Wilcox, Judge N. H. Swayne, and John W. Andrews.

Mr. Harrison ranks as one of the best lawyers in the State; he is not only learned in the books, but presents his cases with great force, to the court and jury. His reputation has extended his circuit practice all over the State, and in the supreme court he is engaged, on one side or the other, of many important cases. His success in the Boesel railroad cases, reported in Granger's supreme court reports, established his eminence as a lawyer on constitutional questions, while at the same time, it saved the people from the imposition of an oppressive system of taxation, that would yield no return.

Mr. Harrison furnishes another example of the fact that a lawyer who desires to rise to the head of the profession, must subordinate every other consideration to the law, which is a jealous mistress, and brooks no rival.

He was married on December 25, 1846, to Maria Warner, daughter of Henry Warner, of Madison county, Ohio.

Edward F. Bingham was born August 13, 1828, at West Concord, Vermont ; his father, who, in 1796, moved with the family from Cornish, New Hampshire, was Judge Warner Bingham, and his mother, Lucy, daughter of Captain John Wheeler. Thomas Bingham, the founder of the family in America, emigrated from Sheffield, England, and settled in Norwich, Connecticut, in 1663, being then twenty-one years old. He traces his family back to the Binghams, of Somerset, who were of Saxon origin, and, therefore, had an existence in England before the conquest. Edward F. Bingham received his early education in the public and select schools of Vermont. In his fourteenth year, he entered Caledonia county grammar school, where he successfully, under able tutorship, prosecuted, for three years, a thorough mathematical, classical and scientific course of studies.

In 1846, visiting Ohio, he became so pleased with the country, that he determined to settle in the State. After spending a short time in Marietta college, he read law under Hon. Joseph Miller, at Chillicothe, Ohio, and his brother, Harvey Bingham, in New Hampshire, and in May, 1850, he was admitted to the bar by the supreme court of Ohio, at Georgetown, and commenced the practice of law, June 1st, at McArthur, Vinton county, Ohio. In October, 1850, the court of common pleas appointed him prosecuting attorney of Vinton county, and in 1851 and 1853, he was elected to the same office. At the expiration of that time, in 1855, being elected representative (Democratic) for the counties of Vinton and Jackson, he sat in the legislature during the session of 1856 and 1857. In 1858, he was barely defeated for judge of the common pleas court in the subdivision of Jackson, Vinton, Pike, Scioto and Lawrence, where the party majority was heavily against him.

Wishing a more extended field for the prosecution of his profession, he removed to Columbus, in 1861, and has since been engaged in the practice of law. From 1867 to 1871, he was, by election, city solicitor of Columbus, and for many years a member of the board of education. In May, 1873, he was elected judge of the court of common pleas, and re-elected in 1878, without opposition.

Judge Bingham is one of the best judges in the State, aad takes great pains in examining the points and authorities submitted to him by counsel. His decisions satisfy all who hear them, of the impartiality with which he has formed his opinions.

JOHN G. MCGUFFEY was born in Madison township, Franklin county, Ohio, September 10, 1832. He was the second son of John McGuffey and Pamalia (Courtright) McGuffey, who were both born in Madison township. The parents of his father came to the county in 1803, from Kentucky, and those of his mother, in 1799, from Pennsylvania. His parents, having to make their own start in life, he was inured to labor upon the farm from infancy until he was twenty-two years old, excepting about fifteen months of that time spent in the academic schools at Central college and Delaware, and one year in which he was engaged in teaching. At twenty-two he entered the university at Athens, Ohio, and graduated there with the class of 1857. He studied law at Columbus with Geiger & Andrews one year, and, in October, 1858, entered the law school at Cincinnati, from which he graduated in 1859, and was admitted to practice law the same year at Cincinnati, and at once opened an office in Columbus, Ohio, where he has continued to practice his profession—the first three years alone; from 1862 to 1868 with Judge E. F. Bingham as partner; from 1868 to 1875 with Hon. John D. Burnett as partner, and since 1875 alone.

Mr. McGuffey is a man of great energy and business capacity, familiar with the learning of the books, and a careful and accurate pleader, and enjoys a lucrative practice. He was married to Lida H. Snow, daughter of Rev. William T. Snow, of Worthington, Ohio. They have two danghters—Mary, born in 1863, and Jane, born in 1865.

HORACE WILSON was born September 22, 1822, in Athens county, Ohio. His father was a north of Ireland seafaring man; his mother, of Connecticut. When he was four years of age his father died, and his mother died when he was twelve years old. He came to Licking county in 1837, or 1838, and tried for the appointment to West Point. The present General W. S. Rosecrans was the appointee. He returned, in the winter of 1839–40, to Athens county, and there tried for the place of midshipman, at Annapolis; failing, and being poor, he went to work.

In 1841, through the advice of Wm. H. McGuffey, then president of the Ohio university, at Athens, he began his studies at that college, where he continued, with intervals of work and teaching, till 1845, when he began teaching a private school in Athens, and studying law with the Hon. John Welch, late of the supreme court, of Ohio.

In 1847, he was admitted to the bar, at McConnellsville, Ohio, December 6, and then taught school at Nelsonville till February, 1848, when he began the practice of law, in Athens, Ohio.

In April, 1848, he was married to Caroline A. Hunt, of Franklin county, Ohio.

Mr. Wilson continued the practice of the law, in Athens, Ohio, until the winter of 1859, when he removed, with his family, to the city of Columbus, Ohio, and has practiced law there ever since.

For the last three or four years, from ill health, he has done very little business in court, but confined his duties mainly to the office. His son, Percy R. Wilson, and John J. Stoddart, are now his partners. Mr. Wilson is thoroughly convinced that every young man's destiny and success in life, depends entirely on his own efforts, and however poor and dependent, he may earn a competency, and respectable position among his fellow-men.

Mr. Wilson, in 1853, was nominated as trustee of the Ohio university, at Athens, to succeed Rev. Dr. James Hoge, and confirmed by the senate, and is now one of the active members of the board. In 1861 he was elected, and continued, as a member of the city council, of the city of Columbus, Ohio, from the fourth ward, until the spring of 1865. During his membership as councilman, he was at the head of the committees on fire department, and finance.

In 1865 he moved out of the city, to his present residence. Afterwards, when the city was extended, his residence came to be included in the corporation limits.

He was, in 1874, elected as a member of the city school board, and continued there four years, until 1878, without opposition.

Mr. Wilson has always been, in theology, a Presbyterian, and in politics, a Democrat.

ELI P. EVANS, son of George W. and Mary R. (Eberly) Evans, born June 10, 1842, at Dublin, Franklin county, Ohio; attended the common schools, and obtained his education chiefly by his own efforts; read law with James E. Wright, and was admitted to the bar September 6, 1870, by the district courts of Franklin county, Ohio. He immediately commenced the practice of the law, and opened an office in Columbus, Ohio. In 1878, the general assembly erected a fourth subdivision of the fifth judicial district, out of Franklin county, by separating it from Pickaway and Madison. He was elected judge on the first of April, 1878, the term beginning on the first of May, 1878. Judge Evans is a diligent worker on the bench, and carefully examines all questions before deciding them. The criminal docket, however, is assigned him in the division of the business, and occupies most of his time. Mr. Evans is unmarried.

WALTER THRALL, son of Jesse and Mable (Rose)

Thrall, was born in Rutland, Vermont, on May 2, 1794; worked on a farm summers, and received a limited education in the district schools, and the academy in Rutland; served fifteen months in the army in the war of 1812; taught school in the winter of 1814–15, and in 1815 went to Granville, Ohio, with his cousins; in 1816, 1817 and 1818, was employed by the Worthington manufacturing company, and in 1818 went to Circleville, into the fulling-mill business; read law, in 1826–7–8, with Joseph Olds, of Circleville, and was admitted in 1829; commenced practice there; moved to Granville in 1832, to Columbus in 1841, to Cincinnati in 1853, back to Circleville in 1856, and in 1861 to Columbus again, where he practiced his profession. He was elected president judge of Pickaway county in 18—. Mr. Thrall is the oldest member of the Columbus bar, and the two hours' argument, between himself and S. H. Andrews, on a demurrer to a surrebutter before Judge Tobert, the last judge here before the adoption of the code, was long remembered as a legal curiosity. He has lived under every administration of the general government of the United States; recollects the controversies about the embargo, non-intercourse, etc. He has been a member of the Protestant Episcopal church since 1817, and voted in Columbus for the election of Bishops Chase, McIlvain and Bedell. He is a Mason.

Mr. Thrall married Harriet Malliken, April 26, 1820; had seven children, five of whom are still living, and at eighty-five he enjoys good health.

JOHN C. GROOM, son of John C. Groom and Susannah (Spence) Groom, was born January 14, 1818, in Fairview township, York county, Pennsylvania, within a quarter of a mile of Prowel's mill, Fishing Creek valley. He never went to school after he was eleven years old, but worked with his father, who was by trade a brick mason, stone mason, and plasterer. His father died in September, 1833, and his mother in 1836, leaving five children, of whom he was the oldest, entirely destitute. He secured places for the rest, and after serving three years for victuals and clothes, went to learn to do business in the house of Rhodes & Rank, Harrisburg, Pennsylvania. Whatever education he obtained he got at night, by candle-light, through his own efforts, while others were asleep. He is self-taught.

In 1837 he came to Harrisburg, Franklin county, Ohio, and was engaged as clerk by Messrs. Geiger & Chenowith, and, in August, 1839, he was employed as a clerk in Circleville, with the well-known firm of Gregg & Wolfy. In the fall of 1838 he entered upon the study of the law with Joseph Olds, and, for a livelihood, taught school. He was admitted to the bar by the supreme court on the circuit at Circleville, December 3, 1841, and immediately entered into practice there, and, in 1842, was elected prosecuting attorney for Pickaway county, and served two years.

In 1847 he enlisted in Company E, Fourth regiment Ohio volunteers, in the war with Mexico. M. C. Lilley was the captain, and Col. Groom the first lieutenant. He received honorable mention from General Jo. Lane for gallant conduct in the taking of Puebla, when Col. Childs was relieved from his perilous position, and especially for his indomitable courage and daring at the battle of Atlixco, when he, with seventy-five others, were surrounded and ambuscaded by some three hundred lancers and four hundred infantry; after a hand to hand fight for more than forty minutes, three hundred and twelve Mexicans lay in heaps in the road, dead. They were rescued by the approach of the main body, under General Lane.

At the close of the war with Mexico, he returned to Circleville, and resumed practice. In 1858, he removed to Kansas City, Missouri, and soon built up a good practice. He came to Columbus, Ohio, April 14, 1861, and went into partnership with Judge Rankin for one year.

During the war o the rebellion, he was commissioned major of the Eighty-fourth Ohio volunteer infantry, and served three months, until June 11, 1862, and then was mustered in as colonel of the One Hundredth Ohio volunteer infantry, and ranked among the best as an officer. He resigned in June, 1863. He was elected a member of the house of representatives in the general assembly, from Franklin county, on the Democratic ticket, in October, 1875, served two years with credit to himself, and is now a candidate for the same place, on the Democratic ticket. He was married, on March 26, 1846, to Miss Minerva Robbins.

FREDERICK W. WOOD, son of Frederick Wood, and Eliza (James) Wood, was born in Northumberland county, Virginia, December 14, 1823, and removed, with his father's family, and settled in Morgan county, Ohio, in 1832. His father was a native of Massachusetts, and his mother a Virginian.

He was educated at the common schools, and at Granville college; read law with W. T. Brown, at McConnellsville, Ohio, and took the degree of the Cincinnati law school, in 1846. He was admitted to practice, at Marietta, Ohio, March 12, 1846, and commenced practicing, at McConnellsville, Ohio, in Morgan, Washington and Muskingum counties. He came to Columbus in 1876, and has been in practice here since.

He was a member of the lower house of the Ohio legislature, in session in 1863–4 and in 1864–5.

He was chosen presidential elector for the fifteenth Ohio district, in 1864, on the Republican ticket. He was elected, and served five years, as judge of the common pleas, for the eighth judicial district, from May, 1860. He was captain of company F, Eighty-sixth regiment, Ohio volunteer infantry.

In October, 1847, he was married to Miss Mary Ann Johnson, of Zanesville, Ohio, who died in 1870. He was married a second time to Miss Lydia C. Craig, on June 17, 1872.

JOHN D. BURNETT was born in Jefferson county, West Virginia, in the year 1817, and attended select schools in Charlestown, the county seat; came to Ohio about the year 1835, and read law in the office of the late Judge Wm. A. Rodgers, of the city of Springfield, and was admitted to the bar, by the supreme court, at Chillicothe, in the fall of 1841, and commenced the practice in the city of Urbana, Champaign county, in 1843. In the year 1849 he was elected a member of the general assembly, from the counties of Champaign, Clark and Madison, and was re-elected in the year 1850, and in 1851 he was elected a member of the Senate for the same district. He removed to Columbus in 1864, and engaged in the practice of law. He was in partnership with John G. McGuffy from July 1, 1868, to July 1, 1875.

Mr. Burnett is one of the best read lawyers at the bar, and thoroughly posted in chancery proceedings. He is one of the master commissioners of the court, and is engaged a great deal of his time in examining and reporting in matters involving complicated questions of liens and large amounts of property, in which his services are in much demand. Mr. Burnett is unmarried.

GILBERT C. COLLINS, son of Andrew T. Collins and Mary (Green) Collins; was born in Essex county, New Jersey, July 10, 1830; his father was of English and Irish descent, and his mother of Scotch descent. He removed with his parents, in the spring of 1834, and settled near Columbus, Ohio, his father being a teacher in the common schools. He, by his own energy and industry, acquired a good education; from 1854 to 1859, he was engaged in teaching, and in 1859 commenced the study of law with Messrs. Dennison & Carrington. In March, 1861, he was admitted to the bar, and, in 1872, commenced the practice of law in connection with Mr. Dennison, which terminated by Mr. Dennison's appointment as postmaster-general, two years afterwards. In 1873, he was elected city solicitor of Columbus, though his party (the Republican) was greatly in the minority, and, in the spring of 1879, mayor of the city, by a large majority. He has always taken an active part in building up the city, and stands well as a lawyer in the community.

GEORGE J. ATKINSON, son of Peabody Atkinson, was born February 22, 1841, at Pataskala, Licking county, Ohio; his paternal and maternal ancestors were from Merrimack county, New Hampshire. He was brought up on a farm, and educated in the common schools. He spent two years at Dennison university, Granville, Ohio, and three years at Marrietta college, Ohio, and graduated in the class of 1864. He read law with G. C. Collins, of Columbus, Ohio, was admitted to practice by the supreme court in January, 1867, and, in 1869, formed a partnership with G. C. Collins, that has always done a large collecting business.

He was married to Miss Madge R. McGrah, September 22, 1875. He enlisted as a private in company D, One Hundred and Thirty-fifth Ohio national guards, Colonel Legg, and returned, much broken down in health, and weighing only ninety pounds, from his severe sickness in hospital.

W. T. WALLACE, son of James Wallace and Elizabeth (Eubank) Wallace, was born in Darke county, Ohio, October 19, 1842. He attended common school in winter, and worked on his father's farm in summer, until 1860, when he attended school at Otterbeen university, working on the college farm to pay his expenses, during 1861, and graduated at Southwestern Normal school, at Lebanon, Ohio, in the classical course, in 1867. He studied law under Judge A. R. Calderwood and Hon. William Allen (his uncle), at Greenville, Ohio, in 1865–6, and was admitted to the bar at Columbus, Ohio, in May, 1871.

Previous to his graduating, in 1867, Mr. Wallace had been engaged in teaching, having been principal of the White Water academy, in 1864, and superintendent of the public schools at Greenville, Ohio, from April, 1865, to June, 1866. The board of education, of Columbus, elected him principal of one of the schools, and continued him in that capacity for three years, and he was regarded as one of the best in the city.

In June, 1871, he bought the Sunday Morning News, edited and published the paper until November 15, 1872, when he sold it to Messrs. Ombaugh & Brodbeck, since which time he has practiced law in Columbus.

Mr. Wallace is a well-read lawyer, and thoroughly understands the learning of his profession. He is a bachelor, but when he takes his seat in the house of representatives, next winter, will lay aside that modesty which has, hitherto, prevented him from embarking in the matrimonial market.

JOSEPH H. OUTHWAITE, son of George and Harriet (Hudson) Outhwaite, was born at Cleveland, Ohio, December 9, 1841; moved with his father's family, to Zanesville, in 1846, and was educated in the public schools there. He began teaching in the Zanesville high school, in September, 1862, and continued until October, 1864, when he became principal in one of the grammar schools of Columbus, until June 27, 1867, when he went to Missouri. He read law, while teaching, under the direction of John Haines, esq., of Zanesville, and was admitted to the bar by the supreme court of Ohio, in the spring of 1866. In September, 1867, was admitted to the bar of Missouri by the circuit court of St. Clair county, and practiced in that State four years; returned to Ohio, and commenced the practice of law in Columbus, and in October, 1876, was elected prosecuting attorney, and re-elected in 1876. Mr. Outhwaite is a fine speaker, and a rising man.

On June 8, 1870, he was married to Ellen R. Peabody, of Zanesville.

JULIUS C. RICHARDS, son of Hiram and Maria (De-Lashmutt) Richards, was born August 17, 1839, in Perry township, Franklin county, Ohio, where his father now resides. He worked on his father's farm, and received a common school education at the district schools, until he arrived at the age of nineteen years, when he became a student at the Capitol university, at Columbus, Ohio, where he attended for about three years, and, upon leaving it, he attended the Washington academy, in Guernsey county, Ohio, under the instruction of Professor Alexander. He was at the latter place one year. In the year 1862, he was appointed deputy clerk of the courts of Franklin county, Ohio, and served in that capacity for six years. During the last three years that he acted as deputy clerk, he read law, and had as his preceptor Lorenzo English, of the city of Columbus. On the eleventh day of March, 1868, he was admitted to the bar of the supreme court of the State, as an attorney-at-law, since which time he has been actively engaged in the practice at Columbus, Ohio.

He was married, on the fifth day of October, 1869, to Miss Josephine B. Everitt, daughter of Zephaniah Everitt, late of Perry township, Franklin county, Ohio, and has three children as the issue of said marriage.

H. J. Booth was born March 14, 1849, at Lancaster, Ohio, where his father, Henry M. Booth, taught a select school for several years. His mother, Ann A. Booth (nee Jones), is of Welch ancestry, and the subject of this sketch is of Welch, Scotch and Irish extraction. In 1858, his father died at Des Moines, Iowa, from which place his mother returned, immediately, to "Welch Hills," near Granville, in Licking county, Ohio. Left an orphan, at the age of four years, with no patrimony, save an interest in a small tract of wild land in Iowa, he was compelled, when quite small, to seek employment as a farm laborer. During the winter months he attended school, and during the remainder of the year, he worked on the farm by the month, until eighteen years of age. In the fall of 1867, he entered Dennison university, at Granville, Ohio, where he pursued his studies five years. In 1872, he entered Amherst college, where he graduated in 1873. In August, of that year, he located at Columbus, where he resumed the study of law, which he had commenced while at college, in the office of Hon. George L. Converse. He was admitted to the bar in April, 1874, and shortly afterwards became a member of the law firm of Converse, Woodbury & Booth. He has been engaged in the practice since that time.

In July, 1876, he married Miss Madge I. Coney, of Union county, Ohio. In 1877, he was elected, on the Democratic ticket, as one of the members from Franklin county, in the legislature. He was the youngest member of the house, with, possibly, one exception, and was appointed a member of the judiciary committee; his career as a member of that body was a success. In the language of one of his fellow-members, "he was one of the clearest thinkers, best lawyers, and ablest debaters in the house." At the close of his first term, he declined to be a candidate for re-election, preferring to devote his time entirely to his business. In the practice of his profession he has met with marked success. He is now a member of the law firm of Converse, Booth & Keating.

John D. Sullivan, son of Denis and Mary (Halsey) Sullivan, was born in Kenmare, county of Kerry, Ireland, March, 1841, and is the youngest of eight sons. He received a good common school education, in his native town, from well-known classical instructors, and was bookkeeper at the early age of fourteen years, which position he left to come to America. Mr. Sullivan came to Columbus, Ohio, in August, 1859, where he commenced the study of the law. In connection with his legal studies, he attended a select German school, taught by Prof. Phliegel, of that city. In 1863, he entered the quartermaster's department of the army, as clerk, and soon rose to be chief clerk. In 1864, when Major General A. J. Smith was assigned an independent command, Mr. Sullivan was assigned as chief clerk of the expedition, on the staff of the general. He remained attached to General Smith's staff until September, 1865, when the last of the command was mustered out at Springfield, Illinois, from where he made his final report to Washington. He again resumed the study of law, at Memphis, Tennessee, where he went after leaving the army. In 1868, he came back to Columbus, and after remaining the necessary time required by the laws of the State, was admitted to practice by the supreme court, December, 1870. Mr. Sullivan has been an active and successful practitioner, since his admission to the bar; is well known in this and adjoining counties, and has, as he deserves, the confidence of those who know him.

DeWitt C. Jones, son of John C. and Sarah H. (Taylor) Jones, was born in September, 1848, on a farm near London, Madison county, Ohio; was educated in the common schools, and in the Ohio Wesleyan university, at Delaware, read law with Hon. Chauncey N. Olds, at Columbus, and was admitted to the the bar, February 22, 1872, by the supreme court, and opened a law office in Columbus.

In 1877 he was elected a member of the city council, and to him the city is mostly indebted for the new city prison. He is a Democrat, and a ready speaker.

He was married, on April 9, 1876, to Laura C. N. Homyer, youngest daughter of George Homyer, one of the oldest German citizens of Columbus.

His father was from Jonesboro, Tennessee, and his mother from Richmond, Virginia, and emigrated to Ohio in 1840. Mr. Jones is a good speaker, and energetic in all his undertakings.

J. T. Holmes, son of Asa Holmes and Mary (McCoy) Holmes, was born November 25, 1837, in Harrison county, Ohio, on the homestead farm, where his grandfather, Col. Joseph Holmes, who was from Maryland, settted in 1799. He was educated in the common schools, and Franklin college, where he graduated in September, 1859.

He entered the army in 1862, and served till the close of the war. He was enrolled as a second lieutenant, for the Fifty-second Ohio volunteer infantry, and, on its organization, was made captain of company G. The regiment was attached to the army of the Cumberland, and he shared its fortunes throughout the war—at the bloody battle of Chickamauga, and at Jonesboro, where he was wounded, in June, 1864. He was promoted from captain to major, and then to lieutenant-colonel, and had command of the regiment for sixteen months, taking part in Sherman's march to the sea, the capture of Johnston's army, and the grand ovation, at Washington, at the close of the war.

He commenced reading law with Francis Collins, esq., at Columbus, in June, 1865, and was admitted to the bar, by the supreme court, at Columbus, in June, 1867, and has practiced law there ever since.

He was married on December 28, 1871, to a daughter of Judge L. Bates.

Colonel Holmes is very diligent in devoting himself entirely to his professional business; he is a man of fine personal address, and ranks high among the rising members of the bar at the capitol.

JOHN G. MITCHELL, son of Moses G. and Elizabeth Mitchell, was born at Piqua, Ohio, November 6, 1838; graduated at Kenyon college in June, 1859; studied law with Swan & Andrews, and was admitted to the bar in the fall of 1865, by the supreme court, and commenced the practice of law in Columbus. He enlisted as a private in Bennett's battalion, July, 1861, and was appointed first lieutenant, Third Ohio volunteer infantry; commissioned September 2, 1862, lieutenant-colonel of the One Hundred and Thirteenth Ohio volunteer infantry, and May 3d, colonel; promoted to brigadier-general of volunteers December 1, 1864, and resigned July, 1865. His services were with the army of the Cumberland. The war interrupted his legal studies, and he was not admitted to the bar until after its close.

HAWLEY J. WYLIE was born in the township of Coventry, Chenango county, State of New York, December 3, 1833. When he was fourteen years of age, his father, who was a farmer, died At the age of seventeen years he began teaching a district school, and for three successive years attended the Norwich academy during the summer term, teaching school in the country in the winter. He left the academy in 1855, and spent two years in mining in California. In March, 1859, he came to Columbus, Ohio, entered upon the study of law in the office of General Joseph H. Geiger and Abner L. Andrews, and, on the first day of April, 1861, was admitted to the bar at Columbus, by the supreme court of Ohio, Judge Robert B. Warden and Noah H. Swayne, now associate justice of the United States court, being the committee who examined him and recommended his admission. He immediately commenced the practice of law at Columbus, Ohio. In July, 1862, he recruited a company for the Ninety-fifth regiment Ohio volunteer infantry; and, on the eighteenth day of July, 1862, at Columbus, Ohio, was mustered into the United States military service as captain, and assigned to the command of Company H, Ninety-fifth regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, being the company which he had, with the assistance of two lieutenants, recruited. His commission, from David Tod, governor of Ohio, was dated August 28, to take effect from July 22, 1862. He was captured at the battle of Richmond, Kentucky, August 30, 1862, by the Confederate forces under General Kirby Smith, and paroled and sent to Camp Lew Wallace, in Franklin county, Ohio. On the fifth of December, 1862, his regiment not having been yet exchanged, he resigned his commission and resumed the practice of the law at Columbus, Ohio. He was elected city solicitor of Columbus, in April, 1863, and re-elected in 1865, holding the office four years, since which time he has been engaged at Columbus in the practice of his profession. He is a member of the Methodist Episcopal church.

EDWARD LIVINGSTON TAYLOR, second son of David and Margaret Livingston Taylor, was born in Truro township, Franklin county, Ohio, March 20, 1839; was educated at Hanover college, Indiana, and at Miami university, Ohio, graduating from the latter in the class of 1860. In June, 1860, he entered the law office of Hon. Chauncey N. Olds as a student, and was admitted to the bar November 12, 1862, at Columbus, by the supreme court of Ohio. In July, 1862, he entered the army as captain of company D, Ninety-fifth Ohio volunteer infantry, and on August 30th, of that year, was engaged in the battle of Richmond, Kentucky, at which time he was taken prisoner of war. He was exchanged in November, 1862, and served with his regiment until after the close of the siege of Vicksburg, which was July 4, 1863, when, on account of impaired health, he was compelled to leave the service, since which time he has practiced law at Columbus, Ohio.

Mr. Taylor was married, on the fourteenth day of July, 1864, to Kate Noble Myers, of Columbus, Ohio.

CHARLES O. HUNTER, son of Elenathan S. and Mary (Peters) Hunter, was born in Nebraska, Pickaway county, Ohio, June 7, 1853. His grandfather was Moses M. Hunter, a brother of the late Hon. Hocking H. Hunter, and a son of Captain Joseph Hunter, the founder of Fairfield county, Ohio. Charles received his early education in the public schools, and afterwards attended the National Normal, of Lebanon, for four years, where he graduated in 1873. He at once commenced the study of law, in Lancaster, Ohio, with Hon. M. A. Daugherty as his preceptor, and in January, 1874, removed with that gentleman to Columbus, and was admitted to the bar by the supreme court of the State, on the fourth day of October, 1875. He has met with good success in the practice, and is devoting most attention to the law of corporations. Mr. Hunter is not married. He is the prime gentleman of the Columbus bar.

GILBERT H. STEWART, son of Alonzo and Isabel Stewart, was born in Boston, Massachusetts, March 15, 1847. He was educated in the Cambridge, Massachusetts, schools, graduating from the Cambridge high school in 1864. He entered Harvard college in the class of 1864, and left the college in the spring of 1867, and entered the Harvard law school, remaining there one term. He read law with Lorenzo. Marrett, East Cambridge, Massachusetts, and with H. G. Carhart, Galion, Ohio, and was admitted to the bar May 5, 1869, at Columbus, Ohio, by the Franklin county district court. He practiced law from that time until April, 1873, at Galion, Ohio. In April, 1873, he removed to Columbus, Ohio, where he has ever since remained in the practice of his profession. He was married June 22, 1875, to Clara L., daughter of Prof. John Ogden, Worthington, Ohio.

SYLVESTER ANDREWS, son of Lyman and Percy N. (Vining) Andrews, was born February 3, 1821, in Liberty township, Delaware county, Ohio; he was educated at the common schools, and at Central college, Franklin county, Ohio. His ancestors, paternal and maternal, were of old New England descent, who settled in Hartford, Connecticut, in 1640, and his father emigrated to Worthington, Ohio, in 1818.

Mr. Andrews read law in Delaware, with William Powell, and was admitted to the bar in the fall of 1845, by the supreme court on the circuit in that county, and immediately commenced the practice of the law in Bellefontaine, Logan county, Ohio. In 1848, he came to Columbus, and opened a law office, in partnership with —— Mather, for two years, and, afterwards, with Hon. S. S. Cox, which continued until 1856. He then practiced alone, until 1874, when his health gave way so as to affect his mind, and he was removed to the asylum, at Athens, Ohio, in August, 1875, and died there October 1, 1876, from paralysis. He was appointed adjutant general of the State by Governor Wood, in 1852, and served to the close of Governor Medill's administration, in 1854. He took a great interest in the common schools, and was a member of the board of education, of the city of Columbus, for ten or twelve years. General Andrews was a good lawyer, well read in the books, and very ambitious. The melancholy circumstances attending his death, excited much sympathy.

He was married first on March 24, 1845, to Lovinda E. Marks, daughter of Sheldon Marks, of Delaware county, Ohio. She died in 1848, and on Febrnary 15, 1853, he was married to Jeannette Lazell, daughter of Judge John A. Lazell, of Franklin county. She died before him, leaving one daughter, Jeannette, who married Joseph Given, of Columbus, Ohio.

The following is a list of the judges who have presided at the courts of common pleas, of Franklin county, since their organization:

The number of lawyers at the capital has increased wonderfully from the ten in the directory of Columbus, when it was first incorporated as a city, in 1834.

The bar of Franklin county has furnished many distinguished men, who have filled the highest offices in the State and made their mark in the history of the country. One of the main objects of these sketches is to preserve a record of the past and the generation that is passing away.

A roster is added of the younger members of the profession, in order that the future historian may not encounter the same difficulties as to the dates of birth, education, and other necessary information that have been a constant source of embarrassment in preparing this matter. Any omissions must be attributed to parties failing to supply the facts asked for when requested.

E. L. DeWitt, born at Marrietta, Ohio, June 29, 1839. Received his education at private schools, and graduated at Marietta college in 1863; studied law with Chauncey N. NOTE.—Owing to the delay in receiving back from Columbus the proofs containing the author's corrections, we are obliged to add as appendix to the foregoing chapter the following emendations. We regret very much that these errors could not have been corrected before it became necessary to print the chapter; but we have done the best that circumstances would allow us to do. The illegibility of Mr. Baber's hand-writing is chiefly responsible for the errors in names and dates; and these constitute the principal, as well as the most unfortunate, blunders.†

CHAPTER XVII.

PICKAWAY COUNTY BAR.

WITH the organization of the county of Pickaway came also the attorneys—a necessary appendant to the administration of justice. First among the earlier members of the bar of this county, we find the names of Richard Douglas and Ralph Osborn. Mr. Douglas was a native of Connecticut. He read law with Judge Henry Brush, of Chillicothe, and settled, as an attorney, first at Jefferson, removing to Circleville soon after the county seat had been located there. Thence, about 1815, he removed to Chillicothe, where he died in the year 1852, aged sixty-seven years. Mr. Douglas was prosecuting attorney of this county, a member of the Ohio legislature, and first lieutenant of the company commanded by Captain Bartholomew Tryatt, in the war of 1812. He was a lawyer of more than ordinary ability, and his abounding humor and fund of anecdotes made him the most agreeable company to the members of the bar while circuiting. Messrs. Albert Douglas, sr., and Albert Douglas, jr., now of Chillicothe, are, respectively, his son and grandson.

RALPH OSBORN, a native of Waterbury, Connecticut, came to the county soon after its organization, and opened an attorney's office in Circleville. About 1812 he was married to Catharine Renick, daughter of John Renick, then living on Darby creek. After the death of his wife, Catharine, he was married, in 1831, to Jane, the widow of Dr. Daniel Turney, the said Jane being the oldest daughter of Col. James Denny, the first clerk of the county. Mr. Osborn was elected clerk of the legislature of Ohio at the time the seat of government was located at Zanesville, in 1810, which place he held five consecutive sessions, until he was elected, in 1815, auditor of the State, to which office he was re-elected until about the year 1833—eighteen consecutive years, a period longer than any one since. Upon the location of the seat of government at Columbus, Ohio, he removed there, where he had his residence at the time of his death, December 30, 1835. He died at the age of fifty-two years. After the termination of his auditorship, in 1833, he represented the counties of Franklin and Pickaway as State senator. After his election as auditor of State, he was not in practice as an attorney.

Mr. Osborn was, in manners, courteous, discharging his several trusts with care and integrity. The Hon. J. R. Osborn, of Toledo, Ohio, is one of Mr. Osborn's sons, and Mrs. Josiah Renick, Mrs. P. C. Smith, and Mrs. S. H. Ruggles, are his daughters. Mr. James Osborn, another son, was a leading merchant in Columbus, and died, leaving sons who still carry on his old firm business, and are leading men in the city.

Joshua Folsom was born at Henniker, New Hampshire, in the year 1783. His parents were Quakers, and his ancestors came from the north part of England, and settled at Hingham, Massachussets, in the year 1638. His grandfather, was known as "Quaker Joshua," and was extensively known and respected as a man of strong sense and integrity. Joshua Folsom, the subject of this sketch, studied at Dartmouth college, but did not graduate. After leaving college, he read law two years, at Baltimore, in the office of Robert Goodloe Harper, who was a very distinguished lawyer and orator, and member of the United States senate. Mr. Folsom began the practice of law at Circleville, Ohio, about the year 1810, and practiced, also, in many other counties of the State, as most lawyers of that day did, on account of the paucity of cases at home. About the year 1824, at the time Gustavus Swan was appointed judge, he went to Columbus to practice, being requested by Judge Swan to come there to take charge of his business. After remaining at Columbus two or three years, he returned to Circleville. In 1830, having accumulated a moderate fortune, for that day, and not being in good health, he retired from practice, and settled on a large tract of land which he owned in Logan county, Ohio. Mr. Folsom was a man of very extensive information, having, also, a respectable knowledge of Latin, Greek and French, and being well read in history and general literature. We have, also, the authority of Hocking Hunter for saying he was "a very good lawyer." Some of his arguments at the bar are yet remembered as very fine. He never held any office, except that of prosecuting attorney of Pickaway county. H. F. Page, his son, is now in practice in Circleville, (having taken the name of his father's family, in the female branch.)

Caleb Atwater located in Circleville about the close of the war of 1812, as an attorney-at-law. For several years he was postmaster, and a member of the Ohio legislature for one term. About the year 1827, or 1828, he was appointed, by President Jackson, as one of the commissioners to treat with the Indians for the purchase of their lands at Prairie-du-Chien. Mr. Atwater's information was extensive, but he is better known as an antiquarian and historian, upon which subjects he has written several works. He died in Circleville, on the third day of March, 1867, nearly ninety years old; he was a native of North Adams, Massachusetts.

George Atwater, his son, at one time a lawyer of this county, who died in Nevada, previous to the death of his father, was a young man of much learning and a keen and discriminating mind. Thus endowed, he could have distinguished himself in almost any pursuit of life he chose.

G. W. Doane was a native of New Milford, Connecticut; graduated at Union college, New York, and attended the law school at Litchfield, Connecticut; located in Circleville, in the year 1816, as an attorney-at-law; was one of the editors of the Ohio Branch, a weekly newspaper of Circleville, now continued and published by S. Marfield, jr., as the Union-Herald. Mr. Doane was a man of liberal education and a most exemplary citizen. On the fourth day of February, 1862, he died, aged seventy-six years. For many years previous to his death he had entirely lost his sight, and, consequently, was disqualified for business. He was a brother-in-law of the late Judge William B. Thrall, for a long period publisher of the paper above referred to. A son of his, George W. Doane, is now in practice, as an attorney, in Omaha, Nebraska. Mr. Doane, for one term, represented the county of Pickaway in the lower branch of the legislature. As late as the year 1819 Joshua Folsom, G. W. Doane, Caleb Atwater and Neil McGaffey were the only resident attorneys of Circleville. Mr. McGaffey, within a short time, went west. He was a son-in-law of John McNeil, one of the early inhabitants of the county.

Joseph Olds, a native of Brattleborough, Vermont, came into this county in 1819, and studied law here; he was admitted to practice in 1820 or 1821, opened an office in Circleville, and was eminently successful for a period of over twenty years; he was frequently a representative in the legislature, was the president of the Circleville bank, during his life, and was a power in the political and financial transactions of his day; he acquired a considerable fortune, which, he having no children, went to his brothers and sister. Dr. E. B. Olds, extensively known as a member of Congress, was a brother, as was also the Hon. C. N. Olds, now attorney-at-law, located at Columbus, Ohio. Mr. Olds died in April, 1847, at the age of fifty-three years.

M. C. Canfield was located in this county about the year 1840, as an attorney-at-lay; he removed from this place, after a residence of a few years. While here he was elected prosecuting attorney for the county, and discharged the duties of that office for two years.

Henry F. Page located in this county, as an attorney, in the year 1845, and, from that time forward, has been in successful practice; he is a graduate of Oxford college, Ohio, and attended the law lectures at Harvard, Massachusetts; he was a member of the late constitutional convention, of Ohio; he is a native of Circleville, Ohio; he is now in full practice, vigorous, and in the prime of his mental powers. Mr. Page has formed a partnership with J. N. Abernathy, esq., under the firm name of Page & Abernathy.

James D. Caldwell located in Circleville, as an attorney, previous to the year 1830, and after practicing there for twelve or fifteen years, he migrated to Chillicothe, Ohio, where he died. Mr. Caldwell was unmarried. While in Circleville, he was associated with Judge William Irvin, of Lancaster, Ohio, under the firm name of Irvin & Caldwell. He had the respect and warm regard of his intimate friends and acquaintances.

JOHN L. GREEN located, about 1830, in Circleville, as an attorney, and was a successful practitioner. He was elected to the senate of Ohio, from Pickaway county; removed from Circleville to Chillicothe, and was there elected judge of the common pleas court. After removing to Columbus, he was elected, and re-elected, judge of the court of common pleas, which position he now holds. Mr. Green is a native of Virginia.

JOSEPH OLDS, now of the firm of Harrison & Olds, commenced practice in this county about 18$\frac{54}{}$. While in practice he was one of the leading attorneys, and was elected judge of the court of common pleas. After holding the place for one term, he returned to practice. Mr. Olds graduated at Yale college. He is a native of Pickaway county, Ohio.

H. N. HEDGES, SR., commenced the practice of law in Circleville in the year 1835, and was elected prosecuting attorney of the county for three terms. About 1854, he formed a co-partnership with John Cradlebaugh, which, under the name of Hedges & Cradlebaugh, continued for four years. From the time of the dissolution of the partnership, he was not in active practice. In the year 1865, he was elected to the office of probate judge, to which office he was re-elected in 1868. He is the Nestor of the Pickaway county bar, Judge Green, of Columbus, only having been longer in practice than he. He is a native of Pickaway county, and read law in the office of Joseph Olds, after which he attended the law school of Cincinnati.

COL. JOHN CRADLEBAUGH entered upon the practice of the law, about 1840, in the county of Pickaway; he completed his law studies with H. N. Hedges, sr., with whom he entered into partnership, in the year 1854. Before this time, Mr. Cradlebaugh had represented this, and Franklin county, in the senate of Ohio. About the period of the close of his partnership with Mr. Hedges, he was appointed, by President Buchanan, federal judge of Utah; was elected a delegate, in congress, from the territory of Nevada; was the colonel of the One Hundred and Fourteenth regiment, in the war of 1861. Mr. Cradlebaugh died on the seventeenth day of February, 1872, in Nevada. Few men had warmer friends, and few were more worthy of warm friendship.

JEREMIAH HALL located in Circleville, as an attorney, in the year 1857; he read law with the Hon. John Welch, at Athens, Ohio. Mr. Hall has made the Virginia military land laws his specialty; he is now in partnership with Captain Bostwick, his son-in-law, under the firm name of Hall & Bostwick.

L. H. BOND commenced the practice of the law in Circleville, about the year 1858; he was elected prosecutor, for Pickaway county, and served one term, of two years. Mr. Bond left this county, and located at Cincinnati, and was assistant district attorney of the United states, for the southern district of Ohio, and is now in practice in Cincinnati.

PALMER C. SMITH located in this county, as an attorney, in 1847, and, after two years residence, entered into a partnership with the Hon. T. C. Jones, which continued until the fall of 1856, Mr. Jones having removed to Delaware, Ohio; he was elected prosecutor of the county, over Col. John Cradlebaugh. Mr. Smith has been, and is now, in full and profitable practice.

JOHN A. LUTZ, a native of this county, was born the twenty-ninth day of December, 1824. In 1853, he graduated from Wittenberg college; read law under the Hon. C. N. Olds, and commenced the practice in December, 1855, from which time he has been in full and profitable practice.

ANSEL T. WALLING was born in Otsego county, New York, January 10, 1824; removed, at the age of nine years, with an elder brother, to Erie county, Pennsylvania; received a common school and an academic edution; learned the printing trade in the Erie Observer office; came to Ohio in 1843; was editor and publisher of the Mahoning Index in 1848, and of the Coshocton Democrat in 1850–54; was assistant clerk in Ohio house of representatives in 1851–52; was admitted to the bar in 1852; removed to Iowa, and was editor and publisher of the Keokuk Daily Times in 1855–58; returned to Ohio in 1861, and, in 1863, resumed the practice of law at Circleville, was elected to State senate for Franklin and Pickaway counties in 1865, and in 1867 was chosen representative from Pickaway, serving as speaker pro tem. the second session; in 1874, was elected to the Forty-fourth congress from the Twelfth Ohio district.

BURR H. BOSTWICK is a native of Ohio; his age is forty-two years. In 1868 he commenced the practice of the law in Circleville, in partnership with Jeremiah Hall (his father-in-law), with the name of Hall & Bostwick. Mr. Bostwick was, for nearly four years, a member of the Kansas cavalry, in the war of 1861, in which he, at the close of his service, held the rank of captain.

C. F. KRIMMELL was admitted to practice about 1871, and entered in partnership with Samuel W. Courtright, under the name of Courtright & Krimmel, about 1874, which continued until Courtright was elected judge of the common pleas court. Mr. Krimmel, in 1875, was elected to the lower branch of the legislature, and in 1877 was elected to the senate. He graduated at Oberlin, and is about thirty-five years of age.

ISAAC N. ABERNATHY commenced the practice of the law in Circleville, in 1869; he is a native of Ohio, and graduated from the Ohio Wesleyan university; read law under Judge Zaple, first, and afterwards with Hon. R. A. Harrison. For four years he has been prosecuting attorney for the county, and is now associated with H. F. Page, under the firm name of Page & Abernathy.

A. R. BOHN, a native of Pickaway county, commenced the practice of law in 1873. He is a graduate of Miami university; read law in the office of H. F. Page, and attended the law school at Cincinnati. Stephen L. Grigsby is now associated in practice with him, under the firm name of Bolin & Grigsby.

SAMUEL W. COURTRIGHT commenced the practice of the law in 1863, and has been prosecuting attorney of Pickaway county for two terms; read law with D. M. Jones, of Circleville (now deceased), and with Hon. Belamy Storer, of Cincinnati (now deceased). He graduated from the Cincinnati law school. After twelve years' practice he was elected judge of the court of common pleas, for the counties of Pickaway and Madison, which office he now holds. He was associated, for over a year, with C. F. Krimmel. He is a native of Pickaway county, Ohio, and is thirty-six years old.

JONATHAN RENICK was a native of Pickaway; commenced the practice of the law about 1840; was a graduate of Cannonsburgh college, Pennsylvania; read law in Dayton, Ohio, with Adlin & Schenck, and served as prosecutor for the county of Pickaway. He died in 1862. His prospects for legal and political distinction were above those of any other citizen of this county. He was naturally a leader of men.

I. P. WINSTEAD commenced the practice of the law in 1873. He read law under the instruction of Judge Samuel W. Courtright, is a graduate of Miami university, and is the present candidate for the office of prosecuting attorney of the county of Pickaway, on the Democratic ticket.

THOMAS C. JONES, now of Delaware county, located in this county about 1843, and remained here for a period of about fifteen years. During his residence here he acquired a good practice and an enviable reputation for character and ability. Leaving here, he moved to Delaware, Ohio, from which county he was elected a State senator, and soon after was elected a judge of the court of common pleas.

CHARLES E. DELEPLANE, W. F. HURST, and FESTUS WALTERS, have been in practice for about the same length of time in this county. Mr. Deleplane is just closing his second term as prosecutor of the county. They are in fair practice.

Among the younger members of the bar in practice in this county, we have Perry G. Bostwick, brother of Burr H. Bostwick, Stephen Grigsby, Milton Morris, Charles E. Morris, William H. Ucker, Clarence Curtain, Stuart Walling, son of Hon. A. T. Walling, and J. Wheeler Lowe.

Among the attorneys once settled here, and removed to other locations, are General Joseph Geiger, D. Lord Smith, Joseph Knox, George W. Doane, James Green, William H. Hall, Samuel P. Brainard, Gustavus Scott, Joash Miller and Thomas Walker. Several are known to have died.

CHAPTER XVIII.

SOCIETIES.

THE LOGAN HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

One of the oldest societies in which Franklin and Pickaway counties had an interest, and one which has an especial importance, as its name is a memorial of the celebrated Mingo chief, and as it formed a connecting link between the old colonial times and the present era, was The Logan Historical Society, organized July 28, 1841, upon the "classic ground," at the historical village of Westfall, Pickaway county. Before an assemblage of pioneers and citizens convened at that place, upon the time mentioned, Judge Corwin, of Portsmouth, a pioneer of the eighteenth century, in a short, impressive speech, stated that, from the best information he possessed, the spot where they were assembled was the same as that where "Logan, the Mingo chief, the Indian philantrophist, and friend of the white man, delivered his celebrated speech sent to Lord Dunmore, creditable to mankind, and honorable to him and his nation." The venerable pioneer concluded by preposing "that, as if listening to the speech, the people should uncover their heads, and resolve themselves into a society, determined to perpetuate these principles for which Logan suffered the sneers of his red brethren, by the erection of a monument to his memory, and by careful collection, safe keeping, and lasting preservation, for the use of posterity, the many scattered, but interesting, fragments of the early settlements of the western country, as well as what remains of the early settlements of North America."

It was unanimously resolved that such a society should be formed, and an organization was immediately effected by the election of Felix Renick, of Ross county, as chairman, and John S. Williams, of Chillicothe, as secretary. A name was then chosen, and a set of resolutions was drawn up, declaring the intention of the society to erect a monument to the memory of Logan, upon the very spot which the best evidence should indicate as the one where his speech was delivered, or as near it as a suitable situation could be procured. It was also designed to engrave upon the monument, Jefferson's version of the speech, and take other means to perpetuate and honor the memory of Logan. The resolutions further indicated the plan intended for the preservation of matters of local history. It was further resolved that a committee of three, from each county represented in the assemblage, be appointed as an executive committee for such county, to give special aid and attention to the plan of carrying out the objects of the society. In accordance with the resolution, these were appointed: Hon. George Corwin, Hon. William Oldfield and Moses Gregory, esq., for Scioto county; Hon. Samuel Reed, Hon. John I. Van Meter and John Carolus, esq., for Pike county; Wm. M. Aderson, Owen T. Reeves, esq., and Colonel John Maderia, for Ross county; Wm B. Thrall, esq., Philo N. White, esq., and Dr. M. Brown, for Pickaway county; and Hon. Gustavus Swan, Noah H. Swayne and John H. Miller, esqs., for Franklin county.

The society never accomplished the prime object for which it was organized—that of erecting a monument to the memory of Logan; but it was through the society's efforts that the Western Pioneer was started—a publication which saved from oblivion much valuable local history.

CENTRAL OHIO BEE-KEEPERS' ASSOCIATION.

This large and useful organization came into being on the ninth of March, 1878. It is composed of ladies and gentlemen who have an interest in bee-keeping, and at present has a membership of about one hundred and twenty-five persons. The counties represented in the association are: Franklin, Pickaway, Fairfield, Ross, Hocking and Fayette, though it is permissable for those of other counties to join. Article II of the constitution, adopted April 6, 1878, reads as follows, showing the aim of the organization:

"The object of this association shall be the promotion of scientific bee-culture, by forming a strong bond of union among bee-keepers, laying aside all conflicting interests. All subjects for discussion shall be brought before the convention, at the proper time, by the business officers, their decision, however, being subject to the usual appeal to the association."

Monthly meetings have been held by the association since its organization, in various places, in the several counties represented in the membership. The discussions have been interesting, and have resulted in the dissemination of a great amount of useful knowledge. It is a notable fact that the bee-culture has been largely extended in central Ohio, through the influence of the association, and that the production of honey is becoming an important industry. Many are keeping bees now who never kept them before, and improved varieties, as well as the most approved hives, and other appliances, are coming into general use.

The original officers of the organization were as follows: W. H. Nicholson, president; J. O. B. Renick, Franklin county; Dr. L. D. Vernon, Pickaway county; Milo Rockwell, Fayette county; Samuel Barr, Fairfield county; Joshua Seney, Ross county; B. Strock, Hocking county, vice-presidents; Samuel D. Riegel, secretary; N. Julien, treasurer.

Following are the names of the present officers: N. Julien, president; J. W. Newlove, Franklin county; T. R. Bruner, Pickaway county; Samuel Barr, Fairfield county; Milo Rockwell, Fayette county; B. Strock, Hocking county; Joshua Seney, Ross county, vice-presidents; Dr. L. C. Vernon, corresponding secretary; Samuel D. Riegel, recording secretary; N. W. Julien, treasurer.

FRANKLIN COUNTY PIONEER ASSOCIATION.

Agreeably to a call issued in the papers by Jesse Baughman, a number of the oldest residents of Franklin county met at the fair grounds, in Columbus, June 2, 1866, and took the initial step in organizing the Franklin County Pioneer Association. J. E. St. Clair was made chairman of the meeting, and Henry Ridenour, secretary. On motion, P. H. Olmstead, David Taylor, Alexander Moobery, George Williams, George Taylor, and J. E. St. Clair, were appointed a committee to draw up a constitution and series of by-laws for the society. The meeting then adjourned, to meet again at the City Hall, in Columbus, on the twenty-third of June. Upon that day the old residents, who had become interested in the matter, assembled, pursuant to adjournment, J. E. St. Clair, president, in the chair. Col. Olmstead, chairman of the committee appointed for that purpose, presented a constitution and set of by-laws, which, immediately upon being read, were accepted and approved. The constitution provided that the body should be known as the Franklin County Pioneer Association; that the officers should consist of a president, vice-president, secretary, and treasurer; that the object of the association should be the promotion of good fellowship, and the preservation of historical matter; that all citizens of Franklin county, either male or female, who had been residents of the same for forty years, or more, should be entitled to membership upon signing, and thereby complying with, the provisions of the constitution; that meetings should be held at such time and place as the by-laws should prescribe, and that the fee for admission should be, for males, fifty cents. The by-laws further provided that an annual due of fifty cents should be paid; that ten members should constitute a quorum for the transaction of business; that each member should prepare a paper, giving his or her name, parentage, time and place of birth, date of first settlement in county, facts of subsequent residence, embracing, also, the names of other prominent early settlers of his or her vicinity, together with such other facts and incidents as might be considered of interest and worthy of preservation. The by-laws further proclaimed the intention of the association to attend the funerals of members, and made it obligatory upon the secretary to prepare obituary notices of deceased members, and keep a record of the same.

The members of the association present, and who signed the constitution, were, G. H. Griswold, J. D. Ball, Jesse Baughman, David Beers, John Saul, David Taylor, Christian Hoyl, Alexander Moobery, William Ross, P. H. Olmstead, Hugh McMaster, Harvey Coe, Abraham Johnson, J. T. Britton, J. E. St. Clair, William Harrison, George Taylor, Peter Agler, Flavel Fuller, Nelson Foos, William Sells, Henry Ridenour, Thomas bell, and Levi Pinney.

After the formal adoption of the constitution and by-laws, the association proceeded to elect its first regular officers. They were chosen as follows: J. E. St. Clair, president; George Taylor, vice-president; P. H. Olmsted, secretary; Christian Hoyl, treasurer. Mr. Hoyl resigned in October, following, and John Saul was appointed to his place.

At a meeting held October 20, 1866, the following ladies were admitted as members of the association, being the first who were received: Mrs. Susan Adams, Mrs. P. Smillikin, Mrs. H. Brooks, Mrs. L. Tuller, Mrs. Mary Niswander, Mrs. E. Patterson, Mrs. J. Park, Mrs. M. Moobery, Mrs. Stacy Spade, Mrs. Harriet Sexgler, Mrs. Sarah Robinson, and Mrs. Elizabeth Brodrick.

Officers were not again elected until April 25, 1868, when, at a meeting held at Thurman hall, Columbus, the following were chosen: J. E. St. Clair, president; George Taylor, vice-president; B. F. Martin, secretary; John Saul, treasurer.

Following is a list of the officers chosen at each subsequent election:

1870. J. E. St. Clair, president; Jesse Baughman, vice-president; Alexander E. Glenn, secretary; John Saul, treasurer.

1871. J. E. St. Clair, president; William S. Shrum, vice-president; Alexander E. Glenn, secretary; John Saul, treasurer.

1872. J. E. St. Clair, president; W. S. Shrum, vice-president; Alexander E. Glenn, secretary; Nathaniel Merion, treasurer.

1873. J. E. St. Clair, president; W. S. Shrum, vice-president; G. S. Innis, secretary; Nathaniel Merion, treasurer.

In accordance with a resolution offered by Joseph Sullivant, it was decided to elect one vice-president from the city of Columbus, and one from each township, which was accordingly done, with the following result:

J. O. B. Renick, Franklin; Hugh Grant, Jackson; David Postle, Prairie; Orrin Clover, Brown; Samuel King, Norwich; Benjamin Sells, Washington; Flavel Tuller, Sharon; James W. Jameson, Blendon; Jesse Baughman, Mifflin; George Wagner, Plain; Ezekiel Compton, Jefferson; James Taylor, Truro; Frederick Swisher, Madison; William Merwin, Marion; John Lysle, Hamilton; Jacob Sayle, Clinton; J. R. Thomas, Perry.

1874. J. E. St. Clair, president; W. S. Shrum, vice-president; William Merion, treasurer; G. S. Innis secretary.

1875. Joseph Sullivant, president; David Taylor, vice-president; H. B. Albery, secretary; William Merion, treasurer.

1876. J. E. St. Clair, president; William Wing, vice-president; G. S. Innis, secretary; William Merion, treasurer.

1877. J. E. St. Clair, president; John Lysle, vice-president; J. G. Innis, secretary; William Merion, treasurer.

1878. J. E. St. Clair, president; Henry Ridenour, vice-president; G. S. Innis, secretary; William Merion, treasurer.

1879. J. E. St. Clair, president; John Clark, vice-president; G. S. Innis, secretary; William Merion, treasurer.

The Franklin County Pioneer association has had an active, flourishing existence from the first. The little band of early settlers, who were its original members, was soon swelled to a goodly number, and the interest in the organization was never suffered to seriously abate. New accessions were made at every meeting, as the object of the association became more widely known, and the organization soon numbered among its members a large proportion of the pioneers residing in the county. The constitution was so amended as to allow all who were residents of Franklin county, and who had lived in the State more than forty years, to become members. Annual picnics have been held at the fair grounds, which have been occasions of rare pleasure to the pioneers, who have renewed their old acquaintances, and lived over, in imagination, the perils, the privations and the pleasures of their early years. These annual gatherings have been addressed by eminent men, so that they have been interesting, alike to old and young, and have proved valuable to both classes.

THE SCIOTO VALLEY PIONEER ASSOCIATION

was organized August 30, 1879, as an auxiliary to the Franklin County Pioneer association. The organization was effected at a picnic gathering of old settlers, at Abram Sells' grove, six miles north of Columbus, and the following officers were elected: David Thomas, president; Fletcher Sells, vice-president; Abram Sells, secretary; W. A. Crum, treasurer.

FRANKLIN COUNTY BAR ASSOCIATION.

The Franklin county bar association was organized April 20, 1869, at which time a constitution was adopted, which had been prepared by a committee consisting of Messrs. Otto Dresel, Geo. L. Converse, L. J. Critchfield, C. N. Olds, Llewellyn Baber, Wm. R. Rankin, and Thomas Sparrow. The constitution stated that the objects of the association were to promote harmony, good feeling, and a closer union among members of the bar; to maintain professional honor and dignity; to encourage the highest attainments in legal knowledge, and to promote, generally, the professional interests of its members. One of the most important acts of the bar association was to draw up and adopt a fee bill.

The first officers elected were as follows: Judge J. Wm. Baldwin, president; Judge H. B. Albery, vice-president; George K. Nash, secretary; Col. James Watson, treasurer; Henry C. Noble, Otto Dresel, C. N. Olds, executive committee; J. D. Burnett, Col. Llewellyn Baber, Morton E. Brasee, Col. J. T. Holmes, Gen. J. G. Mitchell, board of trustees.

The number of names appended to the constitution was about sixty. For several years the association kept up an active existence, but of late, the organization has been allowed to lapse.

FRANKLIN COUNTY TEACHERS' ASSOCIATION.

This is one of the largest, and most active organizations in the State of Ohio. It had, when organized, at Groveport, February 9, 1867, one hundred and twenty-nine members. The officers elected at that time were as follows: William Mitchell, of Columbus, president; Elijah Culp, of Hilliard, first vice-president; J. C. Payne, of Groveport, second vice-president; D. H. Zeigler, of Columbus, third vice-president; J. P. Arnold, secretary; James H. Hess, treasurer.

The association has held regular meetings ever since its organization, and has had the best of instructors, and some distinguished members, such as Hon. E. E. White, of Perdue university, and T. C. Mendenhall, now of Tokio, Japan.

At the last meeting, the roll of members contained two hundred and nine names. The present officers are: D. C. Arnold, president; E. Williams, first vice-president; Charles Longman, second vice-president; Miss Lizzie Hemby, secretary; Miss Annie Somers, assistant secretary; L. L. Pegg, treasurer.

THE CENTRAL OHIO MEDICAL ASSOCIATION.

This association, which now numbers about one hundred members, most of whom reside in Franklin county (though there are some in Delaware, Licking, Fairfield, Pickaway, Madison, Clark and Union counties), was organized January 14, 1869. The charter members were Drs. C. P. Landon, William F. Page, P. F. Beverly, A. Andrus, Z. F. Guerin, O. Johnson, William W. Bickett, John McClurg, J. W. Rauny and Alexander Neil. The first officers were: C. P. Landon, president; William F. Page, vice-president; P. F. Beverly, secretary; John McClurg, treasurer; A. Andrus, Alexander Neil, O. Johnson, board of censors; Drs. Ranney, Page and McClurg, executive committee.

The present officers are as follows: Dr. Hugh Hendrixson, president; Toland Jones and S. C. Helmick, vice-presidents; O. Johnson, secretary; W. D. Otis, assistant secretary; T. B. Ashbury, treasurer; Drs. Landon, Fenell and Guerin, board of censors; Drs. Landon, Cable, Follett and Fenell, executive committee.

THE PICKAWAY COUNTY MEDICAL SOCIETY.

January 18, 1876, a call was issued for a meeting of the medical profession, to be held upon the 25th inst., for the organization of the Pickaway County Medical society, signed by Samuel D. Turney, E. D. Bowers, A. W. Thompson, G. A. Wilder, N. E. Jones, A. P. Courtright, Madison Hummel and A. H. Shaffer. In pursuance of this call, a meeting was held in the council chamber of the city buildings. S. D. Turney was chosen temporary chairman, and stated the objects of the meeting. On motion of Dr. N. E. Jones, the organization was effected by the election of the following officers: S. D. Turney, president; N. E. Jones, vice-president; E. D. Bowers, secretary; T. C. Tipton, treasurer. At a meeting held February 6th, the members considered and adopted the following constitution:

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 1.—This society shall be called the Pickaway County Medical Society, and shall be composed of resident and honorary members.

ARTICLE II.

SECTION 1.—The society shall have constantly in view—First, the association of the profession, for the purpose of mutual recognition and fellowship; second, the maintenance of union, harmony and good government among its members, thereby promoting the character, interest, honor and usefulness of the profession; third, the cultivation and advancement of the medical science and literature, and the elevation of the standard of professional education.

ARTICLE III.

SECTION 1.—The resident members shall be regular practitioners of medicine and surgery in Pickaway county, who shall be elected by a vote of a majority, at any regular meeting, their eligibility having been previously reported on by the committee on admissions.

ARTICLE IV.

SECTION 1.—Honorary members shall only be admitted by a vote of two-thirds of the members present at any regular meeting, having first been recommended by the committee on admissions.

ARTICLE V.

SECTION 1. A vote of two-thirds of the members present shall be requisite for the expulsion of a member, which vote shall be in consequence of a report of the committee on ethics, at the next regular meeting subsequent to such a report.

ARTICLE VI.

SECTION 1. The officers of the society shall consist of a president, vice-president, secretary, and treasurer, all of whom shall be elected annually, by ballot, and a majority vote, at a regular meeting. They shall severally perform the duties assigned them in the by-laws, as shall also the standing committees.

ARTICLE VII.

SECTION 1. The following standing committees shall be annually appointed by the president, and shall each consist of three members:

First. A committee on admissions.

Second. A committee on medical ethics.

Third. An executive committee.

ARTICLE VIII.

SECTION 1. No part of this constitution shall be repealed, annuled, or amended, except at a regular meeting, subsequent to one at which a proposition to that effect may have been made, in writing, and then only by a vote of two-thirds of all the members present.

This constitution was subscribed by the following physicians: N. E. Jones, S. D. Turney, J. R. Kelch, F. M. Black, A. P. Courtright, J. J. Baker, Howard E. Jones, C. Steward, J. C. Thompson, N. Potter, H. B. Smith, Sam'l C. Helmick, G. E. Bragdon, Geo. T. Rowe, E. H. Pratt, (honorary member), E. D. Bowers, G. A. Wilder, A. H. Shaffer, M. Hummel, T. F. White, T. C. Tipton, A. W. Thompson, J. T. Jones, W. T. Kennedy, J. T. Kerkendall, Joseph Soliday, M. Brown, John B. May, R. H. Tipton, and T. Blackstone.

The first standing committees appointed were constituted as follows: F. M. Black, G. A. Wilder, A. P. Courtright, executive committee; Doctors Tipton, Hummel and Kelch, committee on admissions.

The society has, since its organization, continued to hold meetings at stated intervals, at which subjects of interest to the profession have been considered, and discussions had upon various topics.

The officers elected in 1877, were: J. C. Thompson, president; F. M. Black, vice-president; E. D. Bowers, secretary; T. C. Tipton, treasurer.

In 1878, Dr. Thompson was re-elected president; F. M. Black was chosen vice-president, and the other officers, that is, secretary and treasurer, were re-elected. In addition, there were chosen, as censors, A. W. Thompson, E. D. Bowers, and F. M. Black; Madison Hummel and H. E. Jones, curators; J. C. Thompson, N. E. Jones and D. Steward, directors.

The officers elected in 1879, were: F. M. Black, president; E. D. Bowers, vice-president; George T. Rowe, secretary; T. C. Tipton, treasurer; F. M. Black, J. C. Thompson, A. H. Shaffer, J. B. May and T. C. Tipton, board of directors; N. E. Jones and M. Hummel, curators; C. Steward, H. E. Jones and G. A. Wilder, censors.

FRANKLIN COUNTY AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.

This society was organized at a meeting of citizens of the county, held at the city hall in Columbus, September 6, 1851. The constitution, previously prepared, was adopted, and the following officers elected: Samuel Medary, president; Samuel Brush, vice-president; G. M. Peters, treasurer; William Dennison, secretary; Pliny Curtiss, David Taylor, Joseph O'Harra, Wm. L. Miner and W. H. Rarey, managers. A committee, of three from each ward, was appointed to obtain signatures to the constitution, and the meeting adjourned, having founded, what has since become, one of the leading organizations of the kind in the State. At the next meeting, a set of by-laws was adopted. G. M. Peters resigned his office as treasurer, and Robert Hume was appointed to fill the vacancy. In accordance with an act of the legislature, passed in 1846, and entitled "an act to encourage agriculture," this official drew from the county treasury two hundred dollars. In October, 1851, the first fair was held. The report on the financial condition, made soon after, showed the following:

Cash received of 339 members	$339 00
" " from county	200 00
" " from sale of admission tickets to fair	59 50
Total	$598 50
Amount paid for premiums and expenses	329 36
Leaving a balance of	$269 14

In 1852, the directors began planning to secure grounds, and made the first purchase, eight acres of ground, from Samuel Burr. From this time up to 1868, the association continued to purchase lands in parcels, ranging from two to forty acres, and, at last, succeeded in perfecting the present ample and beautiful grounds, containing about ninety-six acres, and situated upon east Broadway. The largest piece of ground was bought of David Taylor, sr. Improvements were made almost evey year, but most extensively in 1873, and the following year, when an arrangement was made with the State Fair association to hold its five succeeding and successive fairs upon the Franklin county grounds. Later, an arrangement was made for holding the State fair of 1879 and 1880 upon the same grounds. The grounds and buildings of the Franklin County Agricultural association are now valued at one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, the improvements having cost nearly one-third of that sum. Following are the officers for the year 1879: Gen. Charles C. Wolcutt, president; William S. Shrum, vice-president; George Donaldson, secretary; N. A. Simms, treasurer; Wm. H. Gaber, J. M. Briggs, Franklin township; George Donaldson, P. Hess, M. H. Neal, C. H. Moore, N. A. Simms, Columbus; Emmit Mix, Prairie township; B. L. Rees, Hamilton township; P. B. Tussing, Madison township; Chas. J. Huston, Truro township; Frank B. Dean, Mifflin township; W. A. Crum, Norwich township; J. M. Faxon, Sharon township; J. C. Lunn, Jefferson township; James Thompson, Washington township, directors.

PICKAWAY COUNTY AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY AND THE FAIR GROUND ASSOCIATION.

In June, 1833, the county commissioners gave notice for a meeting to organize the Pickaway County Agricultural society, which was organized, the same month, by the election of the following officers: Thomas Renick, president; Thomas Huston, vice-president; William P. Darst, recording secretary; Samuel S. Denny, corresponding secretary; Matthew McCrea, treasurer; William Miller, William Renick, jr., Elias Florence, George Radcliff, Peter Parcels, Robert Campbell, directors.

The early records of the society were destroyed, and what has been given in regard to the organization, was found only after long search in the old files of the Herald.

The fair grounds, upon which the society holds its annual exhibitions, are located just north of the center of Circleville; are naturally well adapted to the use to which they are put, and have been tastefully and judiciously improved, so that they are second to none in this part of the State, excepting, perhaps, the grounds at Columbus, where the State fair is annually held, and which have been fitted up at a very great expense. A vast, natural amphitheater forms a valuable and distinctive feature in the grounds at Circleville, and they are rendered additionally attractive by the numerous stately trees which shade the gentle slopes and the driveways.

In 1853 the officers of the Pickaway County Agricultural society were: Joseph B. Renick, president; M. Brown, vice-president; P. K. Hull, secretary; George W. Gregg, treasurer; and the managers were, Nelson Franklin, A. S. Terrill, Felix W. Renick, George Metzgar, and Joseph Shoemaker. At a meeting of the managers, held during this year, it was determined that a fair ground should be purchased, and M. Brown and P. Hull were instructed to devise a plan for the purchase of the same. This was the beginning of the project which ended in securing the grounds at present in use. But little was done, however, until 1858, when the Fair Ground association was organized, and soon after that event the grounds were purchased. This organization was effected by the election of a board of five trustees—D. M. Brown, A. L. Perrill, Harness Renick, George W. Gregg, and Nelson J. Turney. Mr. Brown was chosen president, and Mr. Gregg secretary. These officers have held their positions ever since, and had charge of the affairs of the Fair Ground association, leasing the property under their control to the Agricultural society. The capital stock of the association was fixed at two thousand five hundred dollars, in shares of ten dollars each.

The Agricultural society of Pickaway county is in a flourishing condition, and its annual fairs are valuable exhibitions, and largely attended. Following are its present officers: Dill Weigand, president; C. F. Machir, vice-president; E. K. Rife, secretary; S. L. Grigsby, treasurer. The directors are: L. D. Riegel, Salt Creek; C. F. Machir, Pickaway; J. H. Bortz, Washington; William S. Raber, Walnut; Z. H. Perrill, Madison; Dill Weigand, Harrison; D. M. Welch, Scioto; J. H. Allen, Darby; D. D. Hewitt, Monroe; F. M. Black, Muhlenburgh; M. V. B. Lindsey, Jackson; Jacob Hedges, Wayne; Robert Campbell, Deer Creek; Scott Beaty, Perry; W. E. Bolin, Circleville.

PICKAWAY COUNTY HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY.

The Pickaway County Horticultural society was organized August 29, 1874, at a meeting of which M. E. Dresbach was president, and W. F. Hurst, secretary. These gentlemen were elected to their respective positions in the board of officers for that year, at the next meeting, Norman Julian being made vice-president, Cyrus Courtright, treasurer, and David McHenry, librarian.

The society has numbered, in all, some hundred and fifty members, and has accomplished much in the way of directing attention to the care of fruit, and emulation in cultivating fine varieties. In 1878, under their auspices, the county took the State Fair Association premium for best county collection of apples, seventy varieties.

For the past two years the meetings have been social basket meetings, held at the residences of members, in town and county. A good feature is the bringing of sample fruits to be discussed, and new varieties to be named. Many piquant and profitable discussions are held.

The present board of officers are, S. D. Riegel, president; N. Julian, vice-president; Mrs. A. R. Van Cleaf, treasurer; Hon. A. R. Van Cleaf and Miss Lillie C. Darst, secretaries.

THE PICKAWAY COUNTY BIBLE SOCIETY.

The early records of this society were lost, but we are enabled to glean, from the semi-centennial address, delivered by John A. Lutz, some facts of interest. His source of information was the files of the Olive Branch. The society, it appears, was organized in August, 1828, at a meeting composed of delegates from local societies, which had previously been organized in some of the townships. The Rev. William Burton, of Circleville, was elected chairman of the meeting, and William B. Thrall, editor of the Olive Branch, secretary.

After the adoption of the constitution, permanent officers were elected, as follows: Guy W. Doane, president; Rev. William Burton, Rev. Jacob Leist, Rev. Henry King, Rev. Shadrach Cole and William Renick, esq., vice-presidents; Joseph Olds, corresponding secretary; John T. Davenport, recording secretary; Matthew McCrea, treasurer and depositor; A. S. Davenport, Isaac Bradley, Jacob Lindsey, James Ferbert, James Bell, James McCoy, John Thompson, Peter Miller, John Cochran, William Foreman, William B. Thrall, and William Tallman, managers.

These officers, says Mr. Lutz, in his address, were men of sterling worth, high in intellectual and moral culture. The fact that they were all re-elected, for a number of years, fully attests their efficiency, and the respect in which they were held by the society. They were finally succeeded by an entire new corps of officers, among whose names could be found those of P. B. Doddridge, president; R. D. Atwater, secretary, and Henson Rock, treasurer. During the past twenty-five years the society has had, as its presidents, John Lynch, Dr. M. Brown, Adam McCrea, and John A. Lutz, the present incumbent.

The present officers are the following: J. A. Lutz, president; A. Nonamaker, vice-president; L. D. Lyon, recording secretary; C. S. LeBaron, corresponding secretary; S. Miller, treasurer; H. R. Clarke, O. Ballard, jr., D. Bloyner, Samuel Denman, S. Ward, L. Kent, F. Rudy, C. A. Helwagen, W. B. Marfield, B. H. Moore, George Viney, and James Wright, directors.

PICKAWAY COUNTY SABBATH SCHOOL UNION.

This union was organized at a meeting held in the N. S. Presbyterian church, of Circleville, March 15, 1867, at which time the following officers were elected; John A. Lutz, of Circleville, president; William Knowles, of Wayne; Isaac E. Dreisbach, of Pickaway; Thomas Orfwood, of Deer Creek; James Plainstead, of Scioto; R. J. Morrall, of Walnut; A. G. Jones, of Harrison; Wm. H. Pickering, of Muhlenburg; James Stinson, of Salt Creek; Henry B. Swearingen, of Jackson; Solomon Lane, of Darby; Edward Dreisbach, of Washington; Lewis Baum, of Madison; Stephen Kinnear, of Monroe, and William Kounts, of Perry, vice-presidents; Alfred Williams, of Circleville, secretary; N. T. Bradford, of Circleville, treasurer; Adam McCrea and George H. Fickardt, of Circleville; J. H. Schyrer, of Wayne; James Shoemaker, of Salt Creek, and John M. Spindler, of Walnut, executive committee. The society has uninterruptedly maintained its organization, and has had an active and useful existence. Its present officers are the following: C. S. LeBaron, president; L. D. Lyon, secretary; Joseph Wallace, treasurer; Samuel Morris, Stephen Miller, M. E. Dreisbach, John Swick, executive committee. As a matter of interest, in connection with this union, we publish the following table of church and Sunday-school statistics of the county, prepared by the secretary of the Pickaway County Sabbath-school union, Mr. L. D. Lyon:

AN OLD TEACHERS' ASSOCIATION.

In May, 1833, "an Association of Teachers and Board of Education in Pickaway county," was organized, of which Guy W. Doane was president; Joseph Olds, vice-president; Arthur Whiteside, secretary; Sylvester Dana, treasurer, and S. Dana, Roswell Hill, Archibald U. Boalse, George A. Patterson and A. Whiteside, counsellors. The object of the association was to promote harmony, co-operation and the diffusion of knowledge among the members. Its meetings are held quarterly.

CHAPTER XIX.

MILITARY RECORD.

To narrate the many acts of heroic devotion to the Union, evinced by the inhabitants of the counties of Franklin and Pickaway, during those terrible years of the Rebellion, would require a volume in itself. Columbus and vicinity have furnished the location of many schools, where was taugh the "dread art of war." Even as early as 1812, we find an extensive encampment located near the then flourishing village of Franklinton. Later, during the Mexican war, a camp of rendezvous was established near Columbus, and last, in 1861, we find the Capitol city nearly surrounded by them. Early in the summer of this year, the lands comprised in what is now the beautiful retreat called Goodale park, were occupied as a military rendezvous, styled Camp Jackson, and here were organized and drilled the first troops who went to war from this section.

Camp Chase was next formed. It was situated on the National road, some four miles from the city, in Franklin township, and, after it was ready for occupancy, Camp Jackson was abandoned. Camp Chase became, from a simple place of rendezvous, quarters for paroled prisoners of war, and, later, great numbers of rebel prisoners were kept in confinement here. This was one of the most complete camps in the State, and was in use until the close of the war.

Another camp (Thomas) was established at a point near the Worthington road, and distant some four miles from the city. It was first occupied by the Eighteenth regiment United States infantry, commanded by Colonel H. B. Carrington.

Tod Barracks, named in honor of Ohio's patriotic governor, David Tod, were constructed in the fall of 1863. The location was on the east side of High street, and north of the railroad depot. They were for the accommodation of sick or disabled soldiers and recruits, and were subsequently the rendezvous of military organizations, awaiting muster out.

The United States garrison, situated northeast of, and some two miles from, the State house, was occupied by the United States, during the war, as an arsenal. The troops stationed here at present, are under the command of Colonel Anderson, of the United States army.

The Soldiers' home, located in Columbus, was established April 22, 1862, by, and under the supervision of, the Soldiers' Aid society. It was of great benefit to the needy soldier, whether clad in the blue or the gray. It closed, May 7, 1866, and the buildings, furniture, etc., were donated to the Hannah Neil mission—Ohio Soldiers' home. In the spring of 1864, the government erected buildings, some twenty in number, near the crossing of the Columbus & Xenia railroad, on the State quarry tract. These were denominated Tripler hospital, and in the fall of 1865, they were donated to the State for a soldiers' home. This was, we learn, the nucleus of the present establishment at Dayton.

The Ladies' Soldiers' Aid society was formed in the fall of 1861, as an auxiliary to the National Sanitary commission at Washington. It was eminently a success. Thousands of our brave boys at the front, in the field, and in the hospital, were made more comfortable through the patriotic efforts of the ladies composing this society.

At Circleville, a society of the same nature, toiled early and late for the soldier.

During the memorable raid of the rebel John Morgan through Ohio, in the summer of 1863, which eventually resulted in his capture, in Columbiana county, a great number of men turned out from Franklin and Pickaway counties to aid in the defence of points it was believed he would attack, and though theirs was a blodless campaign, yet they are entitled to credit for their ready response to the call. Many interesting incidents, ludicrous and otherwise, might be given, but space forbids.

The rallying of the squirrel hunters, in the autumn of 1862, was another instance illustrating the readiness with which the citizens of Ohio sprang to the defence of the flag. The writer is unable to give the number who participated from the counties of Franklin and Pickaway, but he is informed there were several hundred of them.

The descriptions following are compiled from the valuable work, by Whitelaw Reid, entitled "Ohio in the War." The roster is prepared in the office of the adjutant-general of the State of Ohio, and the names are copied verbatim, hence the writer cannot be responsible for errors in spelling. In addition to the rolls, the writer has availed himself of all the aids within his reach, to make the roster complete, showing the name of every soldier, of whatever rank, enrolled from the two counties. Some ten thousand names are given, and it is hoped none are omitted, though, from the imperfect condition of the rolls, and the carelessness in recording credits, it is highly probable that omissions occur.

WAR OF 1812.

The following is copied from a muster roll now preserved in the office of the adjutant-general of Ohio, of Captain George Sanderson's company. This was recruited in the counties of Franklin, Fairfield, and Delaware, but as we have no means by which to designate those from each county, we give the roll entire. It was attached to the Twenty-seventh regiment United States infantry, commanded by Colonel George Paul, and formed a part of General Harrison's army at the defence of Fort Stephenson, and was in the disastrous battle of the Thames, October 5, 1813:

SECOND REGIMENT OHIO VOLUNTEER INFANTRY.

This regiment was organized at Camp Dennison, in August and September, 1861. Before this period, it was in the three months service, participating in the first "flurry" of war around Washington city. In the organization for three years, the majority of the field, line and staff had seen three months' service.

In September, 1861, the regiment, with a full complement of officers, and over nine hundred men, moved, by order of General O. W. Mitchell, to Olympian Springs, in eastern Kentucky. This was the first regiment of national troops in that portion of the State, and the good behavior of the soldiers of the Second regiment did much to remove the general opinion that the "yankees" were anything except honorable.

On the twenty-second of October, the regiment made a forced night march, of nearly thirty miles, surprising, and totally defeating the rebels, under Jack May. The rebel loss, in killed and wounded, was considerable, while the Second came off unharmed.

Subsequently, the regiment joined the command of General Nelson, and was in the movement on Prestonburg, and the repulse of the rebels at Ivy Mountain, in which it lost two men killed, and seven wounded. From here the Second repaired to Louisville, where it was brigaded, and attached to the division of General O. M. Mitchell.

The winter of 1861–2 was passed in perfecting themselves in drill, preparatory to the arduous work before them.

In February, 1862, the division, Major-general B. C. Buell commanding, moved on Bowling Green, Gallatin and Nashville, occupying the last-named place. When, on march, General Buell's army moved to the assistance of General Grant, at Pittsburgh Landing, the Second Ohio moved, with its division, on Murfreesboro, Shelbyville, Fayetteville, and Huntsville, and engaged in several small affairs with the enemy, along the Memphis & Charleston railroad. The regiment was also with the column that first occupied Bridgeport.

On Bragg's invasion of Kentucky, the Second Ohio, then stationed at Battle Creek, Tennessee, moved across the mountains, to Louisville, where the army was organized. The Second was assigned to Rosseau's division, in General McCooks left wing, and, with two divisions of that command, participated in the well-contested battle of Perryville, or Chaplin Hills, losing, on the 8th of October, nearly forty per cent. of all engaged. Captains Berryhill and Herel, and twenty-seven enlisted men, were killed, and Captains Beatty, Maxwell and McCoy, and eighty-seven enlisted men, wounded. Our army pursued the flying rebels as far as Crab Orchard, and returned to Nashville. General Wm. S. Rosecrans, succeeding Buell in command, changed the name of the department to the "Army of the Cumberland." Subsequently, the division to which the Second Ohio was attached, was assigned to the Fourteenth army corps, General George H. Thomas, commanding, where it remained up to the battle of Atlanta, participating in all the marches and battles of that distinguished corps. At the battle of Stone River, December 31, 1862, the Second was closely engaged, andsuffered serious loss. In this action the regiment captured the colors of the Thirty-second regiment Arkansas volunteers. Chickamauga was the next battle-ground. In this hotly-contested engagement, the regiment lost one hundred and eighty-three officers and men, killed, wounded and missing.

Falling back into the intrenchments, they remained until November 24, 1862, when the brigade to which the Second Ohio was attached was sent to the assistance of General Hooker, participated, on Lookout mountain, in his celebrated battle above the clouds. In the battle of Mission Ridge, which occurred on the succeeding day, the regiment made its way to the crest, with slight loss, and captured the colors of the Thirty-eighth Alabama. The enemy was pursued to Ringgold, Georgia, where a halt was made. The regiment was in the advance in the reconnoissance to Buzzard's Roost, in February, 1864.

In May, following, the regiment formed a portion of Sherman's force for the Atlanta campaign, and on the fourteenth of that month, at Resaca, suffered heavily in an attempt to carry, by assault, the enemy's intrenched position, losing Captain Jacob Fottrell, and twelve men, killed, and Captains Staley and Mitchell, and twenty-seven men, wounded.

The regiment next moved with the division to the Ghattahootchie river, and on July 21, 1864, took part in the battle of Peachtree creek. Here First Lieutenant and Adjutant John W. Thomas was killed, the last man of the regiment to offer up his life for the flag.

The regiment remained in front of Atlanta until August 1, 1864, when it was ordered to Chattanooga, for final discharge, and some four weeks later was mustered out at Columbus, Ohio, having seen thirty-eight months of active service. The regiment's loss, killed in battle, one hundred and eleven; wounded, four hundred and twenty-five.

FOURTH REGIMENT OHIO VOLUNTEER INFANTRY—

COMPANY C.

Mustered into service June 5, 1861.

PRIVATES.

Charles Gaylord,
George Torrance.

The Steuben Guards, Captain Schneider, and Montgomery Guards, Captain O. Turney, were recruited in and about Columbus, and the writer is informed they were assigned to this regiment. No rolls of either company are on file in the office of the adjutant-general.

The rolls of all three months organizations are very defective, and many are missing altogether.

THIRTEENTH REGIMENT OHIO VOLUNTEER INFANTRY.

This regiment was organized at Camp Jackson, Columbus, in April, 1861, and on Thursday, May 9th, moved to Camp Dennison, where it was drilled and disciplined for the dread labor of war. June 30th it embarked for Western Virginia, to reinforce McClellan's command. September 10th, Colonel Smith led his regiment in the battle of Carnifax Ferry, occupying the extreme left, where a good record was made for the command, after which the regiment encamped at Gauley Bridge until November 6th, when it began the pursuit of the rebel Floyd. The first brush occurred at Cotton Hill, where the regiment lost one killed and two wounded. The chase was continued to Fayetteville, and, having driven the rebels from Western Virginia, the troops were ordered west, the Thirteenth going into camp opposite Louisville, Kentucky. The regiment finally moved to Bacon Creek, where it remained engaged in drill until February 10, 1862, when it marched to Bowling Green. From there it repaired to Nashville, encamping near the city. April 2d the regiment marched to reinforce General Grant, and reached Savannah, on the Tennessee river, on the morning of the 6th. It at once marched to the battle-field, and, with the Fifth division, formed on the right of Nelson's command. About eight o'clock the division moved forward. The enemy was soon found in position, supported by the famous Washington battery, of New Orleans. The Thirteenth charged on this battery, and after a desperate struggle, captured it entire, but only to lose it, as the enemy, in large numbers, charged and re-took the pieces. Major Ben. P. Runkle was severely wounded at this time. About one o'clock, in the last grand advance, the Thirteenth again dashed forward to capture the battery, and this time was successful. The enemy retreated, and the Thirteenth joined the advance on Corinth. After the evacuation of this point, the Union forces advanced against Chattanooga.

August 20th orders were received to march in pursuit of Bragg, and this march made the Army of the Ohio a record as enduring as time. From August 21st to September 26th—a period of thirty-six days—the National soldiers patiently toiled on after the enemy, enduring the hot sun, almost unbearable thirst, half rations, and the stifling dust. What soldiers of the Thirteenth Ohio will ever forget this terrible march? Reaching Louisville, on the 26th, a rest was had until the first of October, when the pursuit of Bragg was resumed.

October 8th the regiment was at Perryville, but was not actively engaged. December 2d the army was reviewed by General Rosecrans, near Nashville, and the Second was complimented by the general for their soldierly appearance. December 26, 1862, the advance on Murfreesboro was commenced. The Thirteenth was in Crittenden's division, and the next we see of it is at Stone river. Here, on Wednesday, December 31st, the regiment lost, in one hour's time, one hundred and fifty-two killed, wounded, and missing. The total loss in the series of battles at this point was one hundred and eighty-five. Now followed comparative inactivity until the battles of Chickamauga, and in these the regiment preserved, unsullied, its record made sacred at Stone River.

On the twenty-second of September the regiment skirmished the entire forenoon on Missionary Ridge, withdrawing at noon to its former place, in the intrenchments of Chattanooga. November 23, the army moved to the expulsion of Bragg from the Ridge. History has already recorded the successful charge, that swept the host down the mountains, across the valley, and converted its retreat into a shameful rout. In this charge the Thirteenth bore itself bravely, and, it is claimed, was the first to plant the colors on the rebel works. Sergeant Daniel Ritter, of Company A, was the first in the regiment to scale and enter the fortifications. The losses were severe.

On the twenty-eighth of November the Thirteenth advanced, with the army, to the rescue of Knoxville. The enemy retreated, and were pursued to near Church Mountain. This was a march of much suffering, for want of shoes and clothing, as well as rations. Returning to Knoxville, the regiment re-enlisted, as veterans, and the men were granted a furlough. Those who failed to become veterans, were transferred to the Fifty-ninth Ohio, then (January 28, 1864,) stationed at Marysville, near Knoxville.

The latter part of March, 1864, the regiment returned to duty, and was assigned to the Third brigade, Third division, and Fourth corps, in the Army of the Cumberland, then commanded by Major-General George H. Thomas.

May 1, 1864, the troops were ordered to prepare for the Atlanta campaign, and, on the third, struck tents and advanced against Ringgold, Georgia; then to Rocky Face ridge, and on to Resaca. In the engagements of this march the Thirteenth lost heavily. Still, the pursuit was continued until the rebels massed around Lost Mountain, and on May 27th the battle occurred. The Third division struck the enemy's center, and encountered breastworks gray with men and bristling with artillery. Our troops advanced, in three lines of battle, through a dense wood, and were met by a terrific discharge from the enemy, then but a few yards in advance. This destroyed the first line. The second line, of which the Thirteenth formed a part, immediately advanced on the double-quick, and, with a yell and a volley, rushed up to the works, and the contest continued from four o'clock in the afternoon until nine at night. Although our forces held the position, they were unable to capture the rebel works. The ammunition of the Thirteenth was exhausted, McCulloch was wounded, Thompson's right arm was shattered, and the killed and wounded were lying thickly around. Major J. T. Snyder, in command of the Thirteenth, still rallied the regiment, and, the ammunition becoming exhausted, he took that remaining in the boxes of the dead and wounded comrades, and distributed it with his own hands to the men. General Thomas finally ordered our forces to withdraw. The Thirteenth lost, in this engagement, fifty men, killed, wounded and prisoners.

June 21st, the non-veterans were discharged, and the remainder of the regiment formed into a battalion of four companies, under command of Major Snyder, still retaining its endeared title, "Thirteenth," and retaining its position in the brigade.

At Kennesaw the Thirteenth was in the thickest of the fight, losing a number in killed and wounded. Next at Atlanta, where the battalion did its full share, until the surrender. From this time forward the battalion was engaged with its division until June 16, 1865, when it was ordered to Texas, where it remained until December 5, 1865, when it was mustered out.

THIRTIETH REGIMENT OHIO VOLUNTEER INFANTRY.

This regiment was organized at Camp Chase, Ohio, on the twenty-eighth day of August, 1861; was armed at once, and, on the thirtieth, ordered to the field. The next day found the regiment at Benwood, Virginia, and on the second of September it reached Clarksburg. Here an attack was expected, and company H was sent out to reconnoiter, but the enemy was not discovered. Late the same evening the regiment marched, and on the afternoon of the next day entered Weston and encamped beside the Forty-seventh Ohio, with the fortunes of which it was afterward closely allied. Here the regiment received its camp and garrison equipage. Two wagons were furnished each company, and these were deemed barely sufficient for transportation. In later years the men considered themselves fortunate if there was one wagon for the regiment. September 6th the regiment joined General Rosecrans at Sutton Heights, where companies D, F and G remained, the remainder of the regiment marching with the army toward Summerville. Companies C and E were left at Big Birch Bottoms, while the remaining five companies moved on to Carnifax Ferry, where a sharp engagement took place, the enemy retreating. A considerable amount of camp equipage, and some huge double-edged knives, with which one of the rebels was to annihilate five of the Yankees, fell into the hands of the National army. A stand of colors, on which was inscribed "Floyd's Brigade"—"The price of liberty is the blood of the brave," was secured by the Thirtieth. November 14th the regiment went into camp at Fayetteville. In the meantime the detachment at Sutton was frequently in expeditions against bushwhackers and horse-thieves. Two men of the Thirtieth were killed and quite a number were wounded in the various skirmishes. On the twenty-third of December this detachment joined the regiment at Fayetteville, and on the twenty-fifth the regiment held its first dress parade. During the winter, which was wet and sickly, several companies were sent to outposts, and all worked upon fortifications. Company H, from Pickaway county, was sent to the White House, on Soup Creek road. April 17th the regiment broke camp and moved to Raleigh, and from there it marched, on May 5th, toward Giles Court House. On the tenth it encamped at the confluence of the East and New rivers. Company H was pushed up the Narrows, and succeeded in developing the enemy's position and drawing the fire of his batteries. For eight days the allowance of rations was one cracker, with a small quantity of sugar, coffee, beans and rice to each man. On August 16th the Thirtieth marched to join the army in eastern Virginia, and at noon on the nineteenth reached Brownstown, on the Kanawha, having carried knapsacks and marched ninety-five miles in three days and a half. All were delighted to leave the mountains, and when the band played "Get out of the wilderness," as it came down Cotton Hill to the river, the deafening cheers that went up from the column showed that the hit was duly appreciated. Proceeding on transports to Parkersburg, the regiment took the cars for the east, and on August 23d passed through Washington city, encamping at night at Warrenton Junction, Virginia.

General Robertson says of the Thirtieth at Centerville: "It moved forward under a heavy fire from the enemy's batteries in as good order as if on parade."

At South Mountain, on September 14th, the regiment lay for several hours under a terrific artillery fire, and at four o'clock in the afternoon advanced against the enemy, who were intrenched behind a stone wall. The "Graybacks" advanced, and a hot engagement ensued, lasting forty-five minutes. The regiment stood its ground bravely, losing eighteen men killed, and forty-eight wounded.

September 17th the regiment was heavily engaged, losing two officers killed, two wounded, and forty-five privates killed and wounded. The National colors were torn in fourteen places by the enemy's balls, and two color bearers (Sergeants White and Carter) fell dead on the field.

After remaining a few days near the battle-ground, the regiment moved for West Virginia, and on the tenth of October reached Hancock, on the Potomac, and for a time was engaged, almost daily, in fruitless marching. December 5th, the Thirtieth, with its brigade, embarked on transports, and steamed down the river, arriving at Louisville, Kentucky, January 3, 1863. It moved down the stream until it reached Helena, Arkansas, where it was assigned to the Second division of the Fifteenth army corps. January 21st, the regiment landed at Young's Point, and here it remained, engaged on the canal, and took part in numerous excursions into the surrounding country. Resuming the march, the regiment, on May 19th, arrived in the rear of Vicksburg, and from this time until its final capitulation, was engaged in skirmish, picket and fatigue duty. After the surrender of Vicksburg, the regiment went into camp, July 23rd, near Black river. The losses of the Thirtieth, during the siege, were some sixty killed and wounded.

Leaving Black river, with the army, on September 26th, it moved up the river, to Memphis, where it arrived October 2d. Two days later it resumed the march, and on November 20th it camped at Brown's Ferry, ten miles from Chattanooga. The twenty-fifth of the same month, it assaulted and carried the outer line of the enemy's works at Mission Ridge. From November 29th to December 19th, the regiment subsisted off the country, and were engaged nearly the entire time in pursuit of the enemy. In addition, nearly one-fourth of the men were without shoes. In January, 1864, at Cleveland, Tennessee, the regiment re-enlisted, to the number of three hundred and fifteen men, and repaired to Columbus, where it was furloughed on the ninth of April. On the expiration of the furlough, the regiment re-formed at Columbus, and proceeded, via Cincinnati, Louisville, Nashville and Chattanooga, to Kingston, Georgia, where it arrived May 20th. Three days later, the regiment was again on the march. It moved through Dallas and Ackworth, arriving at the foot of Kennesaw mountain June 19th. During this march the regiment was almost continually under fire. Early in July, the regiment moved to Atlanta, and on the twenty-second was in the assault, losing twenty-seven in killed, wounded and prisoners. On the twenty-eighth, the regiment sustained four successive charges, in which it lost thirty men in killed and wounded. The enemy abandoned a stand of colors, under the regiment's fire, and one hundred and five dead rebels were picked up in its immediate front. August 29, 1864, those who were not veterans were mustered out, by reason of expiration of term of service, and from this time until August 13, 1865, at Louisville, Kentucky, the regiment was actively engaged in the defence of the starry ensign.

August 22, 1865, it was paid and discharged at Columbus, having traveled as a regiment, during its term of service, thirteen thousand, two hundred miles.

FORTY-SIXTH REGIMENT OHIO VOLUNTEER INFANTRY.

This regiment was recruited at Worthington, Franklin county, in the month of September, and was organized on October 16, 1861. On February 22, 1862, it reported at Paducah, Kentucky, with an aggregate of nine hundred and seventy-five men, and was brigaded with the Sixth Iowa and the Fortieth Illinois, in General Sherman's division.

On March 8th the regiment arrived at Savannah, and was engaged during the entire battle of Pittsburg Landing. Its loss was two hundred and eighty killed and wounded, and fifteen captured. The dead were conveyed to a spot a little to the south of the summit of the ridge overlooking Owl creek, immediately in front of the first line of battle, and near the Purdy road, and there interred in single graves, with the honors of war. April 27th, the regiment moved, with the army, upon Corinth. In November the regiment started on a campaign through Mississippi, under General Grant, but was obliged to return. Early in June the regiment joined in the siege of Vicksburg, and, after the surrender, moved in the direction of Jackson. October 10th, the regiment, with the Fifteenth corps, embarked for Memphis, and from there marched to the relief of Chattanooga. At the battle of Mission Ridge, the regiment was heavily engaged, and lost many in killed and wounded. Soon after, it marched to Knoxville, and from there to Scottsboro', Alabama, where it arrived December 31, 1863, having marched over five hundred miles in about two months, exposed to inclement weather, without tents, and almost without food and clothing. Here the regiment was armed with Spencer's repeating rifled muskets; and here, too, it reenlisted as veterans. It was furloughed on March 30, 1864, and, after an absence of thirty-eight days, it returned to its camp at Scottsboro'. On May 1st the regiment moved, by way of Chattanooga, to Resaca, where it was engaged on the 13th, 14th and 15th, with but small loss. From here the march was resumed to Dallas. In the engagements at this point the Spencer rifles caused such havoc, that ever after the Forty-sixth was known and dreaded throughout the opposing army.

Next the regiment participated in the battle of New Hope Church. The command gained a position within eighty yards of the enemy. Their fire was harassing the brigade greatly, and Colonel Walcutt, commanding, determined to gain the rebel line without loss. He arranged the brigade as for a charge, with flags flying, and all the buglers in the line. His men, who were well covered, were directed to bring their guns to bear along the enemy's parapet; when the bugles sounded to forward, the enemy raised, as had been expected, to repel the anticipated assault, but received, instead, a severe fire. The result was, the enemy abandoned the works in confusion, and, during the night, withdrew. June 6th, the brigade passed through Ackworth, and went into bivouac until the ninth, when it went on a reconnoisance to Kenesaw, where it joined its division. June 15th, the Forty-sixth, with its brigade, supported by the two brigades of the division, was ordered to charge a line on a ridge some half a mile distant. This was done in gallant style. Twenty-two officers, four hundred men and six hundred stand of small arms were captured, and many of the enemy were killed and wounded. On the twenty-sixth, Walcutt's, and two brigades from General Smith's division, were detailed as a storming party. The Forty-sixth was in the advance of the movement. The heavy abatis of the enemy's main works was too cumbersome, and, after repeated and determined efforts, our men were obliged to withdraw. In this assault the Forty-sixth captured sixty prisoners, but its own loss, in killed and wounded was severe. After the evacuation of Kenesaw, the regiment moved for Atlanta, and, on the evening of the twentieth, went into line in front of the city. Here it did gallant service. At Ezra Church the regiment was again engaged, capturing the colors of the Thirtieth Louisiana, with its colonel. Ten officers and fully one-half of the men of the rebel regiment were killed. The flag, which was a present from the ladies of New Orleans to the regiment, was presented by General Logan to its immediate captor, Harry Davis, and was contributed by him to the State of Ohio. It is now in the relic room of the State House, at Columbus.

August 3d the Forty-sixth, with details from other regiments, was ordered to drive in, or capture, the enemy's outposts. The contest was severe, and resulted in the capture of about one hundred prisoners. At Jonesboro' the regiment charged the enemy's line, on the twenty-eighth, capturing four officers and fifty men. On the second of September the regiment captured the enemy's fortified skirmish line. At Lovejoy's station, the regiment had a hand to hand conflict, in which the enemy was forced to retire, with a loss of about fifty prisoners. Next, the regiment moved against Hood, in northern Georgia and Alabama, after which it retired to the vicinity of Atlanta, where it arrived on November 5th. The regiment was at Raleigh when the news of the surrender of Lee's army was received. It participated in the grand review at Washington, and was mustered out July 22, 1865.

SIXTY-FIRST REGIMENT OHIO VOLUNTEER INFANTRY.

This regiment was made up from almost every county in the State. Companies B and C were largely recruited from Pickaway county. It was organized at Camp Chase, April 23, 1862, and departed for Western Virginia May 27, 1862. One month later it joined Major-General Fremont's army at Strasburg, and marched with it to Sperryville, Virginia, where Major-General Pope assumed command of the army.

At Freeman's Ford, on the Rappahannock river, the Sixty-first had its first fight with the enemy—a part of Longstreet's corps. In the second Bull Run battle it covered the retreat of the National forces on the Centerville turnpike, toward Washington. In this engagement the Sixty-first lost twenty-five men, killed and wounded. September 2d the regiment was engaged at Fairfax Court House, and eventually fell back to the chain bridge and formed a part of the reserve force, under General Siegel, for the protection of Washington. January 20, 1863, the regiment marched to Hartwood Church, and built winter quarters; but after occupying them one night they were abandoned, and the regiment marched to Stafford Court House, where it remained until April 27, 1863.

The Sixty-first then crossed the Rappahannock at Kelley's ford, and moved to the rear of the rebel position at Fredericksburg, where it formed a connection with that portion of the National army which crossed the Rappahannock at United States Ford. It took position on the right, preparatory to the battle of Chancellorsville, which was opened at six o'clock on the evening of May 2d. The Sixty-first was engaged on the 2d, 3d, 4th, and 5th. It lost four officers wounded, a large number of men wounded, and five killed. June 12th it joined in pursuit of Lee's rebel army, at that time making its way into Pennsylvania. It opened the battle of Gettysburg, on July 1st, and suffered severely, losing heavily in killed, wounded, and prisoners. Captain Bending and Lieutenant Mill were captured and kept in rebel prisons until the close of the war. October 27th the regiment started for Chattanooga, to aid in opening communication, by way o the Tennessee river, with that beleaguered city. On the night of the 28th it was engaged in a fierce fight at Wauhatchie valley, defeating and driving the rebels across Lookout creek. In this fight three were killed and a number wounded.

On the twenty-third, twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth of November the regiment was engaged in Mission Ridge fight, and on the twenty-ninth it marched with the National forces to the relief of Knoxville, after which it returned to Bridgeport, Tennessee, to winter quarters. In March, 1864, the Sixty first re-enlisted and was ordered to Ohio on its veteran furlough of thirty days. On April 28, 1864, the regiment re-assembled at Camp Dennison, Ohio, and on the same day started for the front, reaching Chattanooga on the fifth of May. On Sunday, May 15th, the regiment participated in the bloody action at Resaca, losing several men. From this time until November 15th the regiment was engaged in numerous actions and skirmishes, and lost many men in killed and wounded. November 15th it started with General Sherman's army in its "march to the sea." In this great march the regiment had but one skirmish with the enemy—at Sandersville, Georgia. Aside from hard marches through the swamps of South Carolina, nothing of interest occurred until Bentonville was reached. At this point the last real battle of the march was fought. The Sixty-first Ohio performed its part in this battle, and lost some men wounded and captured.

Marching with the army, the regiment reached Coldsboro', North Carolina, where it was consolidated with the Eighty-second Ohio, the combined regiment taking the name of the latter-named organization. This act blotted from the rolls of the army the name of the Sixty-first Ohio, but it does remain on record. It was always a reliable regiment, and was always found where duty called it. Its losses by its casualties of the field were so numerous that at the close of its service a little band of only sixty men and officers remained to answer to its last roll-call.

The consolidated regiment joined in the march through the rebel capital to Washington city, where it participated in the grand review, and, after a slight detention, was sent home to Columbus and mustered out of the service about the first of September, 1865.

NINETIETH REGIMENT OHIO VOLUNTEER INFANTRY.

This regiment was organized at Lancaster, Ohio, July 15, 1862. The organization of the regiment was completed and it was mustered into service August 28, 1862. Its aggregate strength was thirty-eight commissioned officers and nine hundred and forty-three men. Companies A and F were recruited from Pickaway county. On the afternoon of August 29th the regiment embarked on the cars for Covington, Kentucky, where it reported to Major-General Wright on the 30th. From there it reported to General Nelson, at Lexington, Kentucky.

On September 1st rumors of the advance of the rebel army from Richmond became so strong that the army stores were burned, and preparations were made for immediate retreat. At three o'clock, afternoon, the regiment was in line on the Versailles turnpike, detailed as guards for the wagon trains. At four, afternoon, the National forces had reached Versailles, a distance of twelve miles, and were in full retreat. This forced march was continued to Louisville, the men suffering terribly on the way from thirst and stifling dust. The fatigue was truly agonizing. This suffering was intensely aggravated by guarding the wells and cisterns along the route, which compelled the officers and soldiers to drink from the stagnant pools beside the road. The command consisted mostly of new levies, consequently the men were all unused to such hardships, and many sank under the terrible strain. At Shelbyville (a beautiful village) the thirst of the men was alleviated by the clear spring water kindly issued to each man by the citizens, as the column passed along. At one o'clock, afternoon, September 5th, the regiment encamped near Louisville, having marched one hundred miles in eighty-six hours, taking, in the meantime, less than sixteen hours' sleep.

At Louisville the regiment was assigned to the Twenty-first army corps, and marched with General Buell's army in pursuit of the rebel forces, under Bragg. On the fifteenth of October it crossed Little Rock-Castle river, and, meeting the enemy, posted on the road leading to Wild Cat mountain, drove them from that position. On the 20th, the regiment surprised twelve hundred of the enemy, and, with a yell, swooped down upon them, capturing over two hundred prisoners, and an equal number of cattle. While on this march, it effectually destroyed Goose Creek salt works, a valuable deposit, from which the rebels had long been drawing their supplies of that indispensable article.

The march through this region was one of great hardship. Many of the men were shoeless, and in marching over the snow-clad ground, they left their footprints marked with blood. On the twenty-sixth of December, 1862, the Ninetieth Ohio moved, with the army, on Murfreesboro, Tennessee. On the night of the 30th, the division formed within one mile of Stone river. The morning of the 31st found the regiment in line; after standing thus for several hours, hearing the din of battle, its turn came to be placed face to face with the enemy, when it fought as coolly as if it had been on a hundred battle-fields. The regiment lost, in this fight, one hundred and thirty men killed, wounded and missing. The regiment lay in camp until June 23d, when it moved, with General Rosecrans, on Tullahoma, and there it did effective work. Its losses were eighty-eight officers and men killed, wounded and missing. From here the march was resumed to Bridgeport, Alabama. January 24, 1864, it again moved, this time to Ooltewah, Tennessee, where it went into camp. This was abandoned on the third of May, at one o'clock in the afternoon, and then commenced the great Atlanta campaign. For one hundred and twenty days, the Ninetieth Ohio, in company with the National forces, marched, fought and suffered, until the eighth of September, it had the satisfaction of entering the city of Atlanta—fairly won. The regiment camped here until October 3d, when it received orders to move. Passing through Atlanta, it made its way over nearly the same ground it had marched in its advance on that city. The regiment, with the Fourth corps, participated in all the brilliant fights on the way, including that of Franklin, which has been pronounced one of the most bloody of the whole war. It was also in the battle before Nashville, and after victory had crowned the National arms, joined in the pursuit of the demoralized rebels to the banks of the Tennessee river. On the fourth of January, 1865, it went into camp near Huntsville, Alabama, where it remained until March, when it moved to Nashville. It remained here until the surrender of the rebel armies, when it was sent home to Ohio and mustered out.

NINETY-FIFTH REGIMENT OHIO VOLUNTEER INFANTRY.

On the nineteenth of August, 1862, this regiment was mustered into the service of the United States at Camp Chase. The following day it proceeded to Lexington, Kentucky, where it was brigaded, and soon transferred to Richmond, Kentucky. The brigade made a forced march to this place and drove off the rebels, after they had sent in a flag of truce, asking the surrender of the town.

August 29th the regiment, with its brigade, had an encounter with Kirby Smith's advance, capturing one gun. They remained all night on the field, confident of their ability to defend the approaches to Richmond, and underestimating, in their ignorance, the enemy's strength. The almost impassable barrier afforded by the precipitous approaches to the Kentucky river, had been left fifteen miles in the rear, while they advanced to encounter an army of veterans double their numerical strength. Kirby Smith was then on his march to the Ohio river, making his famous northern raid, that will long live in story and in the memory of the squirrel hunters who were summoned to the defence of Cincinnati. Across his way, and barring it, lay an army of ten thousand raw recruits, with only nine pieces of artillery. Veterans would have fallen back to the river, where it was possible to delay the advance of the enemy until the arrival of reinforcements. But it was not so ordered in the book of fate. Blind to the danger, and bold to rashness, our troops not only stood their ground, but advanced to meet certain defeat and almost annihilation. As no other regiment of Ohio troops participated in the battles around Richmond, a brief description will be interesting.

The rebel army made an attack the next morning, and at nine o'clock made a determined charge, which drove our men from the field. One hundred and twenty men of the Ninety-fifth, and a majority of the line officers, commanded by the lieutenant-colonel, deeming themselves the only representatives of the State on the field, scorned to fly, and fought desperately, until completely surrounded and forced to surrender. The scattered and demoralized forces made another stand, a mile or two in the rear, but were scattered like chaff, and still farther on a third stand, which resulted, after a stubborn, though brief resistance, in a tumultuous retreat for the river. The loss to the Ninety-fifth was eight men killed, forty-seven wounded, and six hundred captured. The loss of the other regiments engaged was about two hundred and fifty killed, eight hundred wounded, and near two thousand captured. The rebel loss in killed and wounded was heavier than ours.

November 20, 1862, the regiment was exchanged, reorganized, and sent to Memphis, where it arrived May 25, 1863, six hundred strong. It was attached to a division and moved to Vicksburg. Here it did effective service until a few days previous to the capture of the city. It also aided in the capture of Jackson, Mississippi, and in the operations around the Big Black river.

The regiment participated in Sherman's attempt to storm the works of Vicksburg, on May 22d, where, besides sustaining a repulse, many brave men were sacrificed. After the fall of Vicksburg, another attack was made on Jackson, where the rebels were whipped, after which our troops went into winter quarters near Memphis. During the winter the Ninety-fifth was assigned to the Sixteenth corps, with which it served until the end of the war.

Early in June, 1864, an attempt was made to strike the Mobile & Ohio road, in the vicinity of Tupelo. This ended in defeat. The Ninety-fifth went into the affair with nineteen commissioned officers and three hundred muskets, and got back to Memphis with nine officers and about one hundred and fifty men.

Early in July, the regiment marched with General Smith's expedition to Memphis, and, after skirmishing along the way, formed near Tupelo. The Confederates made a furious attack, and were handsomely whipped. On returning to Memphis, Forrest made a night attack, and got badly whipped again. Smith's forces were moved to Nashville, arriving the evening after the battle of Franklin. On the morning of December 15th, General Smith's force, now an army corps, stationed on Thomas' right, pushed boldly out from their works, and were soon on Hood's left flank. Here an assaulting column, including the Ninety-fifth, was formed. In a few minutes the first rebel work, mounting three guns, was captured. From a hill farther on, crowned with a redoubt, the rebels poured a galling fire on the victors. Without halting, on went our forces, like wild buffaloes, over the intrenchments and into the works, capturing more guns and holding the position.

The next day Hood's second line was attacked. The Ninety-fifth, and other regiments, piled knapsacks, and, with orders neither to fire a shot nor to yell, they "went" for the works and carried them by storm, capturing battle-flags, guns and prisoners. The cloud, that for more than two years had rested above the regiment, sailed away, and the boys triumphed in the sunshine of victory, though the feeling was mixed with sadness when their rolls were called, bearing the names of one-half their comrades, whose bones were whitening on many a southern battle-field. After these successes, the regiment performed its part in the pursuit of Hood, and joined General Canby's forces, at New Orleans, in the reduction of Mobile, where it arrived in March, 1865. From this time until the bursting of the Confederate bubble, the regiment did guard duty. At the close of the war, it was ordered to Camp Chase, and mustered out August 19, 1865. The rolls showed that of one thousand and eighty-five officers and men, composing the regiment, five hundred and twenty-eight officers and men were killed in battle, died of wounds, or were starved to death in southern prison pens by order of the chivalrous (?) Davis, amateur president, etc.

ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTEENTH REGIMENT OHIO VOLUNTEER INFANTRY.

The organization of this regiment was commenced at Camp Chase, in August, 1862. Seven companies were recruited there. The regiment was ordered to Zanesville, and afterwards to Camp Dennison, a company being added at each place. December 27th, it was ordered to Louisville, where danger was expected from the Morgan raid. The order was altogether unexpected, as the organization was incomplete, but in two hours after its reception the regiment was on its way, finely equipped. In February, 1863, it was ordered to Nashville, and while there, suffered severely from sickness. The regiment was assigned to General C. C. Gilbert's division, and moved to Franklin, where it participated in several expeditions against the enemy. The command formed the right wing of the army of the Cumberland, as it entered upon the Tullahoma campaign. After a wearisome and trying march over the mountains, the regiment bore a distinguished part in the sanguinary battle of Chickamauga, being brought into action on the afternoon of the second day, at the most critical point and moment. It was a bloody baptism for the regiment, as its loss was one hundred and thirty-eight, officers and men, out of three hundred and eighty.

The division formed a part of General Sherman's force at the battle of Mission Ridge. From here the regiment moved to the relief of Knoxville. This was a march of much suffering. The men marched without sufficient clothing, without blankets or overcoats, and many of them without shoes. After Longstreet was forced to retire, the regiment returned to Chattanooga, and thence to McAfee's Church, eight miles south, where it went into winter quarters. Here it remained until May 7, 1864, when it moved on the Atlanta campaign. The regiment was at Buzzard's Gap, Resaca, Rome, Dallas and New Hope Church, and on to Kennesaw Mountain. In this battle [Kennesaw] the regiment formed the first line of assault, and lost ten officers and one hundred and fifty-three men.

According to the diary of an officer, during one hundred and seven days of the Atlanta campaign, the regiment was under fire eighty-nine days. It afterward joined Sherman in his "march to the sea," bearing fully its share of the fights and hardships of this memorable journey. After the surrender of Johnson, it moved to Washington, and participated in the grand review. It was mustered out at Louisville, Kentucky, July 6, 1865, and soon after discharged at Columbus, Ohio.

ONE HUNDRED AND FOURTEENTH REGIMENT OHIO VOLUNTEER INFANTRY.

This regiment was recruited in August, 1862, and rendezvoused at Camp Circleville, where it was mustered into the United States service September 11, 1862. September 19th the regiment was ordered to Marietta, where it remained until December 1st. It was then ordered to Memphis. Arriving there, it was assigned to Sherman's army, then about to operate in the rear of Vicksburg. December 26th it participated in the assault on Chickasaw bayou, and was actively engaged during the whole of this battle, losing several men killed and wounded. January 1, 1863, the army retreated. It was placed on boats and moved up the river. On the tenth it anchored near Arkansas Post, and on the morning of the next day attacked this stronghold, which surrendered at two o'clock in the afternoon. The National troops, after disposing of the material and prisoners captured, reembarked and sailed to Young's Point, Louisiana, where it arrived January 23, 1863. Here the regiment suffered severely from sickness, losing over one hundred men in six weeks' time.

On April 5, 1863, the National army, under General Grant, moved against Vicksburg. The One Hundred and Fourteenth was in the whole of this great campaign, and participated in the battles of Thompson's Hill, Champion Hills, Big Black Bridge, and the siege of Vicksburg, in each of which it suffered loss. In the charge at Vicksburg, May 22, 1863, Colonel Cradlebaugh was severely wounded in the mouth, from the effect of which he was obliged to resign. From this time forward the regiment was, for much of the time, moving, and without serious engagements until the close of the war, although it was engaged at Graham's plantation, near Alexandria, Louisiana, at Marksville and Yellow bayou, and suffered at times severely from the effect of the stifling heat, dust, and the scarcity of water.

In July the regiment was ordered from Texas to Columbus, Ohio, paid, and mustered out. The regiment marched during its term of service over ten thousand miles, doing duty in ten different States. It was engaged in eight hard-fought battles and many skirmishes, and lost in killed and wounded six officers and eighty men. The loss by disease was great the first year, about two hundred men having died, and quite a number discharged for disability.

ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-FIFTH REGIMENT OHIO VOLUNTEER INFANTRY.

This regiment was organized at Camp Chase, on February 26, 1865, for the period of one year. Its aggregate strength was one thousand and six men, one-half of whom were veterans. It left Camp Chase February 27th, en-route for Nashville, but was detained at Louisville, Kentucky. Regimental headquarters were established at Eminence, Kentucky, and the companies stationed at different points, for the purpose of guard duty. It had no opportunity of showing its fighting qualities, as the bubble burst soon after its entrance into the service. It was mustered out at Lexington, Kentucky, September 26th, and repaired to Camp Chase, where it was discharged, October 2, 1865.

ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-THIRD REGIMENT NATIONAL GUARD.

This regiment was mustered into service May 6, 1864, and was immediately ordered into West Virginia. Its aggregate strength was nine hundred and seventeen men. The time was occupied by drill until June 12th, when it reached Bermuda Hundred, and was assigned to the First division, Tenth army corps. On the 16th the division was ordered to destroy the Richmond & Petersburg railroad, and the One Hundred and Thirty-third was assigned to the support of a battery. Some four miles of track was torn up and the division retired in good order. The regiment lost two men wounded in this affair.

July 17th, the regiment proceeded to Fort Powhattan, on the James, where it was employed in repairing a line of telegraph to Swain's Point. In this duty encounters with the enemy were common, in one of which the rebels killed two men in the regiment, whom they shamelessly mutilated and left naked in the public road. A detachment, sent out to avenge the outrage, succeeded in killing the leader of the gang and wounded another.

August 10th, the regiment proceeded to Washington city, and from thence to Camp Chase, when it was mustered out August 20, 1864.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY-FIFTH REGIMENT NATIONAL GUARD.

The Ninety-second regiment and the Forty-fourth battalion Ohio national guard were consolidated at Camp Dennison, forming the regiment named at the head of this sketch.

It was mustered into the service May 1, 1864, and the next day started for New Creek, West Virginia. Upon the arrival there it was ordered to Martinsburg, where it performed garrison duty until June 3d, when it moved to Washington city. From there it proceeded to White House; thence to Bermuda Hundred, and thence to City Point, where it remained until the 29th, when it was ordered to Norfolk. Here the regiment was placed in the entrenchments. July 26th five hundred men of the regiment marched to Elizabeth City, North Carolina, and were here held in reserve, while the cavalry raided the country, securing cotton, tobacco, and horses, after which it returned to Norfolk. On August 19th the regiment was ordered to Ohio for muster out. It arrived at Camp Dennison, and was mustered out of service August 27, 1864.

THE SQUIRREL HUNTERS.

During the autumn of 1862, the Confederate general, Kirby Smith, advanced upon Cincinnati with a large army. Governor Tod issued a proclamation, calling upon all who would furnish themselves with rations and arms to turn out, organize under their own officers, and rendezvous at Cincinnati, transportation over the railroads to be provided by the government. Many citizens of Franklin and Pickaway counties responded to this call. These men, of course, saw no fighting, but their work was cheerfully performed, because they thought their services were needed. Governor Tod caused lithograph discharges to be furnished to those whose names could be obtained. These discharges may be found in many homes in the two counties, where they are doubtless properly prized.

CHAPTER XX.

THE FRANKLIN COUNTY PRESS.*

FRANKLIN county has been prolific in newspapers. Since the organization of the county, no less than sixty-four newspaper publications, of various kinds, have been started and published, for varying lengths of time. Most of them were of an ephemeral character, and had but a brief existence. Started in support of some short-lived political organization, as the exponent of some social or political theory, as campaign journals, and for purposes of a transient character, they passed out of existence when the cause which evoked them disappeared. Some were removed to other points, and are still published there; and others, perhaps the greater part of the whole number, became merged in the stronger journals, and in the newspapers of to-day still have their existence. The Ohio State Journal and Ohio Statesman, during the many years of their eventful history, swallowed up many of their weaker contemporaries, adding to their own strength thereby. To write the full history of all these journals were impossible, with the space at command. Most of them are forgotten. The generation which knew them, and the issues for which they have contended have passed away. Yes, to write their history fully would be to write the history of seventy eventful years, and the biographies of many men, eminent in politics as well as journalism, and who have left their mark upon the history of the State. The Columbus press has been a powerful factor, in moulding and controlling the politics of the State. Its influence has been powerful, and has been felt beyond the confines of the State. For years the State Journal was the central and principal organ of the Whig and Republican parties in the State, as was the Statesman of the Democracy. Connnected with both these journals have been men whose reputation is national, and were, in their day, powerful in the political councils of their respective parties. A mere outline of the more important history of these journals is all that is attempted in this work.

THE OHIO STATE JOURNAL

is the oldest newspaper in Franklin county, and its origin dates back to the earliest history of the county. It was started at Worthington, in 1811, by Colonel Kilbourne, one of the pioneers of the county, as a Whig organ, supporting James Madison for the presidency. It was called, at that time, the Western Intelligencer. Under this name it was published for three years, and in 1814 passed into the hands of P. H. Olmstead, Joel Buttles, and Ezra Griswold, jr. It was removed to Columbus in the same year, and the name, Columbus Gazette, added to the original title. Subsequently, Colonel Olmstead became sole proprietor, when the first part of the name was dropped, and the paper was published as The Columbus Gazette until 1825. At that time the office of State printer was established, and George Nashee being elected to that office, he and John Bailhache entered into a partnership with Colonel Olmstead, and the paper was enlarged and improved, and the name changed to The Ohio State Journal and Columbus Gazette. These gentlemen continued the publication until 1827, when Mr. Nashee died, after which Colonel Olmstead and Judge Bailhache remained sole proprietors until 1831, in the meanwhile merging in their paper the Western Watchman and other short-lived sheets. In 1831 Colonel Olmstead retired from the partnership, and Judge Bailhache continued the publication until the spring of 1835, when the paper again changed hands. At this time Charles Scott and Smithson E. Wright were publishing the Columbus Sentinel, which had been started in 1829 as the Columbus Bulletin, by John A. Bryan and John A. Lazelle. In 1835 Scott & Wright bought the Ohio State Journal and Columbus Gazette from Judge Bailhache, and consolidated it with the Sentinel. Two years later the consolidated paper again changed hands, and underwent another change of name. Mr. Wright sold his interest to his partner, Mr. Scott, who formed a partnership with John M. Gallagher, who, a short time previous, had started a new paper, called the Ohio Political Register. The consolidated concern was known as the Ohio State Journal and Register, but after a short time the latter part of the name was dropped, and the paper was thenceforth known by its present name, the Ohio State Journal. Mr. Gallagher retired from the firm in 1839, and was succeeded by Samuel Douglas, who, in the same year, sold his interest to Mr. Scott, the other partner, who remained sole proprietor until 1854, when, during financial embarrassments, he made an assignment to trustees. These subsequently organized themselves into a company known as the Ohio State Journal company, and with William T. Bascom as editor, published the paper until 1856, when it passed into the hands of William Schouler & Co. This firm continued two years, and in 1858 the State Journal came into the hands of A. M. Gangener, at that time publishing a paper called the Columbian, which he merged in the Journal. In November, of the same year, it was purchased by John and Henry Miller, of Columbus, Henry D. Cooke and C. E. Bill, of Sandusky; the new firm being known as Cook & Miller, Mr. Cooke being editor. At this time the Journal was changed from an evening to a morning paper. The following year the Messrs. Miller retired from the firm, and F. W. Hurtt took their place, the firm name being changed to Cooke, Hurtt & Co. This arrangement continued until July, 1861, when Mr. Cooke retired, selling his interest to his partner, who shortly after disposed of it to Dr. I. G.

* By G. W. Henderson, of The Columbus Democrat

Allen, afterward United States consul in China, the name of the firm being Hurtt, Allen & Co., Mr. Allen acting as editor.

October 1, 1864, the Ohio State Journal company was organized, and purchased the paper, W. H. Foster, of Columbus, being manager, but this arrangement only lasted until the following January, when the paper passed into the hands of W. T. Coggeshall & Co. Mr. Coggeshall was editor. Subsequently he went to Ecuador, South America, as United States minister, and died there. November 8, 1865, the Journal again changed hands, being published by General James M. Comly, Dr. G. W. Roby and Dr. S. M. Smith, General Comly taking editorial charge. The name was changed to the Daily Morning Journal, and it was made an eight-page paper, instead of a folio, as it had been previous. In October, 1866, Dr. Roby gave place in the firm to Dr. Aaron P. Miller, of Chillicothe, who remained with the paper until the following year, when he retired, disposing of his interest to his partners. January 24, 1868, J. Q. Howard became a member of the firm, and remained until March 27, 1872, when he disposed of his interest to General Comly. Some time previous to this, however, in January, 1869, the paper was changed back to its old four-page form, and to its former name, of the Ohio State Journal. In January, 1876, General Comly bought Dr. Smith's interest, and became sole owner, and in March, 1877, A. W. Francisco bought a half interest, and the firm became known as Comly & Francisco. In April, 1878, Colonel Geo. M. Ross and S. H. Flickenger bought interests in the Journal, and the firm became known as Comly, Francisco & Co., which name it still retains, although, in the summer of 1879, Colonel Ross retired and Colonel W. W. Bond, former supervisor of State printing, took his place. The Journal was started as a Whig paper, supporting James Madison for president in 1812, James Monroe in 1816 and 1820, Henry Clay in 1824, John Q. Adams in 1828, Henry Clay in 1832, William Henry Harrison in 1836, and again in 1840, Henry Clay for a third time in 1844, Zachary Taylor in 1848, and Winfield Scott in 1852. When the Republican party was organized, the Journal became an organ of that party, and in 1856 supported John C. Fremont for the presidency. Subsequently, it has never wavered in the support of the Republican candidates: Lincoln in 1860 and 1864, Grant 1868 and 1872, and Hayes in 1876.

THE COLUMBUS DEMOCRAT.

The first number of the Columbus Democrat was issued December 1, 1878, by Allen O'Myers and Solon L. Goode, under the firm name of Allen O'Myers & Company, Mr. O'Myers being managing editor, and Mr. Goode business manager. It was started as an eight-page morning daily, with a Sunday edition, and, as the name implies, Democratic in politics. In April, 1879, Mr. O'Myers retired, and the paper was published by the Columbus Democrat company, with Solon L. Goode as manager, and W. A. Taylor in editorial charge. The latter remained only until June, of the same year, when he gave place to James L. Goode. In July, the Democrat company purchased the Ohio Statesman, daily and weekly, from Captain J. H. Putnam, and the two papers were consolidated under the Democrat management, and became known as the Columbus Democrat and Ohio Statesman, which name it still retains. At the same time the paper changed its form from a six-column quarto to a nine-column folio. A weekly edition was commenced in April, 1879. It was originally an eight-page paper, but at the time of the consolidation with the Statesman, it also was changed to a folio. Of the daily Democrat and Statesman two editions are published one morning and one evening.

THE SUNDAY CAPITAL

was started February 17, 1878, by G. W. Henderson and A. H. Isler, under the firm name of Henderson & Isler. It was published as a Sunday paper, Independent Democratic in politics. In August, of the same year, Mr. Isler retired, Mr. Henderson becoming sole proprietor. In December, 1878, the paper again changed hands, going back to A. H. Isler, who associated John Byrne with himself, under the title of Isler & Byrne. By this firm it is still published, Mr. Isler being editor.

SUNDAY NEWS.

In December, 1867, the News was started as a six-column, four-page, Sunday paper, independent in politics, by Dr. William Trevitt, at one time United States minister to Peru. W. W. Webb was editor. In 1870, Dr. Trevitt sold the paper to John M. Webb and Charles Mathews, who changed it to a seven-column paper. In 1871, Mathews retired, selling his interest to his partner. In July, 1870, the News passed into the hands of W. T. Wallace, who became editor and proprietor. The paper was enlarged, in 1872, to eight columns, and in December, of the same year, Mr. Wallace sold it to E. G. Orebaugh and F. A. Brodbeck, in whose hands it still remains, one of the most prosperous newspapers of the city. Mr. Orebaugh is editor.

THE COLUMBUS GAZETTE.

This paper also had its origin far back in the history of the county, although, in its earlier days, it was known by other names. In 1840, Captain Elijah Glover, who had kept a book and job office, issued a small weekly paper, bearing the name, the Ohio Tribune, and from this paper the Gazette traces its descent. It was a Whig paper, and under control of various editors, until 1849, when Capt. Glover sold it to Geo. M. Swan, who changed the name to Swan's Elevator. He also changed it to a non-political sheet, devoted mainly to local news. In 1853, the name was again changed to the Columbus Elevator, and it was a temperance organ. In 1855, it again changed hands and principles, coming into the hands of Gamaliel Scott, who made it a supporter of Free Soil doctrines. In 1856, John Greiner was taken as a partner, and the name changed to the Columbus Gazette, the present name. In 1857 Scott retired, giving place to Charles S. Glenn, and was published under the firm name of Greiner & Glenn for several years.

Afterwards Greiner retired, and several other parties successively held an interest in the paper, until in 1876, when Mr. Glenn became sole owner, and so remained, until his death, in 1877. It is now published by his widow. S. S. Peters is editor. The Gazette is a weekly paper, and circulates largely among the farmers

THE OHIO STATESMAN.

Although this journal has passed out of existence as a distinct institution, having been merged in the Democrat, yet, as it was one of the oldest newspapers of the county, and was, in its day, one of the best known in the State, the more prominent facts in its history are given. Like most newspapers, it passed through many mutations in the course of its history. Started in 1832, as a Democratic organ, it aided in the election of Andrew Jackson to the presidency of the United States. It was then called the Western Hemisphere, and was published by Gillett & Melcher. It passed through troublous times in its early days, and went through many hands. The first proprietors published, in 1834, a daily edition, called the Daily Advertiser, which was the first daily published in Columbus. The venture was a failure, however. The Hemisphere passed into the hands of Jacob Medary and George W. Manypenny, the latter of whom is still living in Columbus. Mr. Manypenny, in a short time, disposed of his interest to Sackett Reynolds, who continued its publication for awhile, and then it fell back again into the hands of Jacob and Samuel Medary, the latter having been elected State printer. This was in 1842, when the name was changed to the Ohio Statesman, and by this name it was known during the remaining years of its existence. In 1845 it was bought by the Harwell Brothers, in whose hands it remained for a year or two, and then passed to Samuel Medary, who continued as its owner and editor until 1853, and during which time it came to be the recognized organ of the Democrats in the State, and a power for the party.

In 1853, S. S. Cox, afterwards eminent as an author and politician, and at present representing a New York district in congress, became editor and proprietor, and in 1855 transferred the paper to H. W. Derby, of Cincinnati, who, at one time, was also proprietor of the Cincinnati Enquirer, and who is now in the book business in Columbus. Mr. Derby, after running the paper for a year or so, transferred it back to Samuel Medary, who sold it, in 1857, to James H. Smith; Charles J. Foster being editor. In June, 1858, Thomas Miller became half owner, and in January, 1859, Col. Geo. W. Manypenny purchased the other half. January 17, 1864, the paper was sold to a company, called the Ohio Statesman company, with Amos Layman and Lewis Baker as editors. There were various changes in the editorial corps during the three or four years following, and November 13, 1867, the paper again changed hands, having been sold to Richard Nevins, State printer, and Col. Charles B. Flood, supervisor of public printing. Col. Flood and E. B. Eshelman were the editors. On the fifteenth of January, 1869, C. S. Medary became associated with Colonel Nevins, Colonel Flood retiring from the firm, but still acting as editor. Subsequently, however, Colonel Flood retired altogether. April 1st, the Statesman came into the possession of J. F. Linton and A. J. Dodd, who changed it from a morning to an evening daily. Mr. Dodd retired, after a few months, and Mr. Linton ran the paper himself. In 1873 the daily Statesman suspended publication, and transferred its subscription list to the Evening Dispatch. The weekly still continued to be published by Linton, however, until 1876, when the publication of the daily was resumed. In the fall of 1878, Mr. Linton sold the Statesman to Captain Putnam, who retained possession of it until July, 1876, when he sold it to the Columbus Democrat company, and it lost its identity in the latter paper, which was thenceforward known as the Democrat and Statesman. Through all its vicissitudes, notwithstanding its many owners and editors, the Statesman was always a thorough Democratic paper, and never wavered in support of the party's nominee.

DAILY COURIER.

In February, 1879, a number of "union" printers formed a company, and began the publication of a five-column evening daily, called the Daily Labor, James M. Boyle being business manager, and A. A. Braddock, editor. In April, of the same year, the Labor company was incorporated, James M. Boyle, A. A. Braddock, Frank W. Raymond, James A. Minor and A. H. Handiboe being the incorporators. In the following few months several changes took place in the company, Braddock and Handiboe retiring, and other parties, among whom were Col. W. A. Taylor, formerly editor of the Columbus Democrat, Col. George H. Ross, formerly of the State Journal. The number of stockholders was increased, and the name of the paper changed to the Daily Courier. It was also much enlarged and improved, and gained rapidly in circulation and influence. Under its present arrangements, James M. Boyle is business manager; and W. A. Taylor and George H. Ross, editors. The Courier is independent in politics.

DAILY DISPATCH.

The Dispatch was started in January, 1871, the first number being issued on the first day of that month. It was published by a company, incorporated June 28, 1871, and called the "Columbus Dispatch Printing Company." The incorporators were mostly pioneers, and were, Samuel Bradford, W. W. Webb, William Trevitt, jr., T. McMahon, James O'Donnell, John M. Webb, J. S. B. Green, P. C. Johnson, L. P. Stephens, and C. M. Morris. Willoughby W. Webb was editor, and W. Trevitt, jr., business manager. In October, 1871, Mr. Webb was succeeded by Captain John A. Arthur, and he, in September, 1872, by John M. Webb.

Changes took place, gradually, in the company, the stockholders retiring, until, in May, 1872, the paper came into the possession of Captain J. H. Putnam, and was incorporated with the Ohio Statesman, under the name of the Daily Dispatch and Ohio Statesman. Subsequently, the latter part of the title was dropped. In November, 1875, Captain Putnam sold the Dispatch to Captain L. D. Myers and W. D. Brickell, who, under the name of Myers & Brickell, still publish it.

The Dispatch, from feeble beginnings, has grown to be one of the strongest and most widely circulated papers in central Ohio. It is Republican in politics. Captain Myers is editor, and Mr. Brickell business manager.

THE WESTBOTE

is a German weekly and semi-weekly paper, with a very large circulation and powerful influence among the Germans. It was started in 1843, by Jacob Reinhard and Frederick Fieser, who still publish it. It is Democratic in politics. Mr. Fieser is editor.

THE SONTAGSGAST,

a German Sunday paper, was started February 24, 1878, by L. H. Hirsch. It has since been much enlarged and improved, and is at present published by Hirsch & Hirschberg. It is a Republican paper.

THE LEGAL RECORD,

a weekly paper, devoted to the publication of legal advertisements and for family reading, was started in December, 1878, by J. F. Linton, former publisher of the Ohio Statesman. It is still published by Mr. Linton, who is also editor. It is independent in politics.

THE NEW ERA,

a temperance weekly paper, started in June, 1879, to advocate temperance reform. T. J. Wyscarver, publisher, and Colonel A. J. Bowen, formerly of Baltimore, Maryland, business manager.

THE MUTES' CHRONICLE

was established in 1868, and is published every Saturday, at the institute for the deaf and dumb.

THE DEAD.

The Crisis was a weekly paper, which had an existence during and after the war of the Rebellion. It was started by ex-Governor Samuel Medary, January 31, 1861. The Crisis was established as an advocate of the Monroe doctrine. It was essentially a States'-rights paper. Samuel Medary, so well known in Columbus journalism and in State politics, continued to control the paper until his death, November 7, 1864, and edited it with great ability. After his death it passed into the possession of Willoughby W. Webb, who bore the responsibility of its management for a short time and until Dr. William Trevitt became its owner. Webb was associated with Dr. Trevitt in the discharge of editorial duties until his death. The high reputation of The Crisis was fully sustained by Dr. Trevitt, who gave it a certain solidity of value which few journals of the State have enjoyed. It was his design to make the paper a compendium of the history of its own times, and it was made a medium for the transmission to the public of all of the important news and opinions of that critical period in which it was established. It contained all of the important public documents of the time and the utterances of high authorities on questions of state. For this reason its files are much esteemed by, and very useful to, the students of politics and civil history. Dr. Trevitt built up a circulation for The Crisis which has seldom, if ever, been equalled by that of any weekly paper in the city, and by but two or three in the State. At one time, during an exciting campaign, the circulation reached the great number of eighteen thousand copies. The paper was sold by Dr. Trevitt, in 1870, to Charles H. Matthews and John M. Webb. Soon after Webb sold his interest to Matthews, and, after a very brief period of ownership, the latter transferred the property to R. Nevins and F. H. Medary, who merged it with the Statesman.

It is necessary to say something of the papers of the past—those that have lived out their lives, and are no longer published. The list is a lengthy one, as Columbus has been, through all its history, prolific in newspapers, and the mania for starting them has always strongly prevailed. Some of these have an interesting and honorable history; some were merged into other papers; others still continue their existence, under new names, in the papers of the present day; still others were removed to other cities; but most of these sheets were of an ephemeral character, and died and left no record but a name. They can only be mentioned briefly.

The Freeman's Chronicle. This was one of the earliest papers in the county, being started in 1812, in Franklinton, by James Gardner. It was an active supporter of the war of 1812. It discontinued publication in 1815.

The Columbus Gazette was a successor to the Freeman's Chronicle, being published in Columbus by John Kilboune, with the material of that paper. It only survived two issues.

The Ohio Monitor was the third paper started in Franklin county, and was the root from which sprung the Ohio Statesman. It was begun in 1816, by David Smith and Ezra Griswold, jr. It underwent various changes, and, in 1836, was sold to Jacob Medary, who merged it in the Western Hemisphere, and ultimately in the Ohio Statesman. It was a Whig paper, originally, but became Democratic in 1828, supporting General Jackson for president.

The Western Statesman was started in 1825, by Zachariah Mills and Martin Lewis, and was published, subsequently, by Cap. tElijah Glover. In 1828 it was bought by the proprietors of the State Journal, and merged in that paper.

Ohio State Bulletin. This paper was issued in July, 1829, by John A. Bryan and John A. Lazell. In 1831 it passed into the hands of Geo. Kesling and John H. Wood, and was called the Columbus Sentinel. In 1835 it was merged in the State Journal.

The Western Hemisphere, as has already been noted, was the immediate predecessor of the Ohio Statesman, and lost its identity in that paper.

The Franklin Chronicle was started at Worthington in 1818, and lasted a year or two.

Ohio Register and Masonic Review was an anti-masonic paper, published in the days of the Morgan excitement, by Warren Jenkins and Elijah Glover. When the anti-masonic excitement subsided, in 1833, the paper was discontinued.

The People's Press was a Whig paper started in 1836. It only lived six months.

The Ohio Confederate was commenced in 1838 by John G. Miller. It was a States' rights organ. The name was subsequently changed to Old School Republican, but the paper died in 1839.

The Cross and Journal was a weekly paper devoted to the interests of the Baptist church. It was removed to Columbus from Cincinnati in 1838, and was published there for nine years by Geo. Cole. It was continued another year by Revs. Randall and Batchelder, when it was taken back to Cincinnati.

The Ohio Press was started as a weekly Democratic paper, by Eli T. Tappan, in 1847.

The Ohio Cultivator, an agricultural semi-monthly, was started by M. B. Bateham in 1845. In 1857 Mr. Bateham was succeeded by Col. S. D. Harris, who removed the paper to Cleveland, where it is still published as a weekly.

The Western Agriculturist was first issued in 1851. It only lasted a short time.

The Ohio Standard was a Free-Soil paper, started in 1848 by E. S. Hamlin and Israel Garrard. It was published weekly, and, for a short time, daily. It had a checkered career, starting and stopping several times, but died out for good in the spring of 1851.

The Columbian was also a Free-Soil paper, started by a stock company in 1853, with L. L. Rice as editor. It was merged in the State Journal in 1855.

Daily State Democrat was started in 1853, in opposition to the Statesman, by Knapp, Osgood & Blake. Subsequently H. W. Derby, of Cincinnati, came into the concern, and it was consolidated in 1854 with the Statesman.

Capital City Fact. This paper was started in 1851 by a company of journeymen printers out of work. It passed through various changes, and in 1863 became merged in the State Journal.

Thompsonian Recorder. Published as the organ of the Thompsonian school of medicine from 1832 to 1842, when it was removed to Cincinnati. Dr. S. Curtis was editor.

Modern Argo, established in July, 1878, by S. H. Dooley, as a literary and society weekly. In December, 1868, it was removed to Quincy, Illinois, where it is still published.

National Greenback Leader, a paper devoted to the interests of the National Greenback party, was removed from Canal Dover to Columbus in April, 1879, by the Phelps Brothers, and established as a daily and weekly. It only lived until July, when it suspended publication.

The Commonwealth, organ of the Prohibitionists, was started in the fall of 1878, and died in the summer of 1879.

There have been many other papers started in Franklin county, and which had a brief existence, but none others sufficiently important to deserve further record.

CHAPTER XXI.

THE PRESS OF PICKAWAY COUNTY.

REPORT, not so well substantiated as we could wish, has it that there was a small paper by the name of the Fredonian, published in Circleville, for a short time, about 1812. It is said to have been started by James Jenny, who, going into the service of the United States, left the newspaper, its appurtenances and fixtures to Robert D. Richardson, who removed to Chillicothe, and, it is alleged, never made any payment upon the property, but continued to publish the paper for his own benefit. Extensive advertising has failed to bring out any facts in regard to this paper, in addition to those above stated, and even its very existence in Circleville is a matter of doubt. If it ever was published in the village, it was only for a very short time, and probably in an irregular way. It bore about the same relation to the subsequent early prints that the irresponsible, semi-nomadic squatter did to the true pioneer or early settler.

THE OLIVE BRANCH

was practically the pioneer of Circleville journalism. This paper, which was the beginning of the Herald, now the Union-Herald, was issued, for the first time, August 9, 1817. It rejoiced in its name for several years, under varying degrees of success and under various auspices. It was started by James Foster, a book-binder by trade, who came from Chillicothe. He had no other knowledge of the "art preservative of all arts" than that which he had "picked up." The heading of the paper bore the name The Olive Branch, and an emblematic design: a small branch, stripped from the parent stem, across which was a scroll. It was printed with small pica and long primer type, and the size of the page, exclusive of the margin, was sixteen and a half by nine and a half inches. Its editor, as we might be led to suppose by the following passage from his "salutatory," and as we know from cotemporary testimony, was a "plain-spoken man." He says:

> "It is customary for editors to introduce themselves before the people by saying that the only object they have in view is the public's good. For my part I am not so disinterested—at all events I am too poor to be a public benefactor. I therefore candidly declare that my object is to make money. In doing this, it is not my intention to injure one man's reputation, while I puff up another's; neither will I do it by departing from those Republican principles, the remembrance of which will always remain warm within me. An American by birth, and a Republican by profession, I will use every honorable effort to support the cause of my country and the perpetuity of the Union."

At the time the Olive Branch came into being, there were about fifty or sixty papers in the State. Among those then in existence, which still survive, are the Scioto Gazette, of Chillicothe; the Cincinnati Gazette, then Liberty Hall; the Lebanon Western Star; the Warren Western Reserve Chronicle; the Steubenville Western Herald; the Canton Ohio Repository, and the Ohio State Journal, then the Columbus Gazette.

After a few months the publication of the paper was suspended for six weeks, and, January 20, 1818, the Olive Branch re-appeared, under the auspices of Renick, Doane & Co.—Gen. James Renick, Guy W. Doane and Joseph M. Hays. Messrs. Renick and Hays, who formed, at that time, a mercantile firm in Circleville, became the possessors of the type and all the appurtenances of the office, taking them upon a debt. The editorship devolved upon Mr. Doane, a young man of much ability, the junior member of the bar of Pickaway county. The paper was printed by William Henry Benson for the publishers. Three months after this arrangement was effected, Benson was arrested because of his yielding to the temptation to be better clothed, and breaking into a tailor shop.

Mr. Doane retired from the paper February 9, 1819, and an announcement was made to the effect that the paper would, in the future, be conducted by Joseph C. Olds and William B. Thrall. The latter gentleman was the editor. The motto placed at the head of the paper at this time was, "I was born free as Cæsar; so were you." Shortly after Mr. Thrall became connected with the paper, he was taken sick, and his wife dying, he was compelled, for a time, to sever his connection with the Olive Branch. April 16, 1819, an interest was transferred to Silas S. Geohegan, a practical printer. Mr. Thrall, after an absence of six months, returned, much improved in health, and devoted himself closely to the duty of editing the paper. He filled the place with ability, and the journal had a number of years of prosperous life. August 12, 1826, the paper was enlarged to a "super-royal" sheet, equal in size to the National Intelligencer, during the war of 1812, and its name was changed to the Olive Branch and Pickaway Herald. In 1830 the paper appeared in an entirely new dress, and the title again underwent a change, this time appearing as the Circleville Herald and Ohio Olive Branch.

About this time appeared a rival, the Ohio Observer, which was the nucleus about which grew the Watchman. It was established by Messrs. Bentley, Hedges, Brannan, Fry, Pike, Keffer, Boyle and Brainard. In May, 1834, the proprietors of the Herald leased a moiety of the property to Jason Case, and the publication was continued under the name formerly standing at its head, and by Thrall and Case.

The Herald prospered, and had a fair patronage. On the thirteenth of May, 1837, S. R. Dolbee, then foreman in the office of the State printer, at Columbus, purchased an interest in the paper. It was enlarged at this time, and vied with the best journals in the State in mechanical execution. New presses and material were purchased, and the office was better supplied than ever before. Mr. Thrall was elected that year to the general assembly, but continued writing for the paper. Mr. Dolbee left after one year's connection with the Herald, and removed to Illinois. He was succeeded by Jason Case; the firm name was made Jason Case & Co., and Mr. Thrall retained his position as editor. Mr. Thrall remained in the partnership until 1843, when he sold out to H. H. Warren, who continued in partnership for one year; then Mr. Thrall again became owner of the paper. In July, 1843, W. D. Bailey became interested in the publication, and was succeeded, not long after, by John Hanna. He continued in connection with Mr. Thrall and alone, until he associated with himself T. C. Jones. Still later the firm became Hanna & McFarland (A.), and in 1848 M. W. Doddridge & McFarland. April 30, 1852, the paper appeared with the single name of A. McFarland at the head of its columns. February 25, 1853, he gave place to Gamaliel Scott, who edited the paper for one year, and was succeeded by William Bremigam. He conducted the paper alone until December 3, 1858, when F. A. B. Simpkins became his associate. In 1860 Bremigam disposed of the property to John E. Ray. In July, of the same year, it was announced that after that time the Herald would be published in the future by Mr. Bremigam and Samuel W. McCulloch, "but owing to the fact that certain arrangements between the parties interested had not been perfected," it was announced, a week or two later, that the proprietorship remained unchanged. On May 25, 1860, the flag was hoisted for Lincoln and Hamlin. In January, 1861, Bremigam became the owner of the paper, and in February following took as an associate W. D. McPherson. Mr. Bremigam's death was announced in the Herald August 23, 1861. He had had control of the paper since 1854, with the exception of only one year. After Mr. Bremigam's death J. A. Lutz, esq., acting as the representative of the family, edited the paper until September 20th, when W. H. P. Denny, of Dayton, Ohio, purchased it and assumed immediate control. The war having begun, the paper was devoted to the National cause, and hence the adoption of the name indicating its true character. On the advice of leading Republicans, its title was changed to that of the Circleville Union. It was published by Mr. Denny for four years, and at the expiration of that period, sold to Col. P. C. Hays. April 16, 1869, he sold to E. Z. Hays, who conducted it until March 1, 1872. About this time the paper suffered a decline in patronage and influence. E. Z. Hays sold to B. F. Thomas and E. B. Fletcher, who conducted the journal under the firm name of Thomas & Fletcher; Mr. Thomas being the editor. He was a man of considerable ability, and started upon his work with good promise of success and prosperity, but died October 17, 1872. The paper was then conducted by disinterested parties, for his family, one year. March 14, 1873, the paper was purchased by Alfred Williams, a man of thorough education and great talent. He sold out, July 3, 1874, to Seneca W. Ely and William Leuthstrom. Mr. Ely had formerly been one of the editors of the Scioto Gazette (Chillicothe), and was one of the pioneer editors in Ohio. Messrs. Ely & Leuthstrom continued to publish the paper until December 1, 1875, when it became the property of its present proprietor and editor, S. Marfield, jr. The old name of the paper was restored and hyphenated with the new, as the Union-Herald. This journal is now in as flourishing condition as ever in its career, and though old in years, is by no means in its dotage. The paper has always been, politically, either Whig or Republican.

THE RELIGIOUS TELESCOPE.

On the twelfth of April, 1834, Rev. John Russell and Jonathan and George Dreisbach, by authority of the general conference of the church of the United Brethren in Christ, bought a printing press in Circleville, and located there the Religious Telescope. They bought, also, a lot and two houses for the use of the same. The first number appeared December 16, 1834. It was a medium-sized folio, and published semi-monthly. Its editor was the Rev. William Rhinehart, a man of much talent. The paper was made a vigorous representative of the principles of the United Brethren church, and its only official organ. In 1839 Rev. William Hanby succeeded Rev. Mr. Rhinehart in the editorship. The paper reached, in 1843, a circulation of two thousand copies, and in 1845 had three thousand subscribers. Rev. David Edwards became its editor in the latter year.

The paper was removed to Dayton, Ohio, in August, 1853, where it is now published. It is now a large, eight-page paper, and has a circulation of nine thousand.

THE DEMOCRAT AND WATCHMAN.

The Circleville Democrat and Watchman was started in 1837 as the Scioto Watchman. There had been a Democratic paper started in Circleville in April, 1836, called the Peoples' Press, but it was short-lived. At a meeting of members of the Democratic party in Circleville, May 27, 1837, it was resolved that one thousand dollars be raised by subscription "for the purpose of purchasing a press, to be devoted to the interests of the Democratic party." The amount sufficient was subscribed, in a short time, by the following, then leading citizens and active Democrats: Valentine Keffer, John M. Alkire, Henry N. Hedges, Nelson Franklin, Elliott Halstead, Samuel Diffenderfer, James Hurst, T. W. Morris, William M. Alkire, Thomas J. Winship, William Gill, M. H. Alkire, James Thompson, John Barnhill, John Allright, James Morris, John Morris, jr., Matthias Myers, Philip Jeiger, John Coffman, John Metzger, Benjamin Stout, Henry Morris, Richard Jenkins, John Bell, Abraham Park, David Rowe, G. Diffenderfer, John Morris, Nathan Perrill, A. L. Perrill, Thomas Duyea, Ezekiel Morris, Moses Morris, Joseph Bonner, D. Kinnear, Samuel Dreisbach, John Irwin, Abraham Halstead, Stephen W. Lindsey. Hon. T. J. Winship was the heaviest subscriber, taking three shares—seventy-five dollars. Of this list of subscribers the following only are now living: H. N. Hedges, sr., present probate judge of Pickaway county; Hon. A. L. Perrill, Hon. Nelson Franklin, of Carthage, Missouri; Ezekiel Morris John Morris, of the vicinity of Circleville, and Joseph Brown, of Illinois.

Nelson Franklin acted as treasurer, and collected the subscriptions. H. N. Hedges was selected to purchase the necessary material, press, etc., and, about the first of August, 1837, the first number of the Scioto Watchman was published. It was a six-column paper, and presented a very creditable appearance, for those days. There is no file of the Scioto Watchman in existence, and we have to rely upon the recollection of old citizens for information. For some time the paper did not give the name of publisher, publishing company, or editor, but it was run by the association of stockholders, and for a time—how long cannot be ascertained—Col. Valentine Keffer, who, for many years previous, had been conspicuous and influential in the political affairs of the county, was the business and editorial manager, with various local contributors—H. N. Hedges, sr., B. F. Brannan, now of Cincinnati, and Charles Fry, the printer, and others. The association, after a few years, found that the publication of the paper was a losing business, and sold the material, etc., to the late Hon. Edson B. Olds, then "coming to the front" in politics, and, from that time until 1847, the paper experienced numerous changes. In 1842, Samuel Pike, the noted and restless journalist, edited the Watchman, and was succeeded by S. P. Brainard, the paper then being the Circleville Watchman.

On the ninth of August, 1844, the name was changed to Circleville Democratic Guard and Pickaway and Fayette Pilot, and Samuel Pike and L. D. Williard became the editors and publishers. In the following November Mr. Pike withdrew, Mr. Williard continuing the publication. In August, 1845, Jason Case was employed to print the paper, and the name of Watchman was restored. Mr. Williard retained the editorial management for some months, when he abandoned the concern, leaving Mr. Case to do the best he could with it, and removed to Washington county, but his name remained at the head of the paper for a year or more thereafter. In the first part of 1846, Wm. McLaughlin was engaged as editor, and May 22d, of that year, was succeeded by Samuel Alburtis, who continued until January 15, 1847, when Mr. Case became the sole editor and publisher, continuing to successfully manage and increase the business of the paper until July 14, 1853, when O. E. Miles purchased the establishment and assumed entire control. In October, 1853, Mr. Case again formed a connection with the Watchman, as editor, and in February, 1855, again retired, the duties of postmaster requiring his attention. In February, 1856, Mr. Miles disposed of a half interest in the office to Mr. Case, the firm name being Miles & Case. Mr. Miles, having been elected county auditor, sold his interest to Joseph Gaston, of Belmont county, Ohio, in March, 1858. Mr. Case remained in partnership with Gaston until July 10, 1858, when his connection with the paper finally ceased. Mr. Gaston continued as editor and proprietor until August 1, 1859, when he sold out to John W. Kees, of Springfield, Ohio, who published the Watchman until June 29, 1862, when, the paper having become obnoxious to the administration at Washington, the office was seized and the paper suppressed, by order of the war department, and Mr. Kees arrested, taken to Washington city, confined in the old capitol prison, held for a short time and then released. From April to June, 1862, Mr. Kees published the Daily Watchman, a small-sized sheet, which proved an unprofitable enterprise. The establishment having become financially embarrassed, was sold at judicial sale, July 2, 1862, and purchased by the late Dr. Wayne Griswold, the principal creditor. To evade the order of suppression, the name was changed to Circleville Democrat, and the publication resumed, with William Doane as publisher, who managed it with success until November 13, 1863, when the present editor and proprietor, A. R. Van Cleaf, purchased and entered into possession of the office, and has since conducted the paper, increasing its circulation from eight hundred to two thousand, and it now ranks with the first newspapers in the State. In June, 1870, the old name, Watchman, was restored, as an addition to Democrat.

Of those who have been editorially connected with the Democrat and Watchman, Valentine Keffer and Charles Fry died years ago, and a sketch of Colonel Keffer will be found in this work.

Samuel Pike, after establishing more newspapers, in four or five different States, than any man in the country, died, only a few years since, in Highland county, Ohio. As an editorial writer, he occupied a high position.

S. P. Brainard removed west, and of his subsequent history we have no information. Neither are we informed of what became of William McLaughlin and Samuel Alburtis.

L. D. Williard, for many years a resident of Washington Court House, Ohio, prominent in public affairs there, afterwards emigrated west.

Jason Case still resides in Circleville, and is the veteran printer of the county. He learned the "art preservative" in the Delaware (Ohio) Gazette office, and for several years worked at the business in Columbus, Ohio. For about a year he was foreman of the Ohio State Bulletin, and for four or five years was foreman of the Ohio State Journal office. In April, 1834, he came from Columbus to Circleville, and entered into partnership with W. B. Thrall, in the publication of the Circleville Herald, which partnership existed three years. In May, 1838, he again became connected in the publication of the Circleville Herald, the firm being Jason Case & Co., which terminated in 1843. From 1845 to 1858, with two brief intervals, he was either publisher or editor of the Watchman a longer period than any other publisher of that paper, except the present editor and proprietor. Mr. Case served as postmaster of Circleville eight years, from 1853 to 1861. He was mayor of Circleville four terms, from 1861 to 1867, and 1875 to 1877. He has been justice of the peace sixteen years, and is serving his third term as coroner.

O. E. Miles, who came to Circleville as a journeyman printer, and for several years was employed in the Religious Telescope office, is now one of the principal farmers and shrewdest business men in Pickaway county. He served two terms as county auditor, from 1858 to 1862, and was a member of the State board of equalization, for Franklin and Pickaway district, elected in 1870.

Joseph Gaston removed to Oregon, where he engaged in railroad enterprises, and accumulated wealth.

John W. Kees had previously published the Democratic Expositor, at Springfield, Ohio, and was clerk of the Ohio house of representatives in 1858–9. He was partially insane, the result of the war excitement, when arrested in June, 1862. Subsequently, he became totally deranged, and died in the Columbus insane asylum, November 25, 1867. When "clothed in his right mind," he was a writer of force and ability.

William Doane, whose connection as publisher was intended to be only temporary, is now an honored and leading citizen of Circleville, as he has been for years, and is a member of the dry goods firm of Delaplane & Doane.

THE HERALD.

The Circleville Herald was founded September 21, 1870, by Winfield S. McCallister and Francis Wolfley, both young men, natives of Circleville, fine practical printers, and with advanced ideas of journalism and the true office of the country newspaper. Both had worked in the office of the old Circleville Herald, and that paper having been, on the death of William Bremigam, purchased by Mr. Denny, who changed it to the Circleville Union, it occurred to them to christen their new paper with the abandoned name of the old one. The Circleville Herald soon began to be recognized, at home and abroad, as a live local paper, and Mr. McCallister received flattering offers of positions on various metropolitan papers, as well as acknowledged rank for his paper at home. In 1873, he bought out his partner, Mr. Wolfley. In February, 1874, his failing health led him to lease the office to Mr. John M. Rae, of Circleville, who conducted it with ability, till August, of that year, when Mr. McCallister again took charge, and remained in harness to the last, failing daily in body, but unquenchably bright in mind, and strong of purpose to the last hour. He died December 9, 1874. His widow, Mrs. Joanna McCallister, daughter of Judge T. N. Howell, retained the paper, as administratrix and guardian of her three young children. It was leased, in May, 1875, to Miss Lillie C. Darst, of Circleville, who had edited it during the interim, and has continued the publication for over four years, the only instance in the State of a regular, first-class newspaper entirely edited and published by a lady. In politics, the Herald is Republican, though never merely partisan. It is devoted to the interests of the community, and strives to be a faithful chronicler of local events. Miss Darst has been, for two years, secretary of the Ohio Editorial association, a body which admits no person not an actual editor and publisher of a bona fide newspaper, and is the only lady member.

CHAPTER XXII.

PHYSICAL FEATURES.

GEOGRAPHY OF FRANKLIN AND PICKAWAY COUNTIES.

Franklin county is bounded on the north by Delaware county, on the east by Licking and Fairfield, on the south by Pickaway, and on the west by Madison. Union county touches it also at one corner, and forms a small portion of the northern and western boundary. It occupies a position in the State which is nearly central.

The principal stream is the Scioto river, which divides the county into two nearly equal parts, flowing through it from north to south. From the north line of the county, almost to the city limits of Columbus, the river has worked out its way in heavy Devonian limestone, leaving vertical walls, which in some places are forty to fifty feet in height, while the real depth of the excavated valley is not less than one hundred and twenty-five feet. Here, and along some of the tributaries of the Scioto, is to be found the most picturesque and romantic scenery that the county affords. The bottom lands are very narrow, and sometimes entirely wanting. Along the river south of Columbus the banks and the valley are entirely different from those in the northern part of the county. The valley is broad, but indistinctly defined. Widely eroded regions, now filled with heavy and irregular drift, attest the former course of the river at points several miles removed from its present limits. Besides the Scioto river there are several other streams, viz.: Darby creek, which forms the western boundary of Brown and Prairie townships, also of the county, and flows southeasterly through Pleasant township, into Pickaway county; the Olentangy, which flows from the north and empties into the Scioto at Columbus; and Gahanna river, which empties into the Scioto near the southern county-line, and which is formed in the northwestern part of Madison township by the union of the Black Lick, Big Walnut and Alumn creeks, all three of which flow from the north, in nearly parallel courses, through the eastern half of the county.

The topography of the county is much more varied than that of any of the counties that lie along the same parallel to the west of it. The valleys of the Scioto, already spoken of, and its tributary streams, constitute the chief features. The several water sheds between the streams are about nine hundred and twenty-five feet above tide water, or three hundred and sixty above Lake Erie.

Columbus, the county seat, is centrally situated in the county, in north latitude 39° 57′, west longitude 6° from Washington.

Pickaway county lies wholly in the Scioto valley and is bounded upon the north by Franklin, on the east by Fairfield and Hocking counties, on the south by Ross, and on the west by Fayette and Madison.

The general topography of the county is similar to that of Franklin, but the land lies more nearly level. The valley of the Scioto, which, in southern Ross, in Pike, and Scioto counties is narrow, here broadens out so as to include nearly the whole county. There is no abrupt rise from the river, but the lowlands, by gradual and beautiful undulations, blend with the highlands which divide the waters of the Scioto from those of the Hocking. It is among these sloping hills that the finest scenery of the county is to be found, though the Pickaway plains, a broad, fertile table land, lying south of Circleville, and bounded by an elevated horizon, contain elements of beauty very pleasing to the eye. The principal streams affluent to the Scioto, are the Scipio and Little Walnut creeks upon the east side, and the Deer and Darby creeks upon the west. Both of these are streams of considerable size, and have their sources toward the northwest and beyond the limits of the county. Deer creek empties into the Scioto in Ross county.

GEOLOGY OF FRANKLIN COUNTY.*

Franklin county has an extended geological scale. In this respect it is surpassed by but four counties in the State, and is equalled by a scarcely larger number. Highland, Adams and Pike counties, to the southward, have a somewhat wider range, the two first mentioned extending from the Lower Silurian to the Sub-carboniferous formation, inclusive, and the last from the Upper Silurian to the coal measures; but none of them contains a greater number of geological elements, after all, than Franklin county, for the Devonian limestones of central and northern Ohio are excluded from this region, by the overlap of the Huron shales upon the Helderberg and Niagara rocks. Pickaway and Delaware counties exactly agree with Franklin, in both the range and composition of their geological column. The following formations, named in descending order, are found:

4, Waverly Group.
3, Huron Shale.
2, Corniferous Limestone.
1, Lower Helderberg limestone, or water line.

These formations represent three main divisions, viz.: the Carboniferous, Devonian and Upper Silurian ages.

THE LOWER HELDERBERG LIMESTONE, or waterline, is a late found, but important, number of the geological series of Ohio. Its presence in the State was first recognized at the beginning of the survey in 1874. It has been found to occupy a larger area than any other limestone. It makes, however, but a very small contribution to the surface of Franklin county, its outcrops being limited to a few points on Big and Little Darby creeks, on the extreme western border. The valleys of both these streams now lie in this formation, for several miles above and below Georgesville, but on account of the heavy drift deposits the rock is seen at but a few points. The best exposures found in the bed and bank of Big Darby are one mile below Georgesville, and in the sections formed by small tributaries of the stream in the same vicinity. It is also seen in the banks of the Little Darby, one mile above Georgesville. About fifteen feet of this formation is shown in the first-mentioned locality. It is immediately overlain by the heavy and easily recognizable ledges of the Corniferous limestone. This point, therefore, possesses the interest that always attaches to a well-marked boundary in a geological series. The junction of the two great divisions of geological time is found here, the Helderberg limestone, belonging to the Upper Silurian system, and the Corniferous to the Devonian. This is the only point in this part of the State where the line of junction between these limestones is plainly marked.

The Lower Helderberg limestone, as found in Franklin county, presents the same general appearances that its outcrops both to the north and south exhibit. The greater part of it is a very thin bedded, buff-colored, magnesian limestone. It contains here, as well as elsewhere, a notable quantity of bituminous matter. Fossils are, as a general thing, only to be found, after a very careful examination; in the most considerable portion there being no trace of life. Occasional layers, however, exhibit indistinct casts of the characteristic fossil Leperditia alta, of two or three small brachiopods, and of a small number of corals. Another phase that the formation here exhibits may be called the "concretionary phase." Masses, rudely spheroidal in shape, and which show, in sections, something of a concentric construction, ranging from six inches to two or three feet in diameter, are met with, especially in the lower part of the limestone here exposed. The smaller masses are not unlike sponges of the Stromatopora group, but there is no good reason to believe that they are of organic origin. Clay is found in their layers, very fine grained, and homogeneous in quality. The only economical use to which the Helderberg limestone can be turned is to the production of a good quality of lime. The courses of the stone are too thin and irregular to be valuable for building purposes, especially as the Corniferous stone overlying is so finely adapted to this use.

The Corniferous limestone holds a very valuable place in the geology of the country. It covers a wide area, is a very thick formation, has numerous exposures, yields building stone and lime of great value, and is very extensively worked for both. It may be added that it is one of the most remarkable storehouses of the remains of ancient life in our whole series of rock formations. It possesses every element of geological interest. The whole thickness of the formation appears in Franklin county, but there is no one section that contains every element. The nearest approach to a complete section is to be found in the east bank of the Scioto, from Dublin north to the county line. A few feet are here wanting, both at the top and bottom of the series. The actual thickness of the section is about seventy-five feet. A section found at Corbin's mills, and on the adjacent lands of Joseph Ferris, is a fair representative of the series. Beginning at the water's edge, a heavy course of cutting stone appears, the thickness of which sometimes rises to two and one-half feet. This is overlain by eight feet of buff-colored magnesian limestone, which lies in heavy but uneven beds. These courses have a maximum thickness of two and one-half feet, and are raised in blocks sufficiently large to make them valuable as a cutting stone. They are easily wrought, and, on this account, have acquired the local names of "freestone" and "sandstone." These courses are followed by five feet of thinner bedded rock, the thickness of the layers varying between four and eight inches. Two of these layers—one near the bottom and the other near the top of the section—hold flint concretions. These occur in regular nodales, chalk-white on the outside, and often of the same color throughout their substance. They are very rich in the fossils of the formation, and they are in a remarkable state of preservation. The flinty layers in the section are overlain by nineteen feet of light-colored beds, commonly called "white limestone." These beds are crowded with fossils, of which the brachiopod shells are the most numerous. The beds are thin, seldom exceeding six inches, and not very even. They furnish, at the best, building stone, as distinguished from cutting stone, but the most valuable use to which they can be put is the manufacture of lime.

The next division, eleven feet in thickness, is not homogenous. The upper portion is made up of shaley layers, of no value either as building stone or lime burning. The upper boundary is made distinct by a remarkable layer called the cone bed, and this bed is the boundary between two very distinct divisions of this series of limestone—the Delhi and Delaware beds of Professor Winchell. The latter division is locally known as the blue limestone, to distinguish it from the underlying courses. It differs from these courses in color, in style of bedding, in chemical constitution, and in the character of its fossils. The color of the stone is uniformly blue, and the bedding is very even. It contains a notable proportion of silica and alumina in its composition, which militates against its durability as a building stone. Only a few beds are found which resist the weather, and the stone in them is highly valued. The fossils of the Delaware bed are, at this point, chiefly fish remains. Teeth, plates, jaws, and other bones are not unfrequently met with throughout twenty-five feet of this series. The Deleware beds of this immediate section are thirty-two feet in thickness. Their upper boundary is as distinct as their lower, consisting of the blue shales that make the base of the great system of Devonian shales that succeed this, the last of the Paleozoic limestones of Ohio. The two well-marked divisions that appear in the section here described, are known as the Delaware limestone, and the Columbus limestone. The former takes its name from the town of Delaware, where it is extensively used, and the latter name was bestowed by Dr. Newberry, very appropriately, as it is at Columbus that the stone is most largely displayed and worked. A section shown at the State quarries represents twenty-six and a half feet. The lowest course lies below the level of low water in the Scioto, and was only reached when the quarries were being worked for the construction of the State house. It is a massive bed, five and a half feet in thickness, though it splits into two nearly equal courses very easily. It can be raised in large blocks, and furnishes the best stone of the quarry for massive work.

Four other heavy courses, measuring, respectively, two feet ten inches, two feet three inches, two feet six inches, and two feet, come next in order. All are raised in blocks of good size, and all are available for the best uses in building. The prevailing color is light gray, with yellowish and bluish tints intermingled. The bottom hackletooth, which lies just above the courses already named, is the bluest stone in the quarry. It is fourteen inches thick, quite free from flint, and therefore considered one of the most desirable layers found here. Then comes the top hackletooth, thirteen inches thick, used extensively for columns, and upon this there is a nineteen inch course, which furnishes only building stone. The sixteen inch course next above splits readily into "twin eights," and is a very serviceable stone. The ten inch course, which covers this, is raised in long blocks, and so furnishes very convenient stone for steps, to which purpose it goes quite largely. The "rough rock" comes next, and here ends the cutting stone of the quarry. An interval, varying from eleven to fourteen feet of quite thin layers, useful for lime manufacture, and, to some extent, as building stone, comes in before the horizon of the cone bed is reached. This last division is highly fossiliferous, and contains many of the characteristic features of the formation.

Paleontologically considered, the corniferous limestone is very interesting. Almost all limestones are of organic origin, but this shows its origin in every layer. The substance of the rock is often composed of the exquisitely-formed fabrics of the life of the seas of this distant date. Seaweeds and corals, chambered and univalve shells, bivalves and brachiopods were strewn indiscriminately upon the floor of this ancient sea, and built it up by slow additions. Vast periods of time were occupied in this work. The species that flourished when the earlier beds were being deposited had their day, and in many instances gradually disappeared long before the series was completed. New forms came in from time to time, some of which are identical with species found in widely removed places, while others are peculiar to the locality in which found. Some fossils are abundant through the whole extent of the formation, even entering it from the seas of an earlier age. Others are equally abundant in the one limited horizon which they occupy. The wealth of the formation in this department is not yet appreciated, and cannot be until a greater interest and labor has been given to its study. One strong hold upon the interest of students of nature this formation possesses, is the fact that it contains the earliest undisputed remains of land vegetation and vertebrated animals that are found on the continent. Its tree ferns and its fishes are altogether new types in the world. Special interest is drawn to these earlier forms on account of their bearing on questions of derivation. The remains of ancient fishes contained in the corniferous limestone mark the presence of a higher type of animal life in this formation than any of the strata below it contain. They constitute the lowest and oldest remains of vertebrates met in ascending the geological scale. Many of these corniferous fishes were of great size, and in some respects of quite high organization. Those of the present day which they most resemble are the ganoids, represented in North America by the pike and sturgeon, and the sharks, which are widely distributed in existing seas. The exact stratum in which they appear cannot be pointed out, but it was certainly quite low in the corniferous series—among the heavy course that constitutes the base of the system. The remains that are found of this lowest horizon are the cranial plates, often united in a symmetrical skull of ten great ganoid Macropetalicthys Sullivanti. This, then, is the lowest and oldest of the fishes of the Devonian rocks of Ohio. The type specimens were furnished by Joseph Sullivant, esq., of Columbus, to whose watchful and discriminating inspection of the State quarries, when they were most largely worked, science is under great obligations. Quite a number of the most interesting fossils of the formation were gathered by him at this time. The next fish remains found in ascending the scale are those of Onychodus Sigmoides, the teeth of which are not uncommon fossils in the middle corniferous formation of Franklin county. These remains extend through a considerable vertical range, and can be followed into the Huron shale. There was a time in the history of the corniferous sea when fishes of this genus constituted its most conspicuous and abundant inhabitants. There was scarcely a square foot of the sea bottom, for hundreds of square miles, that did not contain a tooth or plate of jaw of some fish that had met its fate in the sea above. There were considerable areas that seem to have been the gathering grounds, perhaps the breeding places of these tribes of the sea. Here their remains are accumulated to the exclusion of almost everything else. A six-inch layer is chiefly composed of these remains. This is called the bone bed. Recent dredgings in existing seas show that over large areas of the sea-floor the teeth of sharks are of very frequent occurrence. The deposits are growing very slowly, and the dredge, very likely, brings up at one haul the accumulations of scores, perhaps of hundreds of years. The reason why teeth are found so much more abundantly than any other portions of the skeleton, is that they are among the few portions that are thoroughly mineralized, and, consequently, able to resist decay, while the frame-work of the shark is chiefly cartilaginous.

The Huron shale is the next element in the geological scale of the county. This was the black slate of the older geologists. It occupies a much larger area than any other formation in the county, and has affected the physical geography much more. It is easily eroded, and, consequently, the valleys that have been wrought in it are broad, the water-sheds being reached by long and gradual slopes. It makes an important contribution to the soils of the county, and impresses its own character upon considerable areas, notwithstanding the fact that this whole region is covered by drift. It has been impossible to determine the thickness of the shale in Franklin county; it is probably not far from three hundred feet. In Ross county it is known to be three hundred and thirty-one feet thick. At the base of the series in this county, and also in Delaware, there are thirty feet of blue shales, with calcareous bands running through them. Prof. N. H. Winchell proposes for this blue belt the name of "Olentangy shales," which has generally been accepted as both convenient and unambiguous. The Olentangy shale appears to be the statagraphical equivalent of the beds termed "Hamilton shale" by Dr. Newberry. The Olentangy shale of Franklin county is very poor in fossils of any description. This shale is shown in but very few sections in this county. The best of them is in Perry township, in Slate run. The shale proper begins with a boundary as definite as a black mark upon paper. Its lowest layer is as characteristic of the formation as any layer in it, and from this point up, with wonderful sameness of composition, layer after layer testifies to conditions of an ancient sea that remained unchanged until the floor had been covered with at least five hundred feet of fine, and, probably, slowly accumulating sediments. One of the most conspicuous features in the Huron shale is found in concretions, great and small, which it contains in great numbers. They begin with the formation, and in the lowermost forty feet, all of the varieties of these structures can be seen. The shape which the larger and more regular take is that of flattened spheroids. Not unfrequently, two are joined together by a ligament uniting their centers. They are sometimes disc-like, and many of them lack regularity of outline. In composition, some variety is observable. Very many of the smaller ones consist of the crystallized bi-sulphide of iron, and some of them consist of symmetrical shell or scale of this substance around a softer nucleus, which gives them the appearance of an iron casting. The nodules of this kind are o ten irregular in shape. The larger specimens invariably contain lime and iron, the former substance being found sometimes in the center, in the shape of cole spar, but more frequently occurring in a dark semi-crystalline mineral that is quite characteristic. The iron is always intimately associated with the lime, and gives to the weathering concretions the dark yellow or ocherous color that marks them all in this stage. Rarer substances are sometimes met in the crystalline nuclei of the concretions. Heavy spar is one of these. Organic nuclei are sometimes found at the center of these bodies, and among these are some of the most interesting and remarkable fossils of the entire geological series. Wood is not uncommonly found. A species of ancient pine, Dadoxylon Newberryi, Dawson, furnished many of these centers. The great fish bones, however, are the most remarkable forms to be met with here. To Rev. H. Herzer, of Berea, Ohio, the credit is due of bringing to light the bones of the most remarkable of the great series of fish that the rocks of Ohio have so far yielded. Dinicthys, the fish to which reference is here made, united, in a surprising way, the characteristics of forms widely separated now. More than any other fossil, it has served to show that the group of ganoids of Devonian time, to which it belongs, "formed the parent stock, from which, by differentiation, the fishes have branched off on one side, and the amphibious and reptiles upon the other." It agrees so closely in dentition with the modern Lepidosiren, which most systematists rank as the highest of modern fishes, that the latter can scarcely be doubted to be derived from it by lineal descent. There are two species of this genus described from the Huron shale of Ohio. Both were of great size and power. Aside from these concretions, the Huron shale of Franklin county may be described as nearly non-fossiliferous. Only a few forms occur. On the surface of the layers, star-shaped leaves of marine plants are found occasionally. In some instances, a thin film of coal represents the vegetable tissues. In the waste of the slate, silicified coniferous wood is often found, but it is believed that this is generally derived from the breaking down of the concretions already noticed, of which it often constitutes the nucleus. Towards the upper limit of the slate, in some localites the teeth and rhombic plates of small ganoid fishes have been found, black and shining. They agree almost exactly with the fossils of the same group from the Cleveland shale. The best point for collecting these rare forms (in Franklin county,) is in the fine exposures of the shale in the valley of the Big Walnut, near Central college, Blendon township. A fine specimen of the crest of teeth peculiar to the dentition of onychodus was obtained from the shale of Slate run, in Perry township, by Mr. W. Meteer, and was by him presented to the State collection. No divisions have been established in the Huron shale by which its several sections can be united into one general section. One bed, however, remains to be noticed, which can be distinguished lithologically. It is a red or chocolate colored band, from fifteen to twenty feet in thickness, that makes the uppermost portion of the shale. This red band is best shown at Taylor's station, in Jefferson township, and at several points in Mifflin township, in the eastern bank of Big Walnut creek. The exposure in the slate cliff opposite Central college is particularly conspicuous.

The Waverly group is the next formation in order, and the last in the scale of the county. It is found in three separate bodies, which are situated as follows: I, a small outlier in the southeastern part of Jefferson township; II, the largest body of the county, which occupies all of Plain township, and part of Blendon, Mifflin, Jefferson and Truro; III, a corner of Madison township, south of Winchester, which embraces but a few hundred acres. The first of these is well shown in the Central Ohio railroad cut, at Taylor's station. The stone is generally thin-bedded, the courses not being more than six or eight inches in thickness, except where, by an unknown agency, the material of the layer is gathered up, for a few square feet, into an ungainly mass. The lower side of the lowermost layer is almost always beautifully riffle-marked, and similar indications of shallow water occur again and again through the thirty feet succeeding. The line of junction between the Huron and Waverly formations is shown with distinctness at several points. On the land of E. Compton, adjoining the farm of S. R. Armstrong, in Jefferson township, in the valley of Black Lick the contact of the two formations is plain to be seen. Another point of contact is shown in Mifflin township, on the eastern bank of Big Walnut, extending through several miles, and still another is found on the bank of Rocky fork, one mile east of Gahanna. More than ordinary interest attaches to this boundary. It is the dividing line between two great divisions of geological time—the Devonian and Carboniferous. The Devonian formations were mainly deep sea deposits, or if great depth was not required for their origin, still there are but few traces of shores, or of the life of the land, but in the Carboniferous all is changed. Vast regions of the old sea floor are lifted up to the level, and even above, the present level of the sea. This is shown by the first layer deposited. They are riffle-marked. It is the life of the land that gives interest and value to this great division. The Waverly series, as shown in Franklin county, contains three well-marked elements, viz: The Waverly shale, ten to twenty feet in thickness; the Waverly quarry system, certainly sixty feet, and probably more, in thickness, and the Cleveland shale of Dr. Newberry, or the Waverly Black shale of Prof. Andrews, which does not here attain a thickness of more than fifteen feet. The Waverly shales consist of light blue or drab, non-fossiliferous clay shales, which lack the fine lamination of the Huron. The Waverly quarry courses can be seen to the best advantage on the land of S. R. Armstrong, esq., just where the Central Ohio railroad crosses Black Lick. The stone has been quite extensively worked here. The section measures forty-eight feet, but the courses which are of economical value are widely separated and constitute but a small portion of the quarry. The best of the courses are, in color, light blue, quite uniform in texture, and work well under the saw. The Ohio Institution for the Blind, and the foundation of the Union depot at Columbus, are built of this stone. The Cleveland shale is known, as already stated, at but one locality in the county, and that is at Ealy's Mills, in Jefferson township, on the banks of Rocky Fork. The shale is charged with the remains of ancient life, and that, too, of the highest division of the animal kingdom—vertebrates. The surface of many slabs is thickly covered with the teeth and plates and bones of the shark and ganoids of the early day. Two brachiopods also—Lingula melie, Hall, and Discina Newberryi, Hall,—are abundant. The shale is heavily charged with bituminous matter.

The drift deposits of the county are far more important than the bedded rocks on which they rest, so far as useful applications are concerned, for they furnish its soils and water supply and all of the minor modifications of the surface, upon which drainage and tillage depend, are much more closely connected with them than with the rocky substratum. The drift of Franklin county falls into the two great divisions that appear in so many other portions of Ohio, viz: the unstratified and stratified deposits. The valley of the Scioto was a broad and deep furrow through the central district of the State, and must have formed a favorable line of advance for the glacial agencies. For this reason the drift deposits have been very extensive. The bowlder clay, sand, pebbles, and polished blocks of stone, foreign to the locality by nature of formation, attest the mighty workings of the glaciers and ice floes. Among the other deposits are the peculiar flattened spheroidal concretions of the Huron shale. They are so numerous that scarcely a half dozen cubic yards of drift can be excavated without uncovering one or more of them. The great number of them indicate the devastation, by the tremendous abrading agency of the glaciers, of an immense quantity of the shale in which they were once imbedded. The bowlder clay is generally blue in color, as one of the names by which it is designated implies. This soil is probably pushed forward and worked over by the glacier as it advanced. It is not an uncommon thing to find the trunks, branches or roots of trees deeply buried in it. Most such specimens appear water-worn, or at least there is no indication that they grew where they are now found. They are doubtless of a pre-glacial growth. Wood of the character mentioned has been found, scores of times, in the digging of wells in Jefferson, Truro, Madison, Norwich and Prairie townships. The stratified drift exhibiting all of the characteristics of the drift of the Champlain period, covers a large area in the central and southeastern parts of the counties. The finest farming districts, within the limits of the county, are to be found in thi division.

The Kames, or gravel knolls, are well represented in Baker's hill, three miles south of Columbus, on the Groveport pike. It rises fifty feet above the level of the surrounding country, and consists of well-washed sand and gravel placed here by the action of some great eddy in the lake that formerly occupied the Scioto valley. When Baker's hill was under water there was very little of Hamilton and Madison townships out of water, and the Scioto must have been at least twelve miles in width.

ECONOMIC GEOLOGY.

The useful applications of the corniferous limestone are two in number, and of immense importance. The formation furnishes building stone and lime. The supply in Franklin county is indefinitely great. It can be counted by the square mile in areas that require very little shipping. The quarries are never less than twenty feet deep, and often thirty feet of stone, every foot of which is available for some purpose, lies above the river level. Very much can be said in favor of the stone. It is a dense, compact limestone, with a specific gravity of more than 2.5; is very strong and can bear all of the burdens which architecture demands. Its color is good, and it receives ornamentation to good advantage. As to durability, it can be said that the corniferous limestone furnishes much material decidedly above the average of limestones. The chief drawback is its highly fossiliferous character. The principal quarries now worked are the State quarries and Smith & Price's quarries, though there are numerous others carried on upon a small scale. The other chief use of this stone is the manufacture of quick lime. A large business of this sort is carried on in connection with the quarries above mentioned. The Columbus lime is a very hot, strong, white lime, and can be made to do the best work of its kind in every respect.

The economical uses of the Huron shale are quite limited. It is applied on a small scale to the making of roads and walks, and the clay into which it weathers has been found to constitute an excellent material for sewer pipes. The north Columbus factory depends chiefly on this source of supply for its extensive production, and the Wassall fire-clay works also make use, to some extent, of the same material.

The stone in the Waverly group exposures is also, as has been heretofore mentioned, quite extensively quarried.

GEOLOGY OF PICKAWAY COUNTY.

The whole county is covered with drift, and everywhere, in gravel or bowlders, appear the evidences of an agency which has brought foreign materials and scattered them over the surface. The bowlders are composed of granites, diorites, quartzites, etc., which have come from regions north of the lakes. Occasionally a limestone bowlder is seen, and much of the drift gravel is composed of the same material. The whole surface of the county presents the appearance of having once been the bed of a shallow lake or sea, for the gravel and sand show ripple marks and other modifications, such as water only could produce. The bowlders were probably dropped from floating ice. They are to be seen almost everywhere, but perhaps more along the eastern border of the county, especially in Salt Creek township, and they may be traced, in diminished numbers, for a considerable distance down the Salt Creek valley. This Salt creek presents to the geologist some very interesting features. It rises in Salt Creek township, within the proper basin of the Scioto valley, but leaves the basin and curves to the eastward for many miles, among the high hills of Hocking and Vinton counties, to come back into the narrowed valley of the Scioto, in Ross county. To make this distance, it has been compelled to work out for itself a deep channel in the Waverly sand rock. In some places it flows in a narrow gorge, with scarcely room enough upon the banks beneath the cliffs for highways. "Some of the wildest and most picturesque scenery in the State," says the Geological Report, "is to be found on the waters of Salt creek."

Beneath the surface, in the lower valleys of the county, is to be found blue and yellow-drift clays. In the blue clays are often found fragments of wood.

The soil is of great fertility, and Pickaway is, probably, the richest county, agriculturally considered, in the Second geological district. The alluvial lands along the Scioto river and Darby and Deer creeks, are remarkably rich, while the terraced planes, with their limestone gravels, are scarcely less so. On the uplands the soil is also good. With such soil, with beautiful and clear streams, and a fine climate, the farmers of Pickaway have a "goodly heritage," and may consider themselves well compensated for the want of the more important minerals.

The leading features in the geology of the country are simple, and easily understood. The Waverly sandstone, Huron shales, and cornieferous limestone are all found. The first of these underlies all of Fairfield county, and has its line of western outcrop along the eastern border of Pickaway. Probably all of Salt Creek township is within the range of the Waverley, and wherever, along the eastern borders of Washington, Walnut, and Madison townships, the eastern highlands project themselves westward in spurs, the Waverley will be found. Directly west of the line of the Waverley is the great Ohio black slate of the former geologists; the Huron shales of Dr. Newberry, which dips beneath the Waverley to the east. This slate underlies nearly the whole of the county, but is so buried by the drift and other surface deposits as to be but seldom seen. It appears, however, in the beds of Darby and Deer creeks, and there is a good exhibition of it in Deer Creek township, at Williamsport. If, by some process of baking, this slate might be hardened sufficiently, it would become of economic importance. As at other places, there are found at Williamsport, in this slate, small deposits of iron pyrites, or bi-sulphide of iron, which is of no value except for the manufacture of copperas, for which purpose it does not exist in sufficient quantity. Bitumen exists in the slate, and gives to it its black color. The proportion is from eight to ten per cent.—nearly one-fourth as much as is found in bituminous coal. The conditions under which this formation was deposited involved quiet water, charged with a constant supply of fine sediment, with which there was always commingled organic matter, which alone could have furnished the bitumen. The even distribution of the bitumen throughout the entire mass would imply that the water abounded with the minuter forms of animal and vegetable life, but thus far no trace of such forms has been discovered. The black slate is an evident source of rock oil or petroleum. It affords oil readily by artificial distillation, but abundant evidence exists that it is produced by natural process. At numerous points are found springs of oil at the top of the slate. They are generally in the lowest layers of the overlying sandstone, as if the ascending oil had been intercepted by the sandstone and had found an outlet through its more open layers. Such oil springs abound in the western part of Scioto and eastern part of Adams counties. The black slate is said to answer an excellent purpose for coating roofs, when burned and mixed with coal tar. Wells bored in the slate often strike fissures charged with combustible gas, which may be used for heating or lighting dwellings and factories, as at Painesville and other places near the lake.

Corniferous limestone is found in the western part of the county—the same as that found and so largely utilized at Columbus. It contains interesting remains of fishes, shells, etc. This limestone appears in the bed of Deer creek, a few miles west of Williamsport.

The underlying rock strata in the county are too deeply buried to exert any influence in fertilizing the soil. The soil derives its peculiar fertility from the calcareous nature of the drift materials and from the rich alluvial deposits which border the streams. Such soil is alone a noble endowment for the county. Coals and ores must, in any locality, be exhausted in time, but the soil of Pickaway, with proper tillage, will be a perpetual source of prosperity and wealth.

PICKAWAY COUNTY COURT HOUSE,
CIRCLEVILLE, OHIO.

THE TOWNSHIPS AND VILLAGES
OF PICKAWAY COUNTY.

CIRCLEVILLE.

ORIGIN OF NAME AND DESCRIPTION OF ANCIENT MOUNDS.

The name given to this township (after having first been given to the city which it contains, and which constitutes the county seat of Pickaway county,) is designed to perpetuate the memory of one of the most remarkable relics of a pre-historic age, found by the first European explorers of the Ohio valley. The name Circleville, together with a drawing and description, first published in the Archaelogia Americana, in 1820, and reproduced in several historical works since that time, is now one of the few existing memorials of that interesting relic. Being thus associated with the name of the place, it is fitting that a somewhat minute description of it should be given at the very outset of our history of Circleville.

In the centre of the territory now embraced within the corporate limits of the city, once stood an extensive earth-structure, the work of the Mound Builders. It is generally supposed to have been a military fortification, although its design can be only a matter of conjecture. It consisted of two parts; the larger and more important one being in the form of an exact circle, sixty-nine rods in diameter; the other an exact square, fifty-five rods on each side, and tangent to the circle, at the middle point of its western side. It is the circular "fort" (so-called) which occupies the central portion of the city—the centre of the circle being at the point where Court and Main streets now cross each other; and the square extending out toward the city limits, beyond Washington street, in an easterly direction from this point.

The circular inclosure was surrounded by two walls and a deep ditch between them. [Some of the oldest inhabitants insist that there was not, within their recollection, any appearance of a regular wall, or embankment inside of the ditch; but we follow the printed accounts.] It is, of course, impossible to guess how high the walls were originally; since, when first discovered, they had for unknown ages, been gradually worn down by the action of the elements and other causes. But, when first measured, they were somewhat more than twenty feet high, on an average, measuring from the bottom of the ditch, which was about twenty feet in width. On the side not adjacent to the ditch, the walls were, at this time, about six feet in height. They were evidently made nearly perpendicular at first, and were constructed, for the most part, of clay, which was found near by, or thrown out of the ditch, and was of an excellent quality. Some think it was originally made into bricks and dried in the sun. However that may be, it was largely used in making the bricks of which many of the buildings, now occupying the same ground were constructed.

In the centre of the circular work stood a mound of considerable size, with a large semi-circular pavement extending half way around it, on the eastern side; looking toward the only opening in the circular walls. This opening was at the point of contact with the square "fort," into which it formed an entrance. The single wall (which was without any ditch) inclosing the square was, at the time of its discovery, about ten feet in height. It had eight openings; one at each corner, and one at the middle point of each side—that in the western side being the one which led into the circle. Before each of these openings, at a distance of about two rods, on the inside of the square, was a mound, circular at the base, and about five feet in height, except the one before the entrance into the circle, which was considerably larger and higher. The others were about forty feet in diameter, at the base, and about twenty at the summit. The writer in the Archaelogia takes it for granted that these small mounds "were intended for the defence of the openings." But this does not seem to us by any means certain. At any rate, the one before the entrance into the circle could not have been so intended, since it is not conceivable that the occupants would have attempted to defend the square "fort" after the circular one had been captured and filled by an enemy.

We notice that in the representation of the two forts contained in the Circleville Union-Herald for August 2, 1878, and evidently copied from that in the Archæo- logia just mentioned, the small mound at the opening between the two forts, is placed within the circle. Whether or not this change of position was made because the author of the very valuable historical notice in the paper referred to perceived that that was the only position in which the said mound could be of any use as a defence of the opening we do not know; but certain it is that, in the copy of the original drawing, made by Howe, in his "Historical Collections of Ohio," this mound is inside of the square. Since we have intimated a doubt as to the correctness of the prevalent notion that these enclosures were purely for military purposes, we shall, perhaps, be pardoned for presenting, at some length, our reasons for believing that they were designed mainly for religious or festive occasions.

Mr. Isaac Smucker (who is certainly a very respectable authority in matters pertaining to American archæology), in his treatise on the "Pre-historic Races and Pre-territorial History of Ohio," which constitutes the introduction to the "Annual Report of the Secretary of State" on the statistics of Ohio, for the year 1877, makes the following observations as to the inclosures of the Mound Builders:

"Inclosures are of several kinds; one class being known as military or defensive works; another as parallel embankments, or covered ways; and the third as sacred inclosures. Under the general title of inclosures are also walls of circumvallation, or ramparts, constructed for military or defensive works, while others were doubtless walls surrounding the residence of the reigning monarch; perchance others were erected for the performance within them of their national games and amusements, and perhaps many, also, served a purpose in the performance of their religious rites and ceremonies, and facilitated indulgence in some superstitious practices."

Farther on he says:

"Defensive inclosures are of irregular form, are always on high ground, and in naturally strong position, frequently on the summits of hills and steep cliffs, and are often strengthened by exterior ditches."

Then he proceeds, quoting the American Cyclopædia:

"The walls generally wind around the borders of the elevations they occupy, and when the nature of the ground renders some points more accessible than others, the height of the wall and the depth of the ditch at these weak points are proportionally increased. The gateways are narrow and few in number, and well guarded by embankments of earth placed a few yards inside of the openings or gateways, and parallel with them, and projecting somewhat beyond them at each end, thus fully covering the entrances, which, in some cases, are still further protected by projecting walls on either side of them. These works are somewhat numerous, and indicate a clear appreciation of the elements, at least, of fortification, and unmistakably point out the purpose for which they were constituted."

If this description of defensive inclosures is to be relied upon, it is obvious that the works under consideration must have belonged to some other class. Instead of being of "irregular form," they are so strikingly regular as to make it a matter of wonder how a people as rude and uncultivated as the Mound Builders are generally supposed to have been, could possibly have laid them out. They are not on "high ground," and there are, in the immediate neighborhood, many stronger positions than that in which they are located. In fact, no modern general would think of constructing an earthwork in such a position, unless he had no choice of situations, or unless the immediate presence or threatened approach of an enemy compelled him to fortify that very place. The gateways, instead of being "few in number," are so numerous as to amount to an absolute absurdity in fortification; and the so-called defences of these gateways, or openings, are not "embankments," "projecting somewhat beyond them at each end," but small, circular mounds, apparently of no greater diameter than the width of the openings.

But let us see now what the authority above-quoted says about inclosures which were not designed for military purposes:

"Sacred enclosures," says Mr. Smucker, "are mainly distinguished from those of a military character, by the regularity of their form, and by their more frequent occurrence. They are of all shapes and forms, and when moats or ditches exist, they are invariably found inside of the embankments. Sacred inclosures are generally in the form of geometrical figures, of surprising accuracy, such as circles, squares, hexagons octagons, ellipses, parallelograms, and of various others. They are sometimes found within military inclosures, and evidently had some connection with the religious ideas and ceremonies of their builders. Frequently there is situated in the center of this class of works a mound or elevation, supposed to have served the purposes of an altar upon which sacrifices were offered, or which was, at least in some way, used in conducting their religious services. Within those sacred inclosures were doubtless celebrated religious festivals, and upon those central "high places," or altars, were undoubtedly performed, by priestly hands, the rites and ceremonies demanded by their sacrificial, their idolatrous religion. * * * Some archæologists, however, maintain that many works called sacred inclosures were erected for, and used as, places of amusement, where our predecessors of pre-historic times practiced their national games, and celebrated their great national events; where they held their national festivals, and indulged in their national jubilees, as well as performed the ceremonials of their religion. And it may be that those (and there are many such) within which no central elevation or altar occurs, were erected for the purposes last named, and not exclusively, if at all, for purposes connected with their religion, and are, therefore, erroneously called sacred inclosures. Other ancient peoples, if, indeed, not all the nations of antiquity, had their national games, amusements, festivals and jubilees, and why not the Mound Builders, too? Notably in this regard, the ancient Greeks may be named, with whom, during the period known as the 'Lyric Age of Greece,' the Olympic, the Pythian, the Nemean, and the Isthmian games became national festivals. And without doubt the Mound Builders, too, had their national games, amusements, festivals and jubilees, and congregated within their enclosures to practice, celebrate and enjoy them."

Another quotation, a little further on, must suffice:

"The amount of labor bestowed upon those of their works that were erected in the interest of their religion, shows a strong tendency towards superstitious belief. They doubtless offered up animals in sacrifice, as a part of their religious ceremonies, and it may be that human sacrifices were not unknown among them. Prisoners of war are thus disposed of sometimes by people and nations who have attained to as high a grade of civilization as that reached by the Mound Builders. The sacrificial character of their religion is clearly established. The late Dr. Foster he itated not to say that the Mound Builders were worshipers of the elements; that they worrhiped the sun, moon and stars, and that they offered up human victims as an acceptable sacrifice to the gods they worshiped! He deduced this fact from the charred or calcined bones which cover their altars. Other high authorities also unhesitatingly assert that there is convincing proof that they were fire-worshipers."

So exactly does this account tally with the drawings and descriptions which have come down to us of the ancient works at Circleville, that we were actually surprised to find in it no allusion to those works as remarkable specimens of inclosures obviously designed for religious and festive purposes. Here was the surprising symmetry of form characteristic of such inclosures. Around the square was the one walk, with no moat or ditch on the outside, and perforated by its numerous entrances. Here was the circle, with its deep moat inside of the principal wall—even if there was, in reality, more than one—for, as we have stated, the recollection of some of the oldest inhabitants, who often passed over the ground before the embankments were removed, is, upon this point, at variance with the printed accounts. And, above all, here, exactly in the center of the circle, stood the "high place," with its semi-circular pavement, composed of gravel and smooth stones taken from the adjacent streams—a mound utterly without significance in a military point of view, but entirely intelligible if regarded as an altar for offering up sacrifices, or for the performance of other religious or festive rites. That it was an altar, and that it had been used for offering up human sacrifices, is rendered extremely probable from the fact that, at different depths below the surface, charred skeletons were found lying upon wood ashes and charcoal, mingled with various articles, such as arrow heads, burnt bricks, plates of mica, etc. It would seem, from the positions in which these relics were found, and from the various depths at which they lay, that, after each burning, the fire, the charred remains of the victim, and whatever else was left unconsumed, were covered with earth; and that the mound had gradually been formed by this process, beginning, perhaps, from the original surface of the ground. How high it may have been when last used by the people who constructed it, we have, of course, no means of knowing. When, however, it was first seen by Europeans, it was about ten feet high, four rods or more in diameter at the base, and about two rods at the summit.

If it be asked whether the theory of the religious and festive character of these works implies that the builders had absolutely no thought of defence in their construction, we reply that this inference is by no means necessary, since the inclosures may have been for the purposes named; while, at the same time, the embankments about both the square and the circle, and the ditch about the latter, may all have been intended, in part at least, to guard those engaged in celebrating their worship or their games from the intrusion of those of their own people who were not entitled to participate in them, and also from the attacks of their enemies. It must be admitted that the thought most likely to be suggested to the mind of one viewing such works for the first time, is that they were designed as military fortifications. But if inclosures were to be made for other purposes at all, it is surely most likely that such a people as the Mound Builders were, would construct them of earth. In the celebration of their religious rites, a plenty of deep water might be necessary for the practice of those ablutions and immersions which, in all ages of the world, have occupied so prominent a place in the religions of various nations. If so, the ditch dug on the inside of the inclosure would furnish both the necessary water and the material for the needed embankment.

For the reasons set forth above, we seriously incline to the opinion that the square inclosure was designed for the celebration of games and other secular festivals; that the small mounds before the openings had some sort of connection with the games celebrated in the inclosure; and that the circle was devoted mainly, if not entirely, to the performance of religious rites.

This will be an appropriate place in which to mention a remarkable mound that stood but a short distance outside of the circle, about forty rods in a southwesterly direction from the sacrificial mound already described. We follow the description made by Mr. Atwater in his Western Antiquities, published in 1833.

This mound was more than sixty feet in height, and stood on the summit of a large hill, to which it was joined so skillfully that the whole appeared to be artificial. It must have been the common cemetery in which the dead of the neighboring people, for several generations, were buried, since it contained "an immense number of human skeletons, of all ages and sizes." The skeletons were laid horizontally, with their heads generally toward the centre and their feet toward the outside of the mound. A considerable part of this work was still standing when Mr. Atwater wrote, uninjured, except by time. In it were found, besides the skeletons, stone axes and knives "and several ornaments with holes through them, by means of which, with a cord passing through these perforations, they could be worn by their owners."

On the south side of this mound, and only a short distance from it, was a semi-circular ditch or trench, some six feet or more in depth, but nearly filled up to a level with the surrounding surface. On being opened, there were discovered in it large quantities of human bones, evidently of warriors who had fallen in some destructive battle. This conclusion seems necessary from the fact that the bones were those of persons who had attained their full size; whereas, in the mound adjoining young and old had been buried indiscriminately; and also from the fact that the bodies had been thrown into the trench without order, and as if in great haste.

The student of archæology will never be able to contemplate the obliteration of all these interesting relics without a feeling of regret, not unmixed with indignation. When land was so abundant and so cheap, why should not the county of Pickaway, among its first acts as a corporation, have purchased the ground covered by these relics, and set it apart for all time as the imperishable monument of a perished race? Overgrown, as it was, with beautiful forest trees, it might, without erasing one mark of its original character, have been changed into a park, more unique and attractive than any public grounds now to be found in the State of Ohio. Here, in the square inclosure, our young men might have met in friendly contest to practice their athletic sports, on the very spot devoted, countless ages before, to a similar purpose. And although it might not have been thought seemly to perform any of the solemn acts exclusively appropriate to our holy religion, within the circular inclosure once set apart to the performance of heathen rites; yet a grateful people might properly have met there to celebrate their national anniversaries, amid scenes and associations which could not have failed to heighten their gratitude to God for the countless blessings which, in these latter days and in this wonderful land, He has vouchsafed to them.

But since the founders of the county had not the far-sighted liberality to do this, the next best thing they could have done was the very thing they did, viz., to locate their county seat on the site of these ancient works—placing their court house in the centre of the circle—making the lines of the two principal streets of the city cross each other at this point, as those of Pennsylvania and Maryland avenues do, at the capitol in Washington, dividing the four quadrants thus formed by two other streets crossing each other at right angles in the same way, but extending no further than the limits of the circle—and finally laying out two circular streets around the court house, within the same limits, but leaving all the rest of the town to be laid out in regular squares, like most other western cities.

This, if the earth-works themselves were to be obliterated, was certainly a graceful and altogether appropriate way of perpetuating a visible memorial of them. But, strange to say, although this plan was adopted and carried out, and the circle built up in accordance with it, after the city had attained its twenty-seventh year and a population of over two thousand souls, the citizens were persuaded to undo the work, to obliterate the circle constructed by the first builders of the city, as the latter had obliterated the circle constructed by the Mound Builders. The history of the "squaring of the circle" (that feat hitherto regarded as impossible in geometery), with the method of its accomplishment and the reasons for it, if any can be found, will be related further on. But we have deemed it proper to relate this much at the outset, by way of explaining why the name Circleville was given to this beautiful and historic (not to say pre-historic) city.

FIRST EVENTS.

The first brick house erected in the city of Circleville, was that now occupied by Harsha's marble works, then a one-story building. Mr. James Greno worked on it as a mason.

The first grocery in town was kept by Joe Strouse, near where Mader's bake shop was later.

The first sermon by a Methodist minister (and probably the first by a minister of any denomination), preached after the town was located, was by the Rev. William Swayze. The precise date is not given, but it must have been soon after the location of the town, which was in the autumn of 1810.

Louisa (Leiby) Myers, born June, 1811, is believed to have been the first child born in Circleville. Her father, John Leiby, a native of Pennsylvania, who moved to this place from Chillicothe, established here the first dry goods store, soon after the town was laid out.

Jacob Try, brother of George Try, killed a deer within the circular earthwork, some two or three years before the town of Circleville was located.

We are not certain that this was the first deer killed there; but the occurrence reminds us to say that dears are now seen in the same locality every day, and nobody thinks of killing them.

The first hotel in Circleville was kept by John Ludwig, now living in the southeast part of the township. It was kept in a log house, which was the first built within the circle, in the fall of 1810.

The first public step toward building the first public school-house in the town of Circleville, was a resolution passed at a meeting called for that purpose in March, 1827. The school-house was built but a short time after, near what was known as the Academy.

The first newspaper published here was the Olive Branch, the first number of which appeared on the 9th of August, 1817. Of this paper the present Union-Herald is the lineal successor.

The first church edifice built in this town was a Presbyterian meeting-house of brick, whose corner-stone was laid by the Rev. Mr. Burton, September 2, 1826.

The first entries of land made in what is now Circleville township, were as follows: Jacob Zieger, sr., entered sections 19 and 20, and fractional section 5, May 7, 1801. And, on the same date, section 29 was entered by Samuel Hill. The only other entry made as early as 1801, was that of section 32, made by Robert F. Slaughter, June 9th, of that year.

The first Sunday school in this town was organized as a union school in 1825, by John P. Davenport.

CIRCLEVILLE DESIGNATED AND LAID OUT AS THE COUNTY SEAT.*

As already stated, Pickaway was erected into a separate county, by act of the legislature, on the twelfth of January, 1810. On the 19th of the next month the same body passed a resolution appointing David Bradford, George Jackson and John Pollock as commissioners "to fix on the most eligible spot for the seat of justice in the county of Pickaway."

"This duty was considered a very important one, and the gentlemen above mentioned were men of character and reputation in the State. They came into the county in the spring and made a thorough examination of all the places which had been mentioned, visiting Bloomfield and some points west of the river. The old Indian fortifications (so-called), with the mound and circle and square, were then intact. The embankment or walls of the forts stood up many feet above the ground, and were, as were the interior, covered with large trees and heavy undergrowth. These fortifications were selected for the county seat in preference to all other places which had been pointed out. The gentlemen, in deciding, no doubt thought they were doing that which would serve to preserve the ancient monuments from demolition and ruin, and that, with a town located here, thay would surround them with an interest which would protect and care for them. As to the wisdom of their predictions, the total obliteration of every trace of the old forts gives sad witness. The commissioners reported their decision to the court, which, on July 25th, appointed Daniel Dreisbach as director, with bonds in the sum of ten thousand dollars. His duties were to purchase the ground for the sight of the new town, lay it out in town lots, and dispose of the same.†

"The lands upon which the fortifications stood belonged to the heirs of Jacob Zeiger, Jacob Zeiger, jr., and Samuel Watt, the circular fort being the property of the former. He at that time resided in a log cabin which stood about where the canal now is, and just opposite the site of Ruggles' slaughter house, there being one of the best springs in the country at the foot of the rise upon which his cabin stood. He at this time had partly completed a new residence a little east of his cabin. This new residence is still standing, and is known as the Williamson house, on the corner of Scioto and North High streets. His wife, who

* For all of the documents, for nearly all of the facts, and largely for the phraseology of this article, we are indebted to the Circleville Union-Herald of August 2, 1878.

† Mr. Dreisbach held the office of director until his death, in 1850. One or two others were subsequently appointed by the court, but, there being no further need of such an officer, the office has now become obsolete.

also signed the deed, became Mrs. Shoemaker, having, after the death of Mr. Zeiger, married Judge Shoemaker, one of the justices who first held court in the county. (At the time this was written she was ninety-five years old and in possession of all her faculties. When the editor of the Union-Herald called upon her a few days before, he found her reading a book. Unfortunately the last few years had dimmed her recollection of those early days, and she was able to give comparatively little information. She died in January, 1879.)

Dreisbach purchased, as the records show, three tracts and one or two fractions of acres. The first tract contained one hundred and three-fourths acres, fifty of which Zeiger donated, the other fifty being bought at eight dollars per acre. For the three-fourths acre the price was twenty dollars per acre, with a further consideration, in payment for the improvements, consisting of the cabin, etc., to be decided upon by referees. The second tract, purchased of Valentine Keffer, contained seventy-one acres, seven y-eight poles, and was bought for two hundred and eighty-six dollars. The third tract contained twenty-nine acres and was bought for one hundred and sixteen dollars. The whole two hundred acres cost but between eight and nine hundred dollars, many times less than single lots have since sold for.

Dreisbach proceeded at once to survey and lay out the town according to the directions, and by the day appointed for the sale had all complete. We have been able to find no one who could give definite information in regard to the first sale, but we judge from what we have learned that it was a memorable event and celebrated with a grand barbecue, with whole ox roasts, etc. We have been told that a large number of persons from the west side of the river joined in the manufacture of an immense cheese for the occasion, weighing several hundred pounds, and drawn to the barbecue on a large sled. There seems to have been quite a spirited competition for the honor of building the first house in the new town. No sales were made before the second Monday of September, and of course no one had a right to occupy any of the ground before that time. Among others determined to build the first house was John Ludwig, who then lived on what is now known as the Rudy farm. He had his lumber all prepared before the sale day, the logs hewn and fitted ready for framing, and all loaded on wagons and ready to start into town, as soon as his purchase should be announced. Laborers were ready and stone for the foundation was in waiting with David Leist, as mason, prepared to lay them. What the result of so much preparation was, or whether he got his house up first we have not learned, but it is certain that the sun had not gone down on the day of the sale when several habitations had been reared, in a temporary and hasty manner, of course. On the first sale day Dreisbach disposed of twenty-nine lots, and on the next day eleven. The houses were rapidly pushed to completion, and by winter about forty families had taken up their residence in the new town. Dreisbach's first report to the county commissioner, in which he gives an account of his stewships, reads as follows:

"Daniel Dreisbach, director, made report of his proceedings, which was sanctioned by the court and ordered to be recorded verbatim, viz.: and that the plat returned of town be recorded in the recorder's office.

Proceeds of sales of lots in the town of Circleville, public and private sales, from the tenth to the twelveth of September, 1810:

Balance of county orders and cash remaining	$ 685 47

I do hereby certify the above to be a true and accurate statement of the sales of lots in the town of Circleville, Pickaway county, and moneys received from the twelfth of November, 1810, up to August 5, 1811.

DANIEL DREISBACH, Director.

CIRCLEVILLE, August 5, 1811.

The commissioners' first duty, after the town had been laid out and the lots had been sold, was to prepare a place for the meeting of the court, and to provide a jail. For the first purpose, Zeiger's new residence, still unfinished, the upper floor not being partitioned off, offered suitable accommodation, and a contract was entered into with him, by which the building was used as a court house. The jail was provided for in a contract, which was made some five months before the one above mentioned, with Andrew Broner, who, for the sum of fifty-five dollars, was to erect a building twenty-two by sixteen feet, of good, sound lumber, and have it ready for occupancy in four weeks from April 14, 1810.

SQUARING THE CIRCLE.

Although the site for the capital town of Pickaway county was chosen on account of the ancient circular inclosure found there, and the central portion of the town was laid out in circular form to coincide with that pre-historic structure, and to perpetuate the memory of it to future times, yet not many years elapsed, after the town began to be built up, before dissatisfaction with this unique arrangement showed itself in certain quarters. Various objections were made. Some thought that the original design was a piece of childish sentimentalism; others that the shape of the lots was awkward and inconvenient; and others still that the open circular space about the court house became a nuisance in being used by people from the country as a hitching and feeding place for their teams; thus attracting to the same center the hogs and other domestic animals which were allowed "the freedom of the city," and making the Pickaway seat of justice a rather poor gem in a worse setting.

But with however much of sincerity these objections may have been urged, and however important they may have seemed to those who urged them; it is not at all probable that any change in the town plat would ever have been made, if it had not occurred to somebody that by laying out the circular portion in a square form, several acres of waste ground—in the center of the circle, in the four angles where the square portion joined upon the circle, and in some of the avenues and alleys—would become available for building lots, and yield a fair profit over and above what the county would charge for it.

It was doubtless a fair business transaction, and not to be censured (however much it may be regretted), except upon æsthetic grounds. An act of the legislature, authorizing the change of plat, had first to be obtained; and then it could not be made without the consent of all the property owners within the space affected by it. Many of the lots were purchased out and out by the parties making the change, and then resold after it was made. Of the lots unsold, some were increased in size, and others diminished by the change; and the owners of the former made, and those of the latter received, suitable compensation.

The buildings fronting the streets or avenues which were to be vacated (and which, of course, made acute angles with the main streets), were either removed, torn down, or changed in position, so as to face the new streets. One only, of any prominence, remains in its original position, as a memento of old times. This is the fine brick residence of the late Dr. Hawkes—still owned by his widow. It originally fronted on "Bastile avenue," which seems to have been the aristocratic street of the old town, and which ran at an angle of forty-five degrees with West Main street. When the now Franklin street was laid out parallel to Main, it passed the front of the building at the same angle. This gives to one of the finest residences in Circleville a very singular, but by no means unpleasing, appearance; and it is pointed out to strangers, with much apparent satisfaction, by the present generation, as a proof that the name of their town was not always a misnomer.

Two "enabling acts" were passed by the legislature to authorize an alteration of the town plat of the town of Circleville.

The first act was passed by the legislature March 29, 1837.

Nothing, however, was done toward the squaring of the circle, during the year named. We conclude it was found difficult to obtain the consent of all the property owners, in all the entire circle, to the proposed change; for, in the next year, March 1, 1838, the legislature was induced to pass a supplementary act, authorizing the friends of the measure to proceed as soon as the consent of all the owners of any part (meaning, doubtless, any fourth part), of the circle should be obtained. This act, as did the former, provides for the reservation of ground for the erection of a court house.

Soon after this, viz.: on the twenty-third of March, 1838, on application of Andrew Huston, Edson B. Olds and Thomas Huston, the southeast quarter of the circular portion of the town was vacated by order of the court of common pleas, and Daniel Dreisbach, director of the town, was directed to convey to the said parties all the interest of Pickaway county in said part of Circleville, for the consideration of seven hundred and fifty dollars. The next day they filed their plat in the recorder's office; and, on the thirtieth of the same month, the director conveyed to them, by deed, the interest of the county, as directed.

On the fifteenth of the following September, similar steps were taken by the same parties, for squaring the northwest quarter of the circle, receiving their deed from the county October 4th, for the same consideration as above.

The process of building the town in the new form must have gone on slowly; for after the steps taken (as described above) for squaring the southeast and northwest quarters, eleven years elapsed before anything was done toward squaring the remainder of the circle. The parties at length undertaking it were John Cradlebaugh, E. B. Olds, Francis Kinnear, and others, known as "The Circleville Squaring company." After they had made a satisfactory arrangement with the property holders in the northeast quarter, they obtained a deed from the county for its interest in the same, August 17, 1849, for seventy-five dollars, and then proceeded to lay it out in lots of rectangular form. Why the consideration was so much less than that paid for each of the other two quarters, is not stated; but the commissioners doubtless decided that that was all the purchasers could afford to pay.

The squaring of the southwest quarter was undertaken by W. W. Bierce alone. He secured an order from the court for that purpose, and filed his plat in the recorder's office, September 1, 1854, but did not obtain his deed until March 6, 1856. No mention is made of any consideration allowed for it, and doubtless the price was merely nominal, since it was from this quarter that ground was reserved for the new court house.

It will thus be seen that it took eighteen years to square the circle, even on paper; and how long it was after the date of last deed, till the final change was made in the position of the buildings and in the form of the lots, we are not informed. The account of taking down the old court house, and the building of the new, will be found elsewhere.

The grading of the streets and of building-lots has gradually effaced every trace of the two ancient inclosures, with a slight and solitary exception in regard to each. A short distance in the rear of the court house is a deep hollow, which is undoubtedly a remnant of the circular ditch, and at the southeast corner of Franklin and Pickaway streets (as mentioned below) is a piece of the square embankment, perhaps three or four rods in length. With these two exceptions, every relic of those celebrated works is lost.

The line of the two inclosures, as marked by existing objects, is thus described in the Union-Herald of August 2, 1878, from which we have already quoted:

"The center of the circle was the center of the square at the intersection of Court and Main streets. The circle and square were joined, or rather the gateway, as the opening between them was called, was in the street a little west of the point where the alley crosses Main street at the Central Presbyterian church. Starting at this point, the ditch, which was the circumference of the circle, ran under a part of the church, under the rear of Mr. Scovil's house, curving around to McClaren's livery stable and Bauder's carriage shop, crossing the street between Bauder's and the Foresman corner and Pinckney street diagonally to T. K. Brunner's, through the rear of the Jones lot, on West Main street, through Jesse Ward's and the Tibbs barber shop, through the Steele-Jones block, and the Martin property, and diagonally to Jerome Wolfley's, north of the court house, crossing to Mrs. Nightengale's residence, through the Brobeck carriage shops, and diagonally across Franklin street, to the rear of Ruggles' lot, and through it to the beginning.

This circuit was the line of the ditch described above, and which was full of water to a depth ranging from three to ten feet. The banks were very steep, and only at a few places was the ditch fordable. The embankment was overgrown with immense trees, and so thickly covered with vines and bushes that it was almost impenetrable. Here and there the cattle had made trails down to the water and at these places horsemen were in the habit of crossing, the path winding down sidewise. Within the circle the growth of timber and bushes was quite dense.

We now go to the square, the limits of which we can not so clearly define, but sufficiently so to give a fair idea. The face next to the circle was on the line of the alley next to the Central church, extending south to Franklin street (lower side), and north to Watt street. The south line ran along parallel with the south side of Franklin street, extending to a point a few rods east of Washington street. The only remains of the old embankment now visible is the elevated ground near which the little cabin known as Mrs. White's house, stands, at the corner of Pickaway and Franklin streets. The north line ran along Watt street east from H. R. Heffner's residence, a distance of fifty-five rods. The eastern boundary running north and south, crossed Main street a little east of Washington street, the old elm tree, well remembered by many, which stood in the pavement, being just inside of the embankment."

The people of Circleville are indebted to Mr. G. F. Wittich (who came to this place, with his parents, from Germany, in 1836) for the only pictorial representation that was ever made of the old town. It is a bird's-eye view in water colors, painted mostly from memory, but pronounced very accurate by all the old inhabitants. Considering that Mr. Wittich never had any instruction, and but very little practice, in drawing and painting, the work is highly creditable to his taste and skill. It has been lithographed, and doubtless, in coming times, copies of it will possess an antiquarian interest and value. [See page 174.]

INCORPORATION OF THE CITY.

As already stated, Circleville was laid out as the county seat of Pickaway county, and a nucleus of the future city was formed early in the autumn of 1810; but it was not until more than four years after this time that an act was passed by the legislature of the State, erecting the youthful village into a town corporate. Of the growth of the community, during this brief anti-municipal period, no records remain. Its population, at the end of this period, can be only a matter of conjecture; but as it appears to have had about forty families at the start, if we allow it the same, as an annual increase, for the next four years, it must have comprised, at the time of its incorporation, about six or seven hundred souls.

We have not been able to find any record of the election held in accordance with an act passed by the legislature, December 24, 1814, authorizing an election to be held, nor can any of the old residents give us the names of any of the officers then elected. But in order to contrast the machinery of the old town organization with that of the city to which the corporation was afterwards changed, we append the names of the officers elected under the old regime several years later.

The town officers elected in 1830 were as follows: Mayor (then properly called president), W. B. Thrall; recorder, E. B. Olds; trustees, William McArthur, George Crook, Joseph Olds, Jacob H. Lutz, and Erastus Webb.

The organization formed in 1815 continued for thirty-eight years; that is to say, until 1853, in which year, on the twenty-first of March, the town council passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the town of Circleville, by its council, does hereby determine and elect to be classed as and to become a city of the second class, under the provisions of the act of the general assembly of this State, passed May 3, 1852, entitled "An act to provide for the organization of cities and incorporate villages, and the act amendatory thereto, passed March, 1853."

The city records, containing the account of the election which was held in accordance with this resolution, have (as it seems to us, with most strange and culpable carelessness) been lost or destroyed. But we have been so fortunate as to find a file of the Circleville Herald, from which we learn that, on the fourth of April, 1853, the following officers were elected under the new city organization: Mayor, Z. R. Martin; treasurer, W. Baker; solicitor, H. N. Hedges; marshal, S. Barncord; councilmen, William Van Heyde, William Doane, W. W. Bierce, and Allen Myers.

To show how much more complex the municipal government has become since that time, we conclnde our notice of the city corporation with the following official directory of the city of Circleville for 1879:

Mayor, I. P. Todd; marshal, Jacob Brown; solicitor, J. Wheeler Lowe; civil engineer, C. C. Neibling; street commissioner, Thomas Heiry. Members of Council: First ward, James Brobeck, Michael Hoover; second ward, C. A. Helwagen, Charles E. Groce; third ward, Edward Smith, E. P. Strong; fourth ward, Thomas Hamilton, Fred. Warner; fifth ward, George May, George Krinn; president of council, Ed. Smith; vice-president, C. A. Helwagen; clerk, R. P. Dreisbach; treasurer, county treasurer. Standing Committees: Streets, alleys and nuisances, James Brobeck, C. A. Helwagen, E. P. Strong, Thomas Hamilton, Fred Warner; public grounds and buildings, C. A. Helwagen, Thomas Hamilton, George Krinn, Charles E. Groce; market house and markets, George May, C. E. Groce, Fred. Warner, M. Hoover; fire department, Charles E. Groce, James Brobeck, George Krinn, Thomas Hamilton; claims, C. A. Helwagen, Thomas Hamilton, George Krinn, M. Hoover; gas posts and lights, George May, Fred Warner, George Krinn, E. P. Strong. Fire Department: Chief engineer, W. H. Nicholas; first assistant, T. N.

Caskey; second assistant, Charles McLain; first engineer, steamer Circleville, Louis F. Dresher; second engineer, steamer Buckeye, Andrew Rudel; fireman, William M. Todd. Board of Health: Mayor I. P. Todd, president ex officio, Dr. E. D. Bowers, George H. Fickardt, William E. Bolin, George Davenport, John Boyer, William Doane. City Library Board: Citizens, W. M. Anderson, W. B. Marfield, W. M. Drum; members of council, Charles E. Groce, Charles A. Helwagen, Michael Hoover.

Council meets the first and third Wednesdays of each month.

THE CHURCHES OF CIRCLEVILLE.

FIRST PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

As early as the beginning of the present century Presbyterian services were held within the bounds of what was then Mount Pleasant, now Kingston, congregation, by ministers of the old Washington Presbytery, the territory of which embraced a part of Kentucky and southern Ohio. One of these ministers, Rev. James Robinson, a student of the well-known Dr. McMillan, organized, in 1808, the Pickaway church of Ross county, to which he ministered in connection with Mount Pleasant. He preached also occasionally to the Presbyterians of Circleville, holding services in the court house.

In 1822 Columbus Presbytery was constituted from the territory covered formerly by the Washington Presbytery, and at its first meeting the congregations of Mount Pleasant and Circleville were reported as united and able to sustain a pastor. Rev. William Burton was appointed to the charge of the same, and installed as pastor September 13, 1822. At this time the Circleville church had twenty members and two elders, Jacob Hughes and Benjamin Cox.

In 1828 the congregation was incorporated by act of assembly as the First Presbyterian Church of Circleville. Lots one hundred and nine and one hundred and ten were deeded by Andrew Huston to Dr. Finley and Dr. Luckey, trustees, for the purposes of a Presbyterian church, in consideration of one hundred dollars. A plain, one-story brick edifice was erected on the site thus provided—the same now occupied by the congregation. The building had sittings for some two hundred and fifty worshippers.

In the winter of 1830-31 both the Mount Pleasant and the Circleville congregations were visited by a thorough and extensive revival, which added fifty-six members to the Circleville church. Thus strengthened, the members extended a call to Mr. Burton for his whole time, and he was installed as pastor of the First church of Circleville, April 8, 1831. The elders of the church at this time, from which it dates its separate existence, were Matthew McCrea and James B. Finley. The number of communicants was one hundred and ten.

The pastorate of Mr. Burton continued until the spring of 1835, when he resigned his charge to accept one at Piketon. He was a native of Massachusetts, a graduate of Dartmouth college, studied theology with his uncle, Dr. Asa Burton, of Thetford, Vermont, and was a man of fine logical and rhetorical powers.

From May 2, 1836, until March 21, 1842, the pastorate was held by Rev. Franklin Putnam. During this period the division of the Presbyterian church into Old School and New School took place, and the First church of Circleville voted, August 13, 1838, to adhere to the exscinded synods. The vote was forty-eight for to nine against such action; and, after a brief interval, the minority peaceably withdrew and organized the Central Presbyterian church, in connection with the Old School assembly. In 1842 Mr. Putnam, after a prosperous pastorate, resigned his charge because of ill health, and the church resolved that "we feel it our duty and privilege to follow him and his family with kind remembrances and prayers."

March 11, 1844, the congregation extended a call to Dr. James Rowland, who ministered with great acceptance and success, and with the favor of the entire community, until his death, in 1854. During his pastorate the present commodious and convenient church edifice was erected, at a cost of about fourteen thousand dollars. The committee on subscriptions were, N. S. Gregg, S. Marfield, Dr. C. Olds, Dr. Rowland, W. W. Bierce, Chauncey U. Olds. During the erection of the building the congregation worshipped in the seminary. The first services held in the audience room were those connected with the interment of the pastor, Dr. Rowland. His remains repose under the belfry, and a suitable mural tablet in the vestibule expresses the affection of his bereaved parishioners.

Rev. P. M. Bartlett, now president of Tennessee university, was pastor from January 29, 1855, until April, 1857.

December 20, 1857, Rev. Henry Calhoun, formerly of Coshocton, Ohio, began his labors as pastor. That winter was one of deep religious interest, and thirty persons, mostly heads of families, were added to the church at the spring communion. After a prosperous pastorate, Mr. Calhoun resigned December 20, 1865.

June 2, 1867, Rev. H. R. Hoisington entered upon his duties as pastor. His services were highly acceptable to the church and the community. In 1870 the Old School and New School branches of the church were formally re-united in the city of Pittsburgh. This step brought the First and Central churches of Circleville into the same ecclesiastical relations, and the subject of a union of the two was agitated. April 28, 1872, Mr. Hoisington resigned and removed to Cleveland, Ohio, that the way might be clear for such a union. But the Central church having declined to accept the resignation of its pastor, the union was not consummated.

June 10, 1873, Rev. S. H. McMullin, formerly professor of church history in the theological seminary at Danville, Kentucky, was installed pastor of the church, and is the present incumbent.

The officers of the church at present are: trustees, J. A. Hawkes, Thomas Miller, W. M. Drum; session, Otis Ballard, H. A. Jackson; treasurer, William M. Drum; superintendent of Sunday-school, William M. Drum.

The number of communicants is one hundred and sixty-four; and of children in Sabbath-school, one hundred.

The church is free from all indebtedness, provides for an annual expense list of two thousand eight hundred dollars, and contributes an average of three hundred dollars to missionary agencies.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.*

Among the earliest churches of this place and vicinity is the one called Methodist Episcopal. We only refer to what is historical, in saying that Methodist itinerants were among the first in bearing the gospel to those finding homes in the West.

Very early, in this century, a place of worship was established about a mile and a half east of this, near the old Lancaster road, at the house of a Mr. Burget. Before preaching was established here, a few members, moving into this place, were in the habit of going there to worship. This town was laid out in 1810, by Mr. Daniel Dreisbach. The first sermon preached by a Methodist minister in the newly-opened town, was by the Rev. William Swayze. Passing over the country, he made this a place of rest. Proposals having been made for stated preaching, the question of place arose. After consultation, the public house of Mr. Andrew Ensworth, standing on the east side of the circle, in the locality now occupied by the corner of Court and Main streets (some say where William Albaugh's house now stands, others, upon the ground occupied by Philip Warner), was offered and accepted.

About 1812 to 1815, a local preacher, by the name of Emmet, living west of this, in company with another, whose name is forgotten, was accustomed to visit this place and hold occasional services. In process of time, during that period, a class was organized under the supervision of these local ministers, consisting of eight persons, namely, Louisa Hare, Elizabeth Burget, Margaret Botkin, Margaret Davis, John Eli, Sarah Burget, and two colored women—Lydia Smith and her mother, Venice. Only one of the original class survives, she who is familiarly known among the membership as mother Hare.

Through the instrumentality of Lydia Smith, commonly known as Aunt Lydia, a Methodist church was raised here among the people of her own color. She died in 1875, having witnessed, according to the testimony of both white and colored people, a good confession for Christ upwards of eighty years, dying peacefully, at the extreme age of ninety-five or ninety-six.

The surviving member, Mother Hare, is the daughter of one who was a pioneer Methodist in Ohio—Nimrod Bright. She is now in extreme feebleness, being in her eighty-eighth year. She, too, for more than sixty years, has enjoyed among her acquaintance the reputation of being a firm, consistent, and devoted christian.

In the year 1815 or 1816, the class was regularly taken under the care of the traveling ministry of the church. Soon after William McArthur, subsequently known as Judge McArthur, was appointed leader. The society formerly meeting at the house of Mr. Burget, east of the town, was transferred to this place. The names of John Burget, John Wright, Mr. Hasselton, and others, are remembered as being early added to the original number; also, William Moore, father of S. A. Moore, well known to our citizens, who lived where his son now lives, was among the early additions, and proved a devoted friend of the church and the general interests of religion.

The first places of meeting were school-houses and private dwellings. Mother Hare says the first place of preaching was in a log school-house, with slab seats; then in a better school-house, more nearly in the center of the town. When the court house was built, worship was transferred to that building, which was used in common by nearly all the religious denominations; then from the court house to the academy, continuing there until a church edifice was put up, which was about the year 1830. Two lots, numbered one hundred and seventy-one and one hundred and seventy-two, near the academy, were purchased of Charles Shoemaker, for two hundred dollars. The church was built of brick, doubtless made of clay from the old circular earth wall, near which it was erected; but neither the cost of the building, nor the length of time taken in the work, is remembered.

This church remained as the stated place of worship until it was destroyed by fire, in 1851. The fire is supposed to have occurred through a defective flue. This disaster was under the ministry of the Rev. J. A. Brunner. The first Presbyterian church was kindly offered and accepted for preaching services, and the basement of the Episcopal church for the Sunday-school. The pastor and members immediately went to work to secure another building. The people of all denominations generously responded to the appeal for a new church. Because of the town extending southward, it was thought best to change the location. The old site was abandoned, and the present one, on the corner of Main and Pickaway streets, was secured.

The building committee of the present edifice consisted of Jacob Welter, Joel Franklin, and William C. Taylor, the latter recently deceased. The cost of the present building, according to Mr. Welter's recollection, was twelve thousand dollars, or upwards. The bell was the gift of a former merchant of this city, Mr. Frederick Cogswell, now deceased. He also endowed a pew for the pastor's family. This house was dedicated to the worship of God by the Rev. Dr. Trimble, now of Columbus. It was several years from the time the church was first occupied until the audience room was fitted up for worship. From time to time sundry improvements have been added; recently, in new windows and renovation, at a cost of two thousand dollars. An indebtedness of two hundred and fifty dollars remains, which the ladies are devising ways and means to remove. The roll of membership now numbers over three hundred.

This church, after being regularly established as a preaching place, so far as can now be ascertained, was included in what was known as Pickaway circuit—a part of the old "Scioto district." While in a circuit, it was served by the following ministers:

* Taken mainly from a paper read by the Rev. J. Mitchell, during the centennial exercises at the church, Sunday evening, April 9, 1876.

In 1816 (most likely while he was on Fairfield circuit), by Michael Ellis; 1817 (Pickaway circuit), Michael Ellis and Samuel Brown; 1818, James Quinn; 1819, Michael Ellis and John Solomon; 1820, David Davidson and Michael Ellis, 1821, Cornelius Springer and Peter Warner; 1822, B. Westlake and Andrew Kanier; 1823, Jacob Hooper and Whitfield Hughes; 1824, Wm. Stevens and J. T. Donahoe; 1825, Z. Connel and M. Ellis; 1826, Richard Brandriff and S. P. Shaw; 1827, Jacob Delay and William Reynolds; 1828, Benjamin Cooper and J. Young; 1829, John Ferree and Jacob Hooper; 1830, Solomon Minear and James C. Taylor; 1831, David Lewis and H. Baird; 1832, David Lewis and Jacob Dixon; 1833, Z. Connel and W. T. Snow; 1834, J. Delay and Abraham Baker; 1835 (now Circleville circuit), S. Hamilton and E. B. Chase; 1836, S. Hamilton and E. T. Webster; 1837, Isaac C. Hunter and Harvey Camp; 1838, Isaac C. Hunter and P. Nation; 1839, J. A. Reeder and P. Nation; 1840, A. M. Lorraine and T. A. G. Philips; 1841, A. M. Lorraine and C. C. Lybrand—making thirty-nine different pastors in twenty-six years. In 1842 (half station), J. C. Bontecue; 1843 (full station), J. C. Bontecue—J. M. Trimble, presiding elder; 1844, Joseph J. Hill; 1845, A. B. Wombaugh; 1846 7, David Warnock; 1848, E. D. Roe; 1849, John Dillon; 1850, Jacob Dimmett, who remained only six months, the year being filled out by Rev. John Dreisbach; 1851–2, J. A. Brunner; 1853 4, J. M. Jameson; 1855, G. W. Brush; 1856 7, C. E. Felton; 1858–9, A. Brooks; 1860–1, A. Byers, who went into the army—his place being supplied by Rev. E. P. Hall; 1862 3, I. Crook; 1864 5, S. M. Merrill; 1866 7, T. R. Taylor; 1868, W. T. Harvey; 1869 70, H. K. Foster; 1871, C. D. Battelle; 1872–3, T. H. Philips—his son Howard supplying his place for the last year; 1874 6, J. Mitchel; C. M. 1877–9, Bethauser, who is, at the present time, visiting his relations in Germany. It will be seen, therefore, that sixty-four different ministers have been employed, since the first organization of the society.

Two annual conferences have been held here, one in 1834, presided over by Bishop Soule; the other, in 1861, presided over by Bishop Janes.

ST. PHILIP'S (EPISCOPAL) CHURCH.

The twenty-sixth day of May, 1817, the Rev. Philander Chase, who had recently been rector of Christ church, Hartford, Connecticut, afterwards bishop of the diocese of Ohio, conducted service according to the liturgy of the Protestant Episcopal church in the United States of America, and preached in the town of Circleville, at which time the present St. Philip's parish was organized, with the following instrument of parochial association:

"We, whose names are hereunder written, deeply impressed with the truth and importance of the Christian religion, and anxiously desirous to promote its influences in the hearts and lives of ourselves, our families and our neighbors, do hereby associate ourselves together by the name, style and title of St. Philip's church, county of Pickaway, State of Ohio, in communion with the Protestant Episcopal church in the United States of America, whose liturgy, constitution and canons, we do hereby adopt. [Signed]

DANIEL WRIGHT, WALTER THRALL, J. T. DAVENPORT,
WILLIAM B. THRALL.

In September, 1818, at a parish meeting, presided over by the Rev. Philander Chase, the following gentlemen were elected, to serve until Easter, 1819: Wm. Seymour and Guy W. Doane, wardens; John E. Morgan, Jos. G. Noxon, Joshua Fulsom, vestrymen. Wm. Seymour was elected to represent the parish in the convention to be held in Worthington on the first Monday in January, 1819. On the eighteenth of June, 1819, the parish was visited for the first time by the Rt. Rev. Philander Chase, as bishop of the diocese of Ohio.

The first regular minister was the Rev. Ezra B. Kellogg, who commenced his parochial labors in Circleville, and conducted services one Sunday in four weeks. Previous to this time, the services were conducted by lay readers and occasional supplies. How long the Rev. Mr. Kellogg remained as minister in charge, the records do not show. December 23, 1829, six years after the last recorded vestry meeting, there was a meeting of the parish, at which a vestry was elected to serve until the Easter following. This vestry immediately opened negotiations with St. Paul's church, Chillicothe, and the Rev. Mr. Bausman, minister in charge of St. Paul's, which resulted in his conducting service here one Sunday in every four weeks, during the two years following.

The Rev. R. V. Rogers took charge of the parish, September 12, 1832. On the twenty-sixth of December, of that year, it was resolved by the vestry that G. W. Doane, W. B. Thrall and John L. Green, be constituted a committee to petition the legislature for an act to incorporate the wardens and vestry of St. Philip's church. The vestry further resolved, that they accept the proposition this day made in writing by Mr. R. Douglas for lot number one hundred and one, on the Mound, for which they were to pay three hundred and fifty dollars, in seven annual instalments, without interest; and that a committee of six be appointed to draft and circulate a subscription for the purpose of raising funds to build a church, and that the following persons constitute said committee: Wm. B. Thrall, R. H. Hopkins, Robert Larrimore, G. W. Doane, J. W. Finley and Wm. McColloch. At a parish meeting at the house of Mr. G. W. Doane, May, 1833, Messrs. J. G. Doddridge, Wm. B. Thrall and Robert Larrimore, were elected a committee to design a plan for a church, of the relative proportions of the Episcopal church in Columbus, with a seating capacity of three hundred; to contract for materials, and have in charge the building of said church, which was completed in the year 1834, and was a comfortable and commodious brick building. The Rev. Mr. Rogers resigned the rectorship to return to his home, in England, the eleventh day of March, 1836. Previous to the erection of this church, the services seem to have been conducted in the court house and the First Presbyterian church.

The following were the ministers in charge from this date to the eighth day of October, 1865: Revs. W. F. Halsey, W. W. Aruat, Anson Clarke, Alex. McLeod, Chas. B. Steret, A. D. Benedict, H. N. Bishop, R. L.

Nash, D. Risser, C. W. Fearns and Thos. W. Mitchell. October 8, 1865, the Rev. E. Owen Simpson took charge of this parish, in connection with St. John's, Lancaster. During the month of April, 1867, he resigned St. John's, and took full charge of St. Philip's, and remained in charge until Easter, 1870. During his administration the parish greatly prospered; the original church was torn down, and the present very commodious, substantial and beautiful stone church was erected, at a cost of fifteen thousand dollars, paid for and consecrated. Rev. E. Owen Simpson and Messrs. Wm. B. Marfield and Alfred Williams were the building committee. The corner stone was laid August 16, 1866, by the Rt. Rev. Bishop McIlvaine, and the church was consecrated April 23, 1868, by the Rt. Rev. Bishop Bedell. During the erection of their church, the congregation worshiped in the First Baptist church. Since 1870, the following have been the ministers in charge: Revs. W. C. Mills, H. C. Camp, J. T. Franklin, C. A. Bragdon and J. H. Logie, the latter having been ordained deacon in the church by the Rt. Rev. Bishop Jaggar, of the diocese of Southern Ohio, on the twenty-third day of February, 1879, and at the same time he was appointed, by the bishop, as minister in charge of the church.

In 1874, a rectory was purchased, at a cost of four thousand dollars, which makes the total value of the church property about nineteen thousand dollars.

LUTHERANISM IN CIRCLEVILLE PRIOR TO 1859.

The early history of the Lutheran church in this place is involved in much obscurity. A division occurred in 1859, resulting from differences in theological opinion, since which time there have been two separate congregations, each claiming to be the rightful successor of the original organization. We have received, from representatives of both congregations, historical sketches, from which we condense the following brief history of the church, down to the time of the separation.

Among the heads of families attached to the Lutheran church, who emigrated, principally from Pennsylvania, and settled in Circleville and its immediate vicinity, early in the present century, are recorded the following: Jacob Zieger, sr., George Zimmer, Samuel Watt, Philip Zieger, Jacob Zieger, jr., Frederick Zieger, John Valentine, Peter Apple, Valentine Keffer, Peter Trees, Heinrich Trees, William Moyer, Peter Herbster, Heinrich Ely, "Old Father Try," Anthony Weaver, John Weaver, John Row, Mr. Earnhart, sr., and others.

In the year 1811 the Evangelical Lutheran synod of Pennsylvania delegated the Rev. Jacob Leist to go to Ohio and organize congregations. He preached his first sermon here on the 28th of August, 1811. As this was less than a year after the town was laid out, it must have been one of the first sermons (if not the very first) preached in the place. For a long time he held services once in four weeks. All the members being familiar with German, the services were held exclusively in that language for several years. There was no church building in town, and the meetings were held in such places as could be obtained. After the court house was built in the old circle, this denomination, as well as others, used it for their meetings. It is claimed that the Rev. Mr. Leist organized a church in due form; and, judging from the amount of material which he found here at the time, as well as from the nature of his mission, nothing can be more probable. And yet, if such an organization was effected, two things are very remarkable: first, that no scrap of record can be found to testify of its existence; and second, that it should, by common consent, have been entirely ignored in the forming of a new organization to take its place, some twenty years later. However this mystery is to be explained, it is certain that records, apparently authentic, exist, which show that, in May, 1831, a congregation, taking the name of "the English Evangelical Lutheran Church," was organized, with the Rev. N. B. Little as pastor. Of the meeting at which this organization was effected, Mr. George Wildbahn was chosen president, and John Marfield secretary. Following are the names of the gentlemen present and taking part in the meeting: George P. Kephart, Henry Try, George Hammel, Adam Pontious, Robert Hays, James Carlisle, Gershom M. Peters, Moses Dawley, Michael Pontious, Joseph Landes, Daniel Funk, Michael May, John Valentine, Henry Triece, Samuel Watt, U. P. Kerr, Philip Zieger, John Groce, William B. Thrall, Valentine Keffer, Dr. William N. Lenker, John A. Wolfley, James Kepler, and John Ludwig.

The three last named having been appointed a committee to examine the credentials of the Rev. Mr. Little, made a favorable report, and he was thereupon chosen as their pastor. At the same meeting, or one held very soon after, a committee was also appointed to confer with the Rev. Mr. Leist, who, quite advanced in years, was still residing in the vicinity. The object of the conference with Mr. Leist does not very definitely appear. It is evident, however, that he gave at least a tacit assent to the organization, and thenceforth the venerable missionary drops out of view.

The Rev. Mr. Little continued in charge about two years and a half, when he resigned; and, on the 23d of February, 1834, the congregation gave a call to the Rev. J. A. Roof, who labored for them acceptably twenty-one years, preaching partly in German and partly in English, when he resigned and moved to Iowa.

In the fall of 1831, soon after Mr. Little commenced his ministrations, steps were taken to build a church; the sum of two thousand three hundred and thirty-seven dollars being raised for that purpose by subscription, part of which was paid in money, and part in materials or work on the building. The south half of the "area on Bastile avenue" was obtained as a site, and the corner stone was laid in the spring of 1832. The building contained a basement and audience room, the dimensions being sixty-five feet in length and forty-five in width. The basement was occupied till 1839, in which year the audience room was completed.

After the resignation of Mr. Roof, there was a vacancy of about two years in the pastorate, when the Rev. Joel Swartz, of Shenandoah county, Va., accepted a call in the latter part of March, 1857. He also preached in German and English. It was during the administration of Mr. Swartz that the church was permanently divided. We should have no heart, even if we had time and space, to write the history of the painful theological controversy which culminated in this unhappy division, nor of the still more painful lawsuit by which the party that felt themselves compelled to withdraw from the church, sought to regain possession of the property. Suffice it to say that, at the annual meeting which was held on the 7th of March, 1859, the party corresponding to what is known as "old school," or "high church," in other religious bodies, retired, leaving the "new school," or "low church" party, with Mr. Swartz at their head, (whom they retained for another year) in possession of the church. Each party elected officers, claiming to continue the original organization. The so-called old Lutherans brought suit against the so-called new Lutherans, for the possession of the church property, both parties claiming their right to it.

The decision of the court of common pleas, in which the case was tried, was in favor of the so-called old Lutherans. The case, however, was appealed to the district court, which (in effect, at least) reversed the decision of the court below. The old Lutherans could have brought suit by another form of action, but concluded not to do so. They were served for a time by neighboring ministers, and remained in the Ohio synod. Mr. Swartz and his congregation connected themselves with the Miami synod. Thus two congregations existed. The party that adhered to Mr. Swartz took (or retained) the name of

THE ENGLISH EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH.

The Rev. Mr. Swartz continued in charge one year, when he resigned, and the Rev. Thomas Hill was elected in his place, May 21, 1860. He was succeeded by the Rev. M. L. Wilhelm, March 31, 1866. During the administration of Mr. Wilhelm, a new brick church was built, at a cost of about eight thousand dollars. He remained till the church was finished and dedicated, when he resigned, and was succeeded by the Rev. H. B. Miller, December 29, 1868. Mr. Miller remained a little less than a year—then resigned and went to Tarleton, Ohio.

The names of the ministers who succeeded him, with the length of the ministry of each, are as follows: The Rev. Thomas Hill (second term), one year; Rev. E. W. Sanders, three years. Then there was a vacancy one year, and the Rev. J. M. Ruthrauff was elected, September 13, 1874, and continued a year and a half. The present minister, Rev. J. W. Swick, accepted a call to the charge of this congregation, April 6, 1879.

The party that withdrew from the church took the name of

TRINITY EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH.

In June, 1859, the Rev. C. Albrecht received and accepted a call to the pastorate of this congregation, and remained until April, 1860, when the Rev. John Wagenhals was called. Then the Trinity congregation obtained, by order of the court of common pleas, from the director of the town, W. W. Bierce, a lot known as the "public," or "city," or "Presbyterian" burying ground; and built thereon a neat brick church, at a cost of about five thousand dollars. It was dedicated May 27, 1866. A commodious parsonage was built on the same lot, about the same time.

In 1868 the Rev. Mr. Wagenhals resigned his pastoral office, on account of feeble health and advanced age, having served eight years. In the same year the Rev. B. M. Lenker accepted a call from the church, and remained until 1870.

On account of a diversity of opinion in the Ohio synod, on certain doctrinal points in dispute among the clergy, a division took place in the English district of said synod. Unfortunately, it also caused a division in this congregation. A number of older families withdrew, as they were not willing to make these questions a test of true Lutheranism, having previously been considered open questions, left to the discretion of pastors and congregations. The members remaining in the church after the resignation of Mr. Lenker, were served first by the Rev. E. L. S. Tressel, and subsequently by the Rev. A. H. Schultze, who resigned in May, 1879—the pastorate being still vacant.

UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST.

At a general conference, in May, 1833, it was resolved that the United Brethren church should have a printing establishment of its own, and that said establishment be located at the town of Circleville. So, to carry out this resolution, the conference appointed a board of trustees, consisting of George Dreisbach, Jonathan Dreisbach and Rev. John Russel. On the twelfth day of April, 1834, the trustees bought a printing press, together with type and cases; and also a lot and two houses of Mr. Z. R. Martin, on North Main street, and on the thirty-first day of December, 1834, the first number of the Religious Telescope was issued, with Rev. W. R. Rinehart as editor. The publication of the Telescope was conducted for several years without any church organization, there being no members of the society in town except the editor, and perhaps some of the employees of the office.

In the spring of 1837, Rev. William Hanley, with his family, moved to Circleville, and during this year regular preaching, on alternate Sabbaths with the Universalist preachers, was kept up in the old court house, standing in the center of the circle, where the two main streets now cross. In the winter of 1838, services were held in the academy, instead of the court house, a building situated in the northeast part of town, close to the lot occupied by the old Methodist church. During this year [1838] a very interesting meeting was held, during which penitents were often seen on the streets enquiring for the United Brethren prayer meeting, and in some cases, as soon as they entered the enclosure of the meeting, they would fall upon their knees and beg for an interest in the prayers of God's people. This meeting resulted in the conversion of a number of persons, and the organization of a United Brethren society of about one hundred members. The tide of public sentiment was turned in the direction was born at Arneystown, Burlington county, New Jersey, March 20, 1838. When he was about three years old his parents removed to Monmouth county, New Jersey, where they now reside. His ancestors were of the pioneer settlers of New Jersey, on the paternal side, of the early Holland emigration, and among the first settlers of Monmouth county. On the maternal side he is connected with the Reeves family, one of the oldest and most respected families in Burlington and other counties of south Jersey. Several of the Van Cleafs served in Jersey regiments during the war for American independence, and are specially mentioned among the patriots of that day. His paternal great-grandfather owned an extensive body of land in Monmouth county, New Jersey, which was divided among his large family of children.

Aaron Van Cleaf was educated in the common schools near Freehold, New Jersey, until he was fourteen years of age, when he entered the Monmouth Democrat office, at Freehold, as an apprentice to the printing business, remaining there, as apprentice and journeyman, until April, 1859, when he emigrated to Georgetown, Brown county, Ohio, and for a few months was connected with the Democratic Standard, which paper was soon after merged in what is now the Brown county News. In November, 1859, he became editor and publisher of the Democratic Citizen, at Lebanon, Ohio, which was published in the face of many difficulties. On the twelfth of August, 1862, the office was destroyed by a mob of political opponents, but he re-established the paper and continued its publication until May, 1863. In November, of the same year, he purchased the Circleville Democrat and Watchman, and has since conducted that paper.

In 1871 he was nominated for representative in the general assembly by the Democratic party of Pickaway county, and was elected by four hundred and seventy-seven majority over James Langhry, Republican, who was then extensively known and popular. He declined a re-election. In 1877 he was again nominated for representative by acclamation, being the first Democratic candidate for that place in Pickaway county, nominated without opposition, for many years. He was elected by nine hundred and forty-six majority over Frederick Thorn, Republican, and in the house was chairman of the committee on reform schools, and a member of the finance and printing committees. On the third of June, 1879, he was nominated by acclamation, in the Democratic senatorial convention, to represent the counties of Franklin and Pickaway in the State senate, and at the October election following, was elected by one thousand six hundred and thirty-four majority.

He has taken an active part in the politics of Pickaway county for fifteen years past, and has been chairman of the Democratic central committee of the county for thirteen years.

SAMUEL MARFIELD, JR.

THE MARFIELD FAMILY.

John Marfield was a resident of the mining town of Bardenburg, on the lower Rhine, Germany, and was probably in some way connected with mining interests. He was married to Elizabeth Spies, and at the latter end of the last century emigrated to America with his family, consisting of his wife and two daughters—Penelope and Hannah. He located, soon after reaching this country, in Baltimore, Maryland, and successfully engaged in merchandising. In Baltimore were born five more children—William, Catharine, Samuel, John, Henry, and Elizabeth. All were reared in the school of domestic discipline and economy The head of the family was a man of unbending will, severe honesty, and simplicity of character. The wife was a kind, warm-hearted, gentle, christian woman. The father ruled with the rod—the mother with love. Before the children grew to maturity their father died, but they enjoyed the love and affection of their mother until, ripe with a good old age, she passed away, in 1851. The boys, as they grew to manhood, became scattered. One of the daughters—Hannah—by marriage, became Mrs. Benson; the others lived in maidenhood, in the home their parents had left to them. Elizabeth, the youngest, is now the only survivor. Of the sons, William, a mechanical engineer, located in Virginia; Henry in Galena, Illinois; John in Chillicothe, Ohio, where he built up a fine fortune and an enviable business reputation; and Samuel in Circleville, Ohio. Henry and Samuel are the only sons now living. It is with the latter and his family that this sketch has to deal.

Samuel Marfield was born in Baltimore, Maryland, January 17, 1808. When a youth he was apprenticed to the saddlery business, which he learned. Self-depending from childhood, he branched out in business for himself before he became of age, and rapidly built up a handsome trade in domestic and imported saddlery hardware in Baltimore. January 3, 1833, he was married to Harriet M., daughter of Samuel and Sarah Wright. Mr. Wright was a Maryland farmer, of Welsh extraction. To Samuel Marfield and wife were born, in Baltimore, two sons—William B., November 19, 1833, and James T., January 29, 1838. Captivated with the inviting opportunities of the West, Samuel Marfield moved to Ohio in 1839, and located in Circleville, engaging in the general hardware business. Here, in Circleville, April 20, 1844, another son was born, and named after his father—Samuel. In his business Mr. Marfield made a success, and in a few years, in 1848, was enabled to establish a private banking house, which he called "The People's Bank," afterward's "Marfield's Bank," and which continued in operation until May, 1877—twenty-nine years.

Harriet M. Marfield was a faithful and devoted wife, and a tender, loving, patient mother, the memory of whose sweet affection is the treasured heritage of the surviving sons. After several years of bodily affliction, she passed away, April 27, 1865.

The three sons were all given generous opportunities for acquiring a good education—William, at Kenyon college, Gambier, Ohio, where he passed through the first two years of the classical course; James, at Greenway academy, Springfield, Ohio, and Samuel, jr., at Harcourt school and Kenyon college, where he graduated in 1864.

William, after leaving college, was associated with his father in the bank, and remained with him until 1877. He was married January 15, 1861, to Mary F., only daughter of N. S. Gregg, of Circleville. To them were born six children: Elliott, born December 4, 1861; Harriett, born March 2, 1863; James, born January 1, 1865; Nannie, born June 24, 1866; Delano, born March 8, 1869; Mary, born February 4, 1872. They are all living but James, who died in infancy, September 13, 1865.

James T., commencing as a farmer, also finally took a position in the bank, until 1862, when he entered the Union army, as second lieutenant of company B, One Hundred and Fourteenth regiment, Ohio volunteer infantry. He was then in his twenty-fifth year, a powerfully-developed and magnificent specimen of manhood.

The regiment was largely recruited in Pickaway county, and contained the flower of the youth of the community. It was organized in August, 1862, and soon after being mustered in, was ordered to the front to join the army which was being massed to operate against Vicksburg, Mississippi. On December 28th, General W. T. Sherman, in command, embarked his forces on the Yazoo river above and in rear of the rebel army protecting that strongly entrenched citadel, and on the twenty-ninth charged their lines. It was a day of slaughter and defeat. Lieutenant Marfield fell, and was buried by his comrades near the battlefield. The army retreated; but six months after, when General Grant captured Vicksburg, the same faithful comrades sought out and recovered the remains of their friend and officer, and they now rest in the beautiful Forest cemetery. The name of Lieutenant James T. Marfield is held in dear remembrance, for he was, in every true sense, a man.

Samuel, jr., the youngest son, whose portrait heads this sketch, after the completion of his collegiate course spent some time in foreign travel, visiting France, Switzerland, Germany, and the British Isles. From 1866 to 1875 he was engaged in commercial pursuits as a wholesale grocer and produce merchant. December 18, 1867, he was married to Florence L., daughter of Dr. A. W. Thompson, of Circleville. To them have been born five children: Dwight S., born December 11, 1868; William T., born August 30, 1870; George R., born August 2, 1872; James T., born March 24, 1874; Elizabeth Spies, born February 28, 1875. James T. died in infancy, September 13, 1874.

December 1, 1875, Samuel Marfield, jr., assumed editorial direction and general management of the Circleville Herald and Union, shortly afterward changed to The Union-Herald, and April 1st, following, was appointed, by President Grant, postmaster of Circleville, both of which positions he occupies at this time.

of the new organization, and the people were generally anxious to hear what the newcomers had to say on religious subjects. The academy building was becoming entirely too small for the attendance; hence, during the year 1839, a church house was erected on East Main street, sixty-six by forty-six feet, made of good material, and, at the time, the largest, and perhaps the best, in the town.

On the nineteenth day of October, 1839, the first quarterly conference was held in the new church, with the Rev. J. Coons as pastor. The official members of the first conference were Rev. J. Coons, Rev. Elias Vandemark, Rev. William Hanley (being then editor of the Religious Telescope), William Freman, W. R. Rinehart, Robert Levering, Samuel Hargus, James Moodey and Abraham Hostteton. During this year the church did not meet with any very flattering success. A few, however, were converted and joined the church.

At the annual conference of 1840 Rev. W. W. Davis was sent to Circleville as pastor. He had some success, but received such a small salary that he would not stay longer than one year. It would be well to remark here that the reader will have to excuse the writer for not giving the salary of the early pastors, as there is no record of it. At the next conference, in 1841, Rev. P. Brock was appointed as pastor, and labored for one year, with little encouragement. He was assisted during the year by the Rev. W. B. Jarvis. In the spring of 1842 Rev. L. Davis, now Dr. Davis, of Union Biblical seminary, Dayton, Ohio, was placed in charge. During this year there was quite a falling off in the membership. In the year 1843, Rev. Davis was succeeded by the Rev. E. Vandemark. During this year the church was much embarrased by debt, and, as a result, had little or no prosperity. In the spring of 1844 Rev. D. Edwards was appointed as pastor. In May, 1845, the general conference of the whole church was held in Circleville. At this conference the pastor, Rev. D. Edwards, was elected editor of the Religious Telescope, and was succeeded in the pastorate by Rev. I. Kretzenger. During this year the Scioto conference changed its time of meeting from spring till fall; hence, in the fall of 1845, Rev. Kretzenger was succeeded by Rev. R. Hastings. In October, 1846, Rev. J. M. Spangler was called to the station. He remained its pastor for two conference years, and his labors were blessed with good results. At the close of 1847, Rev. H. Jones was appointed as pastor, and served one year. In the fall of 1848, Rev. Spangler was again appointed. In 1849 Rev. William Fisher was appointed, and served two years. During the last few years the church had been gradually decreasing in membership, and its success, as a separate congregation, was despaired of. Rev. J. Swarence succeeded Rev. Fisher in 1851, and Mr. Swarence was succeeded, in 1852, by Rev. T. Sloan. At the close of this year it was admitted that it could not succeed alone, its membership being of the poorer class and unable to support a pastor; consequently it was attached to Pickaway circuit, in charge of Rev. W. W. Davis. During this year, parties holding claims against the church became impatient, and the sale of the church was threatened; consequently at an annual conference held at the Moris church, Pickaway county, it was resolved that a vigorous effort must be made to lift the claims. The conference appointed Rev. William Hanley to solicit funds for that purpose, and on the twenty-fourth day of September, 1854, after a debt of over two thousand dollars was provided for, the church was solemnly and joyfully dedicated to the service of almighty God, fourteen years after it was built.

At the conference above named (1854) Rev. Mr. Fisher was again appointed its pastor. This year the salary was exceedingly small—indeed, smaller than ever before, owing to the removal of the Telescope office to Dayton, Ohio, which had occurred the year previous. In the year 1855 we find the Rev. J. S. Davis as pastor. Rev. Mr. Davis was an excellent man, also a good pastor and preacher. He filled his own pulpit with credit, and had frequent invitations to exchange pulpits with other ministers of the town. But alas for the church! just when his success in building up her interests seemed a fixed fact, the Master called him from labor to reward.

In the fall of 1856 Rev. E. Vandemark was again placed in charge. During this year the church and pastor became involved in a difficulty about his salary and secret societies, that resulted in almost the entire overthrow of the church.

From July, 1857, to January, 1862, we have no records whatever upon the journal of the proceedings of the church. At the last-named date we have Rev. Mr. Fisher again as pastor. From the close of 1862 to 1866 we find another gap in the records. I believe there were no services kept up during this time.

At an annual conference in September, 1866, it was resolved that Circleville church be called a mission station and receive an appropriation from the conference funds to sustain it. Rev. D. Bonebrake was then appointed to take charge of the congregation. In coming to the work he found the membership reduced to twenty-nine members. His labors were greatly blessed, and a number added to the faithful few. Rev. Mr. Bonebrake received a salary of five hundred and forty dollars. In October, 1867, Rev. J. H. Dickson was placed in charge, and received a salary of four hundred and sixty dollars. Mr. Dickson remained in charge three years, receiving about the same amount of salary each year. His labors were blessed with fair results. In October, 1870, Rev. William Brown received the appointment. This year there was considerable decrease in the membership by removals. Mr. Brown received four hundred dollars. Rev. Mr. Bonebrake, in 1871, was again returned. His labors, however, were not so successful as before. His salary, this year, was only three hundred and twelve dollars. In 1872, Rev. D. A. Johnstone received the appointment and was continued for three years, with fair success, receiving a salary of five hundred dollars each year. In October, 1875, Rev. Peter Wagner was appointed, receiving a salary of three hundred and twenty-five dollars. Rev. Mr. Wagner was succeeded, in 1876, by the Rev. J. Everhart. Owing to ill health, Mr. Evarhart had but little success. He received for his services a salary of three hundred and fifty dollars.

The annual conference of 1877 appointed Rev. J. M. Mills. Mr. Mills took charge of the congregation when it was in a very weak condition. He had, however, some success the first year, and received a salary of five hundred and fifty dollars. At the conference of 1878, Mr. Mills was again returned, and at this writing—July, 1879—is still laboring successfully, and is well received by his church and community.

The present membership of the church is one hundred and ten; Sabbath-school scholars enrolled, one hundred and seventy-five; average attendance, one hundred and twenty.

Present official board of the church: J. M. Mills, Stephen Miller, Henry Pontious, Samuel Denman, E. Cave, A. Moris, James Sims, and George Denman.

THE AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH

was organized with about twelve members, by the Rev. L. Davis, in the year 1834. The succession of pastors since that time is as follows: The Rev. Messrs. Burd, Adkesson, T. Lawrence, L. Davis, Tilman, Coleman, Peters, Arnold, Gibbons, J. Tibbs, W. Lewis, W. D. Mitchel, W. Davison and R. H. Morris, who is the present pastor. Its membership numbers, at this time, one hundred and sixty-three.

Mr. Morris and his band of faithful workers are now in the midst of a great struggle to build a new church edifice, the corner stone of which was laid only a few days ago, with appropriate ceremonies. It is to be a very fine building, forty by sixty feet in dimensions. The congregation have insisted on calling it "Morris Chapel," in honor of their present beloved pastor.

THE FIRST REGULAR BAPTIST CHURCH.

In 1838, a number of persons holding letters from Baptist churches in different States, especially Virginia, decided to organize themselves into a regular Baptist church. For this purpose, on the twenty-seventh of July, the following persons met at the house of Abram Van Meter: Gershom M. Peters, Jacob Van Meter, Acker King, Thos. B. Godard, Milton Peters, Samuel Creighton, Enoch Lamb, Nahum Newton, Maranda Peters, Emily Van Meter, Maria Van Meter, Mary Van Meter, Adelaide Newton, Amy A. King, Eve Everett, Agatha Menear, Priscilla Lamb and Eliza Lamb, and adopted articles of faith and a church covenant. They were recognized by a council, called on the eighteenth of August, composed of the following persons: Dr. Jonathan Gonig, president of Granville college, who addressed the church; Rev. T. R. Cressy, who preached the sermon; Rev. Jacob Drake, who made the prayer, and Rev. Ezra Gonig, who gave the hand of fellowship. There was also a Mr. John Rees present, from Granville church.

Of these original members, six died in the fellowship of the church; three were excluded; one joined the Presbyterians; one, Acker King, is still an active member, having held the office of deacon from the organization of the church to the present time. The recognition services took place in the Presbyterian church, which was kindly offered for this purpose. On the day following the recognition services, Charles Dean was received and baptized by D. E. Thomas.

The first pastor was Rev. Isaac K. Brownsen, who had just graduated from the Theological seminary, at Hamilton, New York, and who, after his ordination at Petersboro, New York, was sent, under the auspices of the Home Mission society, to the then western State of Ohio, and through the influence of Rev. T. R. Cressy, of Columbus, came to Circleville, and took the oversight of the church, October, 1838, and remained with them fifteen months. A portion of this time he was joint pastor of the church at Frankfort, so giving each church but half the time preaching. A few were added by baptism, but several familes moving away, the church was much weakened.

The young church took hold of its work with zeal, and at a time when the question of anti-missions was agitating the churches throughout the State, took decided grounds in favor of missions, and the first Sabbath evening of each month was devoted to prayer and contribution to that object. The tenth day of November, 1838, was observed by them as a day of fasting and prayer; thus the work began in humble reliance on God. They were too poor to erect a house of worship, so they met in the octagonal court house, a portion of the time, and another portion in the Atheneum building and public school building. They were not left without a pastor when Mr. Brownsen went away, as Rev. John A. Peters had moved into the neighborhood, to be near his brother, G. M. Peters, and, though in feeble health, he undertook the pastoral care of the church, and preached, not only in the town, but at Grey's school house, five miles north of town, and at Mrs. Pancake's three miles west of town.

In September, 1840, they joined the Scioto association, and in May, of the next year, organized a Sunday school, which was not a common thing in those days, commencing with forty scholars, and soon increasing to seventy-five, a number which has not been greatly exceeded since. G. M. Peters was the superintendent. The pastor's health was gradually failing, so that the preaching and baptizing were mostly done by neighboring pastors. In November, 1841, the pastor died, greatly regretted by all the church. Shortly after his death, two of the neighboring pastors, W. D. Woodruff, of Frankfort, and T. R. Cressy, of Columbus, held a series of meetings that resulted in much good to the church, and ten persons were baptized, and at a communion season that followed, thirty-two persons sat down to the Lord's table together. The church was desirous of securing a pastor, and applied to a Rev. M. Wheaton, of Columbus, but failed to secure his services. Rev. (afterward Dr.) J. L. Moore visited the church and preached a few weeks, but not with a view to the pastorate. His labors were very acceptable, and several were added to the church. At the June meeting, a committee, consisting of G. M. Peters, A. King, J. H. Welsheimer and J. Haswell, was appointed to inquire into the expediency of building a house of worship. At about the same time Rev. Henry Billings was called to the pastorate, preaching two Sabbaths in the month. He remained with the church one year, and when he left, the church abandoned the idea of building a house of worship, though the committee had gone so far as to lease a lot for six years. The cause was in rather a discouraging state, and what made it still worse, they were unfortunate in calling a young man named Edward Lyons, and at his urgent request called a council to ordain him, February 21, 1844. He stayed with them but six months, and left them, weakened by his influence, which was not good. He was published in the Cross and Journal, by vote of the church.

The next year, in March, Rev. W. D. Woodruff became pastor, and the Sunday-school was revived, and E. P. Peters elected superintendent; but he did not hold the position long, for in November L. L. Woodruff was chosen to that office. At the end of two years the prospects of the church were so low that Mr. W. D. Woodruff resigned the pastorate to go to a more hopeful field. After this, for three years, no regular meetings were held. Still, a few members held on to the cause, and were not willing to give it up. In August, 1850, the few members came together at the house of J. H. Welsheimer where a vote was taken appointing Eli Todd, L. L. Woodruff, John H. Welsheimer and A. King a committee to purchase a lot on which to erect a house of worship. Mrs. Catharine Brower, of Pennsylvania, was here at the time, visiting her daughter, Mrs. Anna B. Darst, and took a lively interest in the work, and volunteered to raise funds among her friends east, which was greatly appreciated by the little church, for with that timely aid, and by borrowing fifty dollars, they were enabled to build the house in which they still worship: a small but comfortable house, twenty-five by fifty feet, which was dedicated October 19, 1851. Rev.—now Dr.—D. A. Randall was called to the pastorate, but after preaching six months he was obliged to give up the work on account of ill health. The church was loth to part with him, as his preaching and work were very acceptable, indeed, to all. Through Mr. Randall the church was induced to extend a call to Benjamin Bedell, a recent graduate of Granville college, who was invited to preach to them six months, with a view to final settlement. Mr. Bedell arrived in Circleville the last of January, 1853. Before the end of February it was deemed advisable to call a council to ordain him, which was done March 2, 1853, Rev. Dr. H. Davis, Rev. S. T. Griswold, Rev. W. D. Woodruff and Rev. D. A. Randall participating. This pastorate was the longest the church ever had, being three years and eight months. During that time the church enjoyed two revival seasons, and more than doubled its membership.

In the spring of 1855, after a very interesting work, in which the pastor was assisted by Rev. H. A. Brown, it was decided to proceed to put up a parsonage on the church lot. It was quite an undertaking for the church, but by much personal sacrifice, and with outside help, it was accomplished and the pastor moved into it on the third day of July, the same year. That was a very joyful period for the church, and it was hoped its dark days were over, but it was not be be so. The Scioto association met with the church that year, in August, and during the session of the association the pastor was laid aside by sickness from which he did not sufficiently recover to resume labor for several weeks, and when he did resume labor the interest had sensibly diminished. The heart of the young pastor was discouraged, but he did not decide to leave the field until September, 1856, when several families, that had been good helpers, having moved away, and the congregation being reduced to a very small number, the pastor gave in his resignation and went to Wilmington. The church was greatly enfeebled and disheartened, and suspended meetings, and for a period of sixteen years the church stood idle, only as it was rented to other denominations, who occupied it while they were building their own houses of worship. It was thus occupied by the Episcopal, English Lutherans and Evangelical churches. In June, 1872, Rev. J. Kyle, a missionary of the Scioto association visited the place and found the few old brethren that were left, together with quite a number who had moved in, ready to resume work, and as they could have preaching only occasionally, they chose Mr. A. C. Elster a leader of the meetings. Rev. Dr. S. Talbot, president of Dennison university, and Rev. A. J. Lyon, of Lancaster, preached for a few times till, in November, they called Rev. J. Chambers to preach for them half the time. There was no especial growth, but they kept together and sought to regain the ground that had been lost. They moved the house of worship to the side of the lot on which it stood and purchased an organ, so that, when Mr. Chambers left, after two years' labor, the church was in condition to go right forward, and they called Mr. J. Adams, just from Chicago Theological seminary, to the pastorate. In the meantime the house of worship had been repaired and gas fixtures introduced. Mr. Adams began his work in August, 1875, and was ordained the next month, September 16th, Rev. Dr. D. A. Randall, Rev. G. G. Harriman, Rev. E. W. Dannells, Rev. J. Chambers and Rev. W. W. Sawyer taking part in the services. The pastor addressed himself to the work before him with characteristic energy, and his work told for good. The cause rose sensibly under his ministration. The membership increased from twenty-seven to sixty-one during his three years and one month pastorate. When, at length, he felt compelled to resign and leave the field [September, 1878,] it was a great grief to many members of the church. The church then recalled Rev. B. Bedell, a former pastor, who returned to this, his first pastorate, and began his second term of service in October, 1878. The first work that was done was to repair the parsonage, so that it was made a very comfortable home for the pastor.

In this review of the forty years' history of the Baptist church of Circleville, we find that over twenty years of that time they had no pastor and no regular service. There have been connected with them, from first to last, two hundred and eight members. They have had nine pastors—I. K. Brownson, J. A. Peters, H. Billings, E. Lyons, W. D. Woodruff, D. A. Randall, B. Bedell, J. Chambers and J. Adams; four deacons—A. King, G. M. Peters, J. J. Bugh and F. L. Lemon; thirteen clerks—N. Newton, S. K. Greenleaf, E. Lamb, E. P. Peters, G.

Dalton, W. C. Gildersleeve, C. T. Emerson, L. L. Woodruff, W. H. H. Stone, W. H. C. Dodson, A. C. Elster, S. Ward and L. D. Lyon; seven Sunday-school superintendents—G. M. Peters, E. P. Peters, Dr. S. H. Potter, L. L. Woodruff, A. C. Elster, S. Ward and F. L. Lemon. For the year 1877 and the present year [1879] they have maintained mission Sunday-schools; of the school for the year 1877, which was located three miles in the country, L. D. Lyon was superintendent, and of the school established this year, in town, Dr. J. C. King is superintendent.

CENTRAL PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

In 1838, just after the disruption of the Presbyterian denomination, the Central Presbyterian congregration was formed. In the old church, known as the "First," the minister, Mr. Putnam, and a majority, voted to join the New School branch. They retained the old site and building. The minority withdrew peaceably and came down town to organize an Old School church—the one now called the "Central." Of the sixteen or seventeen persons who formed it, only one is now remaining. They held a meeting in "'Squire" Bell's parlor, in the house now owned by Mr. L. S. Scovil. Dr. James Hoge, of Columbus, organized them as a church. In various parlors they worshipped. It was "the church in the house." Out on one of the streets called East street, which started from the center of the town like the spokes from the hub of a wheel—for the town was circular—stood the old brick academy. Here, for a time, the Old School Presbyterians worshipped.

Rev. George Wells, a young man, became the first pastor. He was ordained and installed at a meeting held in the Lutheran church. The audiences increased, the house became too small, and the Rev. Mr. Roof, of the Lutheran church—a warm personal friend of Elder Matthew McCrea—tendered the use of the Lutheran church. For two years the congregation worshipped there every two weeks. Subsequently they rented a large room in the building called Olds' block—a room over the Wallace dry-goods store. The lower room was occupied as a liquor saloon. Hon. Samuel Galloway, one evening, beginning a temperance address in the church room above, rose and gravely said:

> "There's a Spirit above and a spirit below;
> The Spirit above is a Spirit divine—
> The spirit below is a spirit of wine."

But the people were not satisfied with a room merely; they wanted a house and home of their own for worship. Elder Matthew McCrea said he would build a church on his own lot, if they could not get one elsewhere. They leased ground where now is Wagner's grocery store, and reared a little frame church. A thankful company they were. They put a little bell up in the cupola, and elders and ladies' hands pulled that bell rope and rang the people to worship. A noted revival came upon them in that little house. But their five years' lease expired. Their house was purchased and moved across the street. It is now the hardware store of Mr. Ensworth. The congregation moved again into Olds' block, and worshipped in the lower room. Mr. Wells, their pastor, died, and Mr. McKennon became their next minister. Soon he was succeeded by Rev. Milton A. Sackett.

Mr. James McCoy donated to the church the lot of ground whereon their present edifice stands. A subscription of one thousand six hundred dollars was made, and the congregation began to build. Six thousand five hundred dollars were finally expended on the building. For two years the basement only was used for worship. Then the upper room was finished, and, in 1865, June 3d, the church was dedicated to the service of God. The ministers present, besides the pastor, were Rev. W. C. Anderson, D. D., of Chillicothe, Rev. Josiah D. Smith, of Columbus, and Rev. J. M. Lowrie, of Lancaster. The dedication sermon was by Mr. Smith; text—"We have thought of thy loving kindness, O Lord, in the midst of thy temple."

Mr. Sackett, the pastor, removed, and Rev. George L. Kalb, now of Bellfontaine, succeeded him for ten years.

In the autumn of 1864 Rev. William McMillan, the present pastor, assumed the charge. The congregation increased, and the Sabbath-school, under the superintendence of Mr. A. McCrea, so enlarged that there was not room enough in the lower chamber. It was the largest school in the synod of Columbus, Old School.

In January, 1869, the building was enlarged by twenty feet in length. In 1873 repairs again were needed, and the entire roof was removed, the walls heightened, and the present elegant architecture finished.

ST. JOSEPH'S (ROMAN CATHOLIC) CHURCH.

The first religious services held in this place, according to the forms of the Roman Catholic communion, were, in the spring of 1841, at the house of Mrs. Turner. The next were in the fall of the same year, at the house of Andrew Lynch.

The old church was situated on Franklin street, directly north of the spot where the first Presbyterian church now stands. The ground (which was purchased of Thomas Huston for a small sum) was partly covered by the ditch and embankments of the old circle. The people turned out en masse, Protestants as well as Catholics, to fill up the ditch and prepare the ground for the building. This was commenced in 1843, but not finished till 1846.

When this church was begun, there were only four permanent families connected with the society, viz.: Barnard Riley, Andrew Lynch, George Myers, and John McLane. A good many new families were brought in by the building of the first turnpike, which was commenced about this time. The parsonage, connected with the old church, was built in 1854, at a cost of about two thousand dollars. The whole was sold in 1868 for about two thousand five hundred dollars, and the price was put into the new church.

The ground for this fine brick edifice, which is situated on Mound street, was bought of Henry F. Page for about fourteen hundred dollars, and presented to the church by one of its most liberal benefactors, Edward Smith. The building was commenced in the summer of 1866, the foundation only being laid that year. It was enclosed and roofed the year following. Services were first held in it in 1868, although it was not then plastered. That work was done in 1869. The pews, altar, pulpit, etc., were put in in 1870, and finally, in 1874, it was brought to its present state of completion. The entire cost of the building was about fifteen thousand dollars, which was raised by the liberal contributions of many outside of the church, as well as by the self-denying liberality of all those in it.

The elegant and commodious parsonage, adjacent to the church, was built in 1871 or '72, at the cost of about twenty-five hundred dollars.

The priests who have ministered to this church are named (in the order of their service) as follows:

Father Young, Father Junker (both of whom afterwards became bishops), P. Tschieder, Michael Ford, I. N. Thisse, I. D. Duffy, Edward Fitzgerald, C. L. Pindar, Sergius Stchoulepnikoff, A. M. Marzeand, D. B. Cull, and A. O. Walker, who is the present incumbent.

THE SECOND BAPTIST CHURCH (AFRICAN)

was organized in the year 1856, by the Rev. William Norman, with three communion members, namely, Lucy Winters, Enoch Weaver, and Sarah Hollinsworth. For some time their meetings were held in the houses of the members, but before the first year was ended they had purchased a lot for a church, with a dwelling house on it, which was used for their religious services till 1869. This lot is on the corner of Water and Mill streets. It was bought for six hundred dollars, and was paid for by the end of the fourth year.

Their present substantial brick edifice was built in 1869, at a cost of four thousand five hundred dollars. Quite a heavy debt was incurred in the building, which was secured by a mortgage on the property; but this debt, also, was wiped out by the end of the fourth year, and they are now even with the world, as every church ought to be.

The succession in the pastorate is as follows: William Norman, Grayson Jones, Elder Day, from Springfield; Jesse Meeks, Andrew Hunt, Wm. Norman (second term), Andrew Hunt (second term), Wallace Shelton, and William Nash, whose ministry began October 23, 1878, and who is still serving. The membership, at the present time, numbers one hundred and twenty-nine.

We cannot help thinking that this is a very creditable record for a people who have so much to struggle against as the Africans have in this country.

William Norman, the patriarch of this little flock, has long enjoyed the confidence and esteem of this community. He is a mulatto, with almost Caucasian features, and as he evidently does not regard cleanliness as the chief of the moral virtues, he might pass for a European of rather untidy habits. He was born near Richmond, Virginia, about the year 1815, his father being a slave and his mother a free woman. At the age of eight years he was taken to Tennessee and "bound out" to a certain Dr. Calhoun. Being cruelly treated, he ran away from his master at about eighteen years of age, and, after passing through the usual experiences of a fugitive slave, he found himself, in 1833, in Chillicothe. There he remained till 1856. About the year 1841 he became converted and was baptized. Two years later, having "picked up" considerable education, and being somewhat gifted in discourse, he was ordained to the ministry of the Baptist communion by Elder W. Shelton. He settled here in 1857, having been here a year before in the capacity of missionary, and assisted, as above stated, in the organization of the church of which he was the first pastor and has always been the main pillar. He has acted as the financial agent of the congregation in the purchase of their property and in the building of their church; has raised most of the subscriptions collected here and elsewhere to aid in paying their debts, and has contributed largely from his own earnings for the same object. Even when acting as pastor of the church, he has always followed some temporal calling. Like the early apostles, he believes in immersion and deals in fish. By industry and the closest economy, he has amassed a nice little property of about four thousand dollars. Long may he live to enjoy the fruits of his labor.

CALVARY CHURCH OF THE EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION.

This church was organized by the Ohio conference, in 1869, under the pastoral charge of Rev. Wm. Whittington, missionary. In 1871, Rev. Jesse Lerch succeeded Rev. W. Whittington, and labored for three years with success and acceptability. In May, 1874, Rev. Vandersall became the pastor, and labored for three years with success. In April, 1877, Rev. S. S. Condo was stationed in charge of the church, and is now spending his third year successfully.

Since the organization of this church it has continued to prosper, year after year, and is the most prosperous church in the city. At the close of the two years' labor of its first pastor, its membership was sixty-two. Its present membership is two hundred. Its sustains a Sunday-school of two hundred and sixty scholars, and a Young Mens' Christian association. Pastors cannot remain longer than three years, according to the laws of the church.

CIRCLEVILLE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.*

Previous to 1820, according to the recollection of the oldest inhabitants, all the schools held in Pickaway county were sustained entirely by subscription, and the only branches taught were reading, writing and arithmetic. The school-houses, even in Circleville, were log houses of a single room. These were made comfortable by seaming the cracks with tempered clay, and light, by pasting oiled paper over the latticing in the window-holes, cut through the unhewn logs. Slabs, on rude legs, supplied sittings, and other slabs along the walls, supported on pins fixed at a proper slope in the logs, beneath the windows, were the convenient "writing benches" of that day.

Dilworth's spellers, readers and arithmetic, were among the first text-books used here, unchanged from before the adoption of our federal currency. The first reading classes began with the New Testament. The introduction, later, of Webster's speller and the Columbian orator, helped greatly to a more definite grading of classes. Lindley Murray's works afterwards gave an impetus to improved teaching.

Johnston Hunter was a successful teacher of this earlier time, down to 1818. He taught in a log house, of the kind described, just south of the present market space. In another similar building, not far south of the present High street building, Hans Hamilton kept school. Hugh Hannagan is spoken of as a teacher of excellent parts, but as often partaking too freely of the "liquid hospitality" of the country.

Marked improvement in the schools took place after 1820, when teachers of a superior class, and of professional pride, were employed. Of these, we name Hon. Joseph Olds, Dr. Edson B. Olds, Dr. M. Brown and Hon. J. C. Groom.

No common schools, entirely free, can be said to have been established here until after the passage of the school law of 1838. Soon after, the Little academy was built by the district. It stood beside the Circleville academy, the best private school here at that time, or afterwards, and consisted of a single room. By the boys who went to the pay-school, it was mockingly denominated the "kitchen school." Pine desks ran around the walls, behind which, raised a step or two above the floor, sat the larger scholars, while the little ones were seated on benches ranged in front upon the floor, and facing the middle of the room. Other district schools were held in rooms about town wherever they could be had.

Till 1849, male teachers were mainly employed, at about twenty dollars per month. The county examiners tested them by law, only in the three R's, but added their qualifications in other branches if they desired to teach them. For such extra teaching the scholars were required to pay.

There were three directors elected by the people. George Gearhart, of whom mention will again be made, was a director from 1838 to 1849. The school funds were derived from the State school tax creating a State fund of two hundred thousand dollars; from township school lands, and from interest on proceeds of "section sixteen." No special provision was made for the books or tuition of indigent pupils. The charity of the benevolent afforded some help of this kind. Judge H. N. Hedges, George Gearhart, esq., and the Ohio Common School Director, conducted in 1838, by Hon. Samuel Lewis, first State school commissioner, are the sources of the facts narrated under this topic.

[This account of the early schools of Circleville is so meagre that the editors feel bound to add the few facts they have been able to glean in regard to them.

In the Circleville Herald and Ohio Olive Branch, bearing date September 11, 1830, we find the advertisement of a "female seminary," taught by the Misses Streeter, who, having rented two rooms in Mr. McCracken's brick row of buildings, and fitted up the same, were prepared to teach all the branches usually taught in female schools. The terms of tuition were certainly sufficiently moderate, varying from two to four dollars per quarter.

The facilities for obtaining an education must have been ample in those early times; for we find that, eight years later, when Atwater's history of Ohio was published, the town of Circleville contained (as stated in that work) "four churches and about twelve schools—one or two, for young ladies, deserving great praise, and receiving it."

Ten years later, that is, in the spring of 1848, Mr. C. C. Neibling, a native of Lancaster, Ohio, came to this place and opened a select school for boys only, under the patronage of some of the best citizens of the town. His school consisted of about forty scholars, the maximum number that he would receive. His charges were four dollars per scholar, for each quarter of sixty days, payable in advance. The enterprise continued to flourish very successfully for about four years, or until the union schools were inaugurated. The free system soon taught the professor that his "occupation was gone," and he therefore left the profession and went into other business. He was a good mathematician, a laborious teacher, and very pains-taking with his pupils. As a consequence, his school achieved a high degree of success. He still resides in Circleville, and is now the city engineer.

In an old paper of 1850 we find an advertisement of the "Circleville female seminary," taught by Benjamin M. Ludden and wife, with three other teachers. These were succeeded, in the same year, by the Rev. W. S. Spaulding and wife, with two other teachers.

In the same paper of about a year later, we find a notice of a select school taught by Lucy M. Atwater, who was afterward associated in the same school with R. A. Foster.

We are painfully aware that this is a very imperfect showing of the early educational history of Circleville; but it is all we can find room for, and, at the same time, insert, as we desire to do, the full and complete history of the graded schools which follows.—EDS.]

On September 11, 1849, John Cradlebaugh, S. A. Moore, Joseph G. Doddridge, Jacob Rutter, Chester Olds, and seven others, issued a call to the qualified electors of the town of Circleville to assemble on the 22d prox. and "then and there to vote, by ballot, for or against the adoption of an act for the better regulation of the public schools, etc., passed by the general assembly of Ohio on the twenty-first of February, 1840." Ninety-seven ballots were cast on the day designated, of which "eighty-seven were for school law, nine against school law, and one blank;" whereupon the act of assembly aforesaid was declared adopted by the town of Circleville.

On the fourth day of October following, six directors of public schools were elected. This board, in the succeeding December, resolved that it was "inexpedient to open free schools in this district until such time as the board of directors can procure or build a suitable house to accommodate the scholars."

During the two or three months succeeding the passage of this resolution, a somewhat sharp division of views seems to have arisen, in and out of the board, as to whether it were better to erect a small school-house in each ward, suitable to accommodate its scholars, or to "erect one school-house in this district of sufficient size

DAVID B. WAGNER.

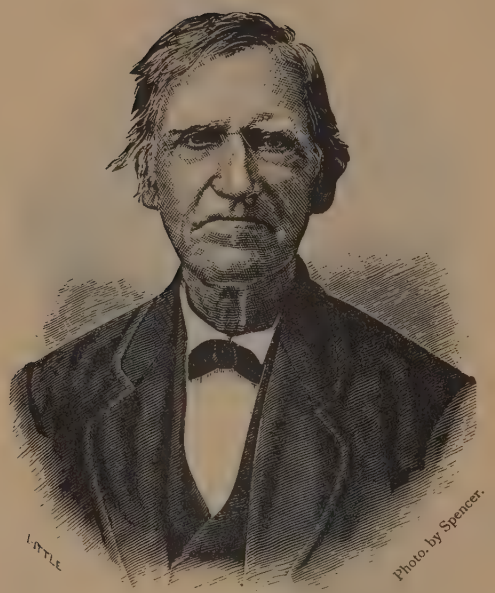
The life of the subject of this brief biography illustrates the success that attends quiet, honest endeavor and well-directed industry, without the assistance of early advantages or the aid of particularly favorable chance or circumstance.

David B. Wagner was the son of Jacob and Mary (Bryant) Wagner, natives of Pennsylvania, and among the earliest settlers of Greenfield township, Fairfield county, Ohio. They were the parents of ten children, five boys and five girls, of whom the subject of this sketch was the first-born. Fairfield county was the place of his nativity, and the time, November 14, 1822. He passed his boyhood days in the manner common to the youth of the farm, and attended the common district schools of his neighborhood, receiving the best instruction attainable at that time and in the locality where he lived, but not enjoying the advantages of an advanced education, which most of the young are now offered. He acquired, however, through his own endeavors and by close application and diligence, a fair knowledge of books, which he has, during his whole life, been supplementing with what he has obtained from reading and observation. In the early years of his manhood he taught school eight terms—three before and five after his marriage—giving very general satisfaction. His regular occupation, however, was farming, and he followed it until his removal to his present place of residence, in 1854.

Mr. Wagner married, January 19, 1845, Leah (daughter of the famous Evangelical preacher, the Rev. John Dreisbach), who is still living. The offspring of this union were four children, all of whom are living except one. The eldest, John D., was born January 23, 1846—married Elizabeth Feller, and is now living in Hancock county, Ohio; Jacob was born July 25, 1847, and is living with his parents, in Circleville; as is also Jennie, the youngest, born September 18, 1859; Mary Francis, the third child, was born March 25, 1851, and died September 6, 1852.

Mr. Wagner's life, since 1854, has been identified with Circleville, and he has been, during all the years that have passed subsequent to that date, one of the town's representative business men and substantial citizens. He commenced his mercantile career immediately on coming to Circleville, in the dry goods and grocery business, as a member of Einsel, Wagner & Co. Louis Einsel was the senior member, and the junior, Jacob E. Dreisbach. Mr. Wagner remained in this firm, which did business on West Main street, where Joseph Wallace now is, until September 5, 1859, when he opened, in partnership with Martin E. Dreisbach, a grocery store. When this partnership was dissolved Mr. Wagner conducted the business alone until 1865, when he associcted with himself Andrew Nonnamaker, under the firm name of D. B. Wagner & Co. Just at this time the war coming to a close, prices went suddenly down, and, in common with most of the merchants of the country, Mr. Wagner suffered a loss. Although he had just associated with himself a partner, he bore alone, by his own voluntary proposal, the entire loss occasioned by the falling of values on goods which they had in stock, previously invoiced. After the partnership of Mr. Wagner and Mr. Nonnamaker had existed four years it was dissolved by mutual consent, and Mr. Wagner took into his business Mr. B. H. Moore, who remained with him one year. At the expiration of that period Mr. Wagner and his son John formed a partnership, and remained in business together five years. After that the firm name became D. B. Wagner & Co., the company being Jacob Rife, and, as a silent partner, M. E. Dreisbach. The business was continued for five years under this name and style, and then changed to that which at present exists—D. B. Wagner & Rife. Mr. Wagner, ever since his first business partnership, has been, through the several changes, the senior member of the different firms, and has furnished the greater part of the capital used. He has been popular as a tradesman, and successful in his business. During all of the years since he began, Mr. Wagner has given the business he has been engaged in his personal attention and supervision. He has taken no part in public affairs, except that which every good citizen does, and has not been connected actively with the political movements of the times, though he has had much interest in them, and been an intelligent observer of men and measures. He originally was a Democrat, but left that party at the time of the free soil issue, and afterwards became a Republican. His vote has since been, on all questions of National or State importance, with that party.

Mr. Wagner's religious affiliation is with the Evangelical Association. He has been for forty years a member of this church, and is one of its class-leaders. He is a prominent Sunday-school worker, and has been superintendent of the Calvary Sunday-school of the Evangelical Association ever since its organization—nearly ten years. It is not inappropriate to add, in this connection, that this school was organized by Mr. Wagner as a mission school. He expected and endeavored al secure assistance in the labor and expense of conducting it, but was unsuccessful, and not wishing to have the project prove a failure, continued it alone. He purchased the library at his own expense, and virtutoy gave the entire support that the school received in its inception and infancy. It is now in a very flourishing condition.



GEORGE HITLER,

son of George and Susannah (Gay) Hitler, was born in Somerset county, Pennsylvania, September 27, 1798. His father was a native of Maryland, but removed with his parents to Franklin county, Pennsylvania, when young; and in 1793, having then a family of wife and two children, settled in Somerset county, in the same State, where the subject of our sketch was born, as already stated. In April, 1799, Mr. Hitler sr., emigrated to Ohio. His family made the journey down the Ohio river, to the mouth of the Scioto, on a flat-boat, Mr. Hitler himself bringing through a number of horses for himself and others. From the mouth of the Scioto the journey was with team and wagon, the wagon being said to have been the second that ever came up the Scioto valley.

At this time there were but two log houses in Chillicothe, and the country was almost a complete wilderness.

Mr. Hitler, sr., settled on the lower plains, in Pickaway township, but subsequently located on Scippo creek, on land then owned by Benjamin Duncan. In 1804 he bought and settled in Washington township, section thirty-three, where he died, April 2, 1818, and his wife, September 16, 1848.

In 1819 George Hitler, in connection with his brother Jacob, purchased a quarter section of land in the south part of Washington township, which land is now owned by his son, Thomas L. Hitler. Upon this farm they raised wheat, which they manufactured into flour and shipped on flat-boats to New Orleans. This they found far more remunerative than to sell the grain at home, which brought at one time only twenty-five cents per bushel. The first trip was made by Jacob, in 1819, and each of the brothers subsequently made five separate trips, covering a period of ten years. George Hitler, on one occasion, was fifty days in going from Boggsville to New Orleans. He returned on a steamer, and was about three months in making the round trip.

Mr. Hitler was married June 14, 1829, to Hannah Ludwig, daughter of Thomas and Catharine Ludwig. He settled on his first purchase, and resided there until 1838, when he located where he now lives.

Mr. Hitler's occupation has been that of a farmer, and his career has been a very successful one, owning at this time about one thousand acres of land. While practicing a wise economy in the expenditure of his means, he has always been liberal in his support of every object which he considered worthy of it.

Mr. Hitler has reached the good old age of eighty-one, and few, if any, of the inhabitants of Pickaway county can date, as he can, their first residence here back to 1799. Save a little rheumatism, his health is almost as good as it ever was. He is a man of energy, of character, and of strict integrity.

His wife died July 3, 1863. They had seven children, as follows: Eliza, born July 4, 1830—died August 21, 1831; Mary, born October 30, 1831—married Daniel Hosler, and is now deceased; Catharine, born December 16, 1835—became the wife of Amos Hoffman, and died November 25, 1858; Eleanor, born November 22, 1833—died January 21, 1837; Susannah, born March 29, 1840, is the wife of Alexander Ross, and resides in Indiana; Thomas L., born April 4, 1842—married, December 14, 1876, Martha A. Lindsey, and lives in Washington township; George W. married, February 21, 1878, Ida Lutz, and occupies the home farm.

and capacity to accommodate all the children of the town." Finally, it was decided to hold a meeting of the people at the court house, March 18, 1850, to decide by ballot "for or against levying a tax to build a school-house." Three hundred and eighty votes were polled; one hundred and sixty were for tax and two hundred and twenty against tax, being a majority of sixty against the tax. This result, so far as the writer has been able to ascertain, did not spring at all from opposition to taxation for the support of free schools, but entirely from opposition to the evident purpose of the board to build but one house in a central location. It was deemed by the stronger party impracticable, if not absurd, to attempt to gather six to eight hundred children into one edifice for daily instruction. So many could not be profitably and healthfully provided for under one roof, nor could there be efficient government of such masses on the school grounds. Other reasons, no doubt, of a local nature, operated to strengthen the popularity of the decentralizing policy of the opposition.

Determined in their original purpose, the board now took measures to enlighten the people on this question. In May, of the same year, William C. Taylor and George Gearhart were selected by the board to visit Massillon, Akron, Cincinnati, and other towns and cities, for the purpose of "examining school-houses, and any and all matters connected therewith." Besides, Dr. D. A. Lord, then superintendent of the union schools of Columbus, was invited to address the citizens of Circleville, at the Lutheran church, on education and the organization of public schools under the law of 1849.

Messrs. Taylor and Gearhart returned from their tour of the cities full of enthusiasm in behalf of the union school-house plan, and armed with facts and figures which wrought a speedy change in the public mind. Again, on the tenth of June, 1850, an election was held at the court house to decide "the levying of a tax of nine thousand dollars, to be called for as follows, to-wit: three thousand dollars in one year, three thousand dollars in two years, and three thousand dollars in three years, to enable the board of education to purchase ground and build a school-house." The motion before the board, calling for such vote, further proposed that, in the event of an approving vote, "Messrs. W. W. Bierce and George Gearhart should be a committee to purchase of the heirs of E. Everts their out-lot (known as Everts' Hill) at a price not to exceed eight hundred dollars, and also of John Irwin and widow Darst portions of their in-lots, adjoining said out-lots, for an entrance to the same."

The result of the election was very gratifying to the enlightened and public-spirited men, who, for nearly a year, had used every honorable endeavor to establish in Circleville as excellent a system of graded public schools as existed anywhere in the State. A majority of one hundred and seventeen votes decided in favor of levying the tax. The Everts property was promptly secured of O. E. Niles and others (heirs of E. Everts), and also the in-lots alluded to above.

A commemorative word should be added with regard to this Everts' Hill property. Mr. E. Everts was, for many years before this period, an earnest and successful school teacher of this district. In a log house of two rooms, an upper and a lower, standing near the old oak just east of the present Everts building, he held a popular school. Many of our older citizens bear grateful testimony to the unwavering zeal he showed in behalf of the establishment in Circleville and throughout the State of a graded public school system, supported liberally by direct tax, and free to all of school age in each district. Though this property was not large, yet he determined, if such a system could be established in his day, to donate this hill property to the town as a site. His views were in advance of his time. In his will, this out-lot of nearly four acres was to be sold by the heirs to the school district, if devoted forever to educational purposes, for the nominal sum of one thousand dollars. The heirs, in the true spirit of the testator, offered it to the board for eight hundred dollars, though at the time it would have yielded several thousands in town lots.

Besides the sum of nine thousand dollars provided for by tax, the treasurer of the board, Col. S. A. Moore, reported having received, up to January 14, 1851, from district and township treasurers, and from State school fund, in full, one thousand four hundred and sixty-one dollars.

Early in January, 1851, Messrs. William C. Taylor and Stanley Cook submitted a plan for a school-house "to be known by the name of Union school-house," which was unanimously adopted. Contracts were at once made (as far as practicable, with the mechanics of Pickaway county) for the material and building of the Union school-house, and Thomas Pedrick was appointed superintendent to oversee its construction.

The old district school-house, called the Little academy, standing beside the Circleville academy, near what is now Watt street, between Court and Pickaway, was sold, with all its appurtenances, at auction. Still further funds were raised by increasing the annual levy beyond the amount necessary to meet the regular expenditures for schools when opened, and by the issue of bonds payable after certain dates, with interest at from eight to ten per cent.

The building moved rapidly forward to completion, and was ready for occupancy in November, 1852.

I transcribe from the Ohio Journal of Education for 1853 the following account of this new edifice. The notice in the Journal is accompanied with an excellent full-page cut of the building and grounds:

"THE CIRCLEVILLE UNION SCHOOL-HOUSE.

"This building, which is pleasantly situated on a lot of four acres, is ninety-six feet long by sixty-nine feet wide. It is three stories high above the basement, and contains fifteen school-rooms. Connected with each room is a closet, which is furnished with a wash-stand, looking-glass, combs, and all the paraphernalia of a dressing-room.

"Neat and commodious apartments are fitted up in the basement for the residence of a janitor.

"Two of Chilson's No. 6 furnaces are placed in the basement, which afford ample means for heating the house. In each hall is a large cooler, which is constantly supplied with fresh water. We noticed, among other things, on looking over a neat pamphlet of sixteen pages, giving a very clear account of the organization of this promising school, that a janitor is employed, who has entire charge of the furnaces, keeping the rooms clean, providing water, ringing the bell, etc.

This is as it should be. It is the poorest kind of economy to compel teachers or scholars to make fires and sweep the school-rooms, though no better arrangement can be expected till the plan of erecting large buildings is adopted.

"The cost of the house and grounds, when the latter is ornamented, will be about thirty thousand dollars."

Three of the lower rooms were furnished with long pine benches, divided into what are known as box seats; the boxes constituting the partitions between scholars along the settee, and serving as deposits for books and slates. The remaining rooms—as many as were needed at first, nine in number—were supplied with double desks of walnut, the best of the day. The lower middle room on the first floor was used as an exercise room for the primaries, especially in unpleasant weather. The middle room of the third floor was used for morning exercises, and was long denominated the chapel.

The school revenues were derived from the State common-school fund, from interest on school-lands, or "section sixteen," from foreign tuition fund, and from an annual tax levied each year on the school district, and called special tuition fund.

Besides the names given as signers of the call to adopt for Circleville the law of 1849, there are several others worthy of honorable mention, because of their activity in securing the adoption of the union-school system, and in consummating this movement by the completion of the noble edifice described, and by the admirable organization of schools adopted as soon as the rooms were thrown open to the scholars of District No. three. Such a list must at least include William C. Taylor, first president of the board; Col. S. A. Moore, first treasurer; W. W. Bierce, George Gearhart, George W. Myers, and Dr. Wayne Griswold, president of the board for four years from 1850.

At a meeting of the school board held in May, 1852, Messrs. Griswold, Bierce and Moore were appointed a committee to secure, by correspondence or visitation, a superintendent and other teachers to take charge of the public schools. This committee reported at the August meeting that they had visited Cincinnati, Columbus, and other places, and had attended the teachers' convention at Sandusky, and that they felt full confidence in reporting the name of John Lynch, of Ashland, as one well qualified to act as superintendent of the Circleville public schools. The report was accepted, and John Lynch was unanimously chosen as the principal of said schools, at one thousand dollars per annum.

It was resolved on this occasion "that the teachers to be employed in the union school shall he one superintendent, with one male assistant and eleven female assistants; and that in the selection of teachers by this board preference shall be given, other qualifications being equal, to those who intend to make the business of teaching a permanent employment." A board of examiners was also appointed, consisting of John Lynch, Chauncey N. Olds, and H. N. Bishop.

The schools were opened on the 22d of November, 1852, with the twelve assistant teachers.

In October, Mr. Lynch, by direction of the board, prepared and reported a system of rules for the government of the schools, course of study, and a list of text-books. These regulations, but slightly modified, and with a few additions, remain in force to this day.

III. GROWTH OF THE SYSTEM.

I present herewith, in tabular form, the more important statistics as far as they can now be obtained by diligent research, of the first year of the schools, ending June, 1853; of the third year, ending June, 1855, when the system had been thoroughly tested under Mr. Lynch's superior management, and of every tenth year thereafter:

	1853.	1855.	1865.	1875.
Number of pupils enumerated	1201	1292	1800	1903
Number of pupils enrolled	845	813	875	1300
Average daily attendance	600	532	650	803
Number of teachers	12	13	15	25
Number of school rooms	15	15	16	24
Number of grades or departments	4	4	5	5
Number of weeks in session	28	40	40	40
Amouns paid teachers	$3216	$3466	$6910	$10917
Total expendisures	....	....	12597	14003
Value of school property	45000	45000	45000	80000

The public schools reached at once a marked degree of popularity, which they have steadily maintained. The Circleville academy and all other private schools were closed in 1852. They have never been re-opened, nor have other pay schools gained foothold since. All classes, without distinction of politics, religion, or wealth, have freely patronized the public schools, and fostered them by the election of directors who have labored wisely and disinterestedly in the discharge of their responsible trust.

IV. IMPROVEMENT OF THE SYSTEM.

Before the close of Mr. Lynch's supervision, beginning Latin and algebra were introduced into the ninth year of the A grammar grade, and under Mr. Barney, United States history became a required study in the eighth year, and physical geography in the ninth. In 1873, superintendent Smart removed the Latin of senior grammar to first year of high school. At this time, the sexes were seated in different rooms in the high school and grammar grades.

Several changes in the course of study and text-books were effected during the administration of Mr. Smart. He had a text-book on English grammar first begun in the junior instead of the senior grammar, and language lessons in the grades below. Mitchell's geographies were supplanted by the eclectic series; oral geography took the place of the introductory book in the primary grade, and the text-book was begun in the intermediate, to be completed in the grammar. Oral instruction in numbers was substituted in the first three years for Ray's earlier book, and Ray's intellectual and third part begun respectively in the fourth and sixth years.

The quadrennial report, in reference to music, issued by C. S. Smart, in 1874, says: "In 1870, the board employed a special teacher of music, who, each week, gave a lesson of one hour to each room of the departments above the primary. Thus music continued to be taught in each white school. It was considered an optional study, and but one text-book was used from the intermediate through the ninth year.

"The rudiments of penmanship," says the quadrennial report, "are taught in the lowest grades by the use

ELIZABETH C. DARST,

Editress of the Circleville Herald, and a sketch of whose ancestry appears elsewhere, was born and educated in Circleville, being valedictorian of the high school, class of 1865. From that time until she assumed the editorial and financial charge of the Herald, Miss Darst was a constant contributor to the press of Circleville, and her poems, over the signature of "Kenneth," have been copied from their columns, and from the Standard of the Cross, The Modern Argo, and other papers into the leading literary journals of New York, Philadelphia, and cities of Canada. The Record of the Year, a magazine devoted to gathering the brightest articles from the newspapers to give them a permanent form, has included many of Miss Darst's productions in its pages.

As a journalist Miss Darst has endeavored to do her work thoroughly, to make a newspaper which should be interesting and reliable, and to ask no favors or concessions simply because it was the work of a lady. She was the special correspondent of, and not an infrequent writer of longer letters to, the Cincinnati Enquirer for a couple of years, and is at present employed by the Cincinnati Commercial. She has also been a contributor to the Columbus Herald, and other papers of the capital city. Editorial paragraphs from the Circleville Herald have been copied frequently by the press of the larger cities, and the financial plank of the Herald's platform —"there is no honest way to get a dollar but to earn one, and the dollar so earned should be so good a dollar that it buys a dollar's worth the world over"—went the rounds of the New York, Chicago, and Cincinnati dailies.

Pages might be filled with the always cordial, but sometimes amusing, allusions of the editors of this State to the novel claimant for fraternal honors, but the sum of them may be given in the appreciative words of the Springfield Republic: "If any one questions a woman's ability to run a newspaper, the answer is, Miss Lillie Darst."

of slates and pencils. Copy-books, pens and ink are not used until the last term of the fourth year. The teachers are required to give instruction each day as it is needed."

On the opening of the new High street building, under the supervision of M. H. Lewis, in the spring of 1875, the secondaries were increased from four to six, the primaries from three to six, and, at the close of the school year, the primaries were increased to eight, and the ninth year of the senior grammar became the first year of the high school, while the sexes, heretofore separate, were seated in the same rooms in the grammar and high school grades.

During the same period (since February, 1875), the word and phonic method was adopted for beginners in the lowest primary. Very much less was made, through the three lower departmets, of oral and concert spelling, and more of written spelling and individual drill. Each scholar was required to keep lists of his misspelled words and undergo a drill upon them at the close of the week. The use of McGuffey's speller was dropped from the fourth year to the eighth, and the spelling of all words used, in reader and other recitations, in every grade, required, and examinations held upon them.

Music was also placed upon a different footing in the fall of 1875. The single bulky and ungraded volume formerly in use was superseded by Jepson's graded music readers, the first book being introduced in the fourth year. Oral instruction was begun in the first year. The study was made obligatory in all except the grammar grades, and lessons of from fifteen to twenty minutes each were given daily by the special and regular teachers, alternately. The same plan was carried out in the colored as in the white schools.

In the third term of 1875, a special teacher in writing was employed. Slate writing, with ruled lines, was begun in the first term of the first year, followed, in the next, by lead pencil writing. The copy-book was begun in the second year, and pen and ink, with advanced copy-books, in the third year. The special and regular teachers alternate in charge of classes in both white and colored schools. It has added greatly to the efficiency of the schools, in this branch, that about the same time with these changes, the board determined to supply the common schools with slate and lead pencils, pen-holders and pens, and exercise paper.

Except the German, adopted as an elective study in the last two years of the high school, taught by the regular teachers, no facilities were afforded for the pursuit of this language by the large number of pupils of German parentage or extraction in the schools. The fall term of 1875 opened with ample provision made for the study of German in the ten upper schools, beginning with the junior secondaries. A special teacher—a lady of German parentage, thoroughly educated—gives daily instruction to all in these schools whose parents wish them to take German in addition to the regular English course. The school exercises are so arranged that the German teacher can have her classes in the several rooms during the general study hour. Over two hundred scholars are now (December, 1875,) under such instruction.

It is worthy of remark, that successive examinations evidence no falling off in the scholarship of those who pursue this additional study, while there has been a marked gain in facility of expression and quickness of parts.

Examinations of pupils of all grades during M. Lynch's supervision were conducted by him orally, at the close of each term. These examinations, in connection with the average of daily recitations, determined the advancement of the pupils. Mr. Barney continued these oral examinations, but under the charge of several teachers, and made them occasions of special public interest, on which great numbers attended to witness the exercises. These tests, averaged with the daily records, fixed the success or failure of pupils.

Until 1872, semi-yearly examinations, partly oral and partly written, of the several classes of the common schools were held by Mr. Smart. From 1872, on to the close of his administration, in January, 1875, written examinations for the purpose of reclassification were conducted by the teachers in all the rooms above the primary grades, at the close of each term. Except for the high school, all the questions for the classes were made out by the superintendent. Each scholar wrote out the answers, on paper of his own furnishing, with lead pencil. The teacher examined and passed upon the papers, which were then folded and sent to the superintendent's office. Advancement was then based upon the general average made up from the daily class markings, the examinations and the deportment. Monthly examinations for trial were held at the option of the teachers, who furnished their own questions, and took no pains to preserve the papers.

Since the spring term of 1875, Mr. Lewis has made monthly examinations, written with pen and ink upon uniform paper, furnished by the board, obligatory on all the scholars above the third year of the primary grades, including the high school. The questions are all made out in the office of the superintendent, and handed to teachers on the day of examination. The fall term opens in the common schools with a hurried review of the previous year's work. They are then pressed on in advance work, upon which monthly or six weeks' tests are taken until the close of the second term, when a public examination takes place. For a searching inspection of this public test of all the schools, together with the modes of recitation held for the four or six weeks previously, special committees of capable citizens, interested in school work, are appointed by the board. During the third term, the monthly examinations are kept up, and, at the final one, the test covers the year's progress. Promotions are then based upon the average of all the examinations of the year.

No note is now made of the daily recitations, the incentive of the coming examination being a sufficient spur to steady daily progress, while the teacher, uninterrupted before the class, is free to severely sift the knowledge gained, to amplify and illustrate the points not clearly comprehended, and to block out the ensuing tasks. The papers, faced with the questions, properly labeled, neatly bound, and with all the answers graded in the margin, are sent to the superintendent's office for final revision, together with a report in full of each scholar's per cents. in the several studies, and his average in all.

In regard to the times of promotion, Mr. Smart says: "The nearest approach I have been able to make to such a classification as will accommodate the greatest number, without making the manipulation of classes too cumbrous, has been to reclassify three times in the year, and to promote, at any time, pupils whom, on examination, I found prepared."

Mr. Lewis, on finding that these term promotions were, for several reasons, with so limited a corps of teachers, thwarting rather than accomplishing the objects for which graded schools were organized, returned as speedily as possible to the custom of yearly promotions, except for the first two or three years. The increased number of primaries enabled him to make this exception without disturbing the classification in the grades above. Honorable promotion of scholars who outstrip their fellows, and trial promotions of the large number of irregulars, made such by field-work or sickness, bridge quite safely all the difficulties of exceptional cases in grading.

Improvements in school accommodations, buildings, etc., have been made since 1853. The original building, named the "Everts," in the spring of 1875, contains now sixteen school-rooms, with sittings for eight hundred and fifty pupils, the laboratory, and superintendent's office. It has been furnished throughout since June, 1875, with the best single desks. The school board has, of late years, added liberally, as needed, new and improved apparatus and chemical stores.

In 1871, the board completed the Ohio street building, for colored pupils, at a cost of seven thousand dollars. It is a fine brick structure, with ample hall and two rooms. There are sittings for one hundred and fifty pupils. The rooms are furnished with excellent double desks, with charts, globes, and wall maps. The site commands a wide sweep of the Scioto valley and river.

In the spring of 1875, the High street building was completed and furnished with single desks, giving three hundred and fifty sittings. The edifice is architecturally beautiful, tastefully, yet substantially, finished in every part, and pleasantly located. It has a large entrance hall, from which the six school-rooms are easy of access; three of these opening upon the first floor and three upon the second. Three hot-air furnaces heat the rooms comfortably in the coldest weather, while the Reutan mode of ventilation, on the exhaust principle, keeps the atmosphere perfectly healthful. The total expenditure on this building and surroundings has been upwards of twenty-five thousand dollars.

William Doane, esq., treasurer of the board for fourteen years past, and chairman of the committee on buildings, furnished the design of these recent structures and supervised their erection.

V. ORGANIZATION OF THE HIGH SCHOOL.

The high school was organized at the same time with the union school, November 22, 1852.

Few changes of importance have been made in the course of study planned by Mr. Lynch and adopted by the board of education in 1852. The four years' course of the high school includes the following studies: Algebra, physiology, zoology, botany, geometry, natural philosophy, chemistry, rhetoric, English, Greek, and Latin history, trigonometry, physical geography, astronomy, geology, English literature, mental and moral science, political economy, Latin, Greek, German, and French.

About twenty pupils have gone from this school to college, although many more than that number have been adequately prepared. The first class graduated in 1858. There were five in the class. Sixteen classes have since graduated, with an aggregate of one hundred and twenty-nine members. Twenty-three of these were young gentlemen, and one hundred and six young ladies. The number of scholars in the high school in 1855 was eighty-six; in 1865, eighty-three, and in the fall term of 1875, eighty-nine. The changes made in conditions of admission will be found stated at length under the fourth topic.

The following are the high school principals, and term of service since the organization of the school:

	Employed.	Resigned.
E. M. Cotton	November, 1852	June, 1859
John P. Patterson	September, 1859	June, 1860
D. N. Kinsman	September, 1860	Mar., 1863
J. M. Atwater	April, 1863	June, 1863
O. C. Atwater	September, 1863	June, 1865
Milton J. Warner	September, 1865	June, 1866
Charles F. Krimmel	September, 1866	June, 1872
James H. Clendennin	September, 1872	June, 1875
P. M. Cartmell	September, 1875

It is impossible to gauge precisely the usefulness of the high school in this community. It has materially and beneficially affected all classes of society.

Representatives of these seventeen classes are found in the college chair, in the press, in the learned professions, in the counting-house, in the great railway interests, in the navy, in the army, in our State legislature, and at the head of schools at home and abroad. Twenty-four, at least, of the graduates, have been successful teachers in our public schools, of whom fourteen are still connected with them in the various grades. Besides these classes, in estimating the full usefulness and appreciation of the Circleville high school, large account must be made, also, of the four hundred to five hundred others, who, during the twenty-three years of its existence, have enjoyed one or more years of its advanced instruction and superior training, and have then gone forth and become citizens of influence and culture in this and other communities.

II. SUPERVISION.

John Lynch, first superintendent, was elected at the opening of the union school, in the fall of 1852, and, after ten years' service, resigned to enter the army in June, 1862. Of his very successful organization and management of the schools, much in detail has been given under the second topic.

Hon. H. H. Barney, who, as State school commissioner, had been deservedly popular, succeeded Mr.

JAMES McCOY.

MRS. JAMES McCOY.

William McCoy, father of the subject of this sketch, and the portrait of whom appears elsewhere, was born in what is now the State of Delaware, December 25, 1752. His wife, Drusilla Browning, was a native of Pennsylvania, and they were married in Huntingdon county, of that State, June 12, 1794. William McCoy followed the old time popular occupation of wagoning for twenty years, and it was while thus engaged that he met Drusilla Browning. After their marriage they emigrated to Kentucky, and in 1797 removed to the Northwest territory, and located on Kinnickinnick, which is now in Greene township, Ross county. At that time there was not a family between his location and Cleveland, and only two white families between him and Chillicothe, which was six miles south. He built upon Kinnickinnick the first mill in the Scioto valley. He moved from his first location, in 1803, to the farm in Greene township, Ross county, now occupied by D. Crouse.

During the war of 1812 he was lieutenant in the Irish Gray company, and though he awaited the call of duty, his company was not called into active service.

He was a man of moral and pious character, had been for a number of years a church member in Huntingdon, Pennsylvania, and was the leading spirit in the organization of the Mt. Union Presbyterian church, of which he was for a long time subsequently one of the ruling elders.

William McCoy's first wife died September 2, 1805. She was the mother of seven children: William, born November 26, 1795—deceased October 2, 1820; Alexander, born June 16, 1797—deceased 1877; James, born February 2, 1799; Martha, born May 9, 1800—deceased October 2, 1814; Nancy, born January 26, 1802—now deceased; John, born April 30, 1803, and Joshua, born April 2, 1805, now in Iowa.

Mr. McCoy married, in 1818, as his second wife, Rebecca Wilson, and had by her three children: Joseph, born November 10, 1819; Martha, born November 15, 1822; Harriet Ann, born December 24, 1823.

William McCoy, the pioneer, parent of these ten children, died August 27, 1823.

It is our purpose to give of his son, James, a further account than the mere mention made of other descendants, for the reason that his long life has been prominently identified with the history of Pickaway county. As we have said, he was born February 2, 1799. He grew to manhood upon his father's farm, and lived there until after his marriage. In his early life he engaged in boating, and took several loads of flour and other provisions down the Scioto to the Ohio, and thence down the Mississippi to New Orleans. He thus obtained, at the same time, his first knowledge of business and of the great world outside of the quiet farm home. His first trip was made in 1819. He took one hundred and seventy-eight barrels of flour and a considerable quantity of other goods; arrived safely at New Orleans, and sold them at a fair price, but to men who were dishonest, and from whom he was never able to secure the whole of the pay. He started home June 8th, and arrived July 11th, having walked all the way from the mouth of the Mississippi, and passed through the trials of sickness, the danger of attack from Indians in the Indian Nation (now Mississippi), and the no less imminent danger of being robbed by lawless characters not of the red race.

In 1821 he built a boat for his father, and in company with a man named John Grant, took the second trip to New Orleans. They returned upon a steamboat; made what was called a quick trip, and were fourteen days and ten hours coming up the river from their starting point to Louisville. In 1823 Mr. McCoy made his third commercial venture, this time going down the river upon a boat of his own, and carrying wheat and flour, on which he made a reasonable profit.

Just after his return from this trip his father died, and the care of the family was, to a large extent, thrown upon him. He devoted most of his time, after that, to farming, and was a hard worker and good manager.

In 1825, on the eighth of November, he married Elizabeth, daughter of John and Nancy Entrekin, who was the sharer of his joys and sorrows, his failures and successes, until 1872. She died, August 23d of that year. James and Elizabeth McCoy were the parents of four children, two of whom are still living. Martha Jane, born August 22, 1826, died September 4, 1829; John E., born July 30, 1830, married Phillip Anna Ferguson, and is now living in Lawrence, Kansas; Milton, born December 9, 1838, married Catharine Crouse, and is living at Kinnickinnick, Ross county; Burton, born November 24, 1842, was a musician of great natural genius. He enlisted in the army, served as leader of the Second regiment band, and died in the service, from disease, July 8, 1864.

After his marriage, James McCoy continued his occupation of farming. He moved, in 1826, on to the south half of section six, in Salt Creek township, and took up his home on a farm owned by his father-in-law. There he remained, without intermission, until 1837, when he prepared to go west. This project was defeated by money difficulties, brought about by the suspension of the banks. He resumed work on the Salt Creek farm, and continued to reside there until 1839, when he removed to Circleville, and started, in company with Dr. Olds, in the business of pork-packing. He remained in that business for two years, and then went into the mercantile business with Messrs. Olds and Baker, under the firm name of Olds, Baker & McCoy. Seven years of his life were spent, with varying degrees of success, in this enterprise, and at the expiration of that period he retired, and purchased a farm on the Pickaway plains. He followed farming, stock raising and dealing, acted as agent for land-owners, and engaged in several other employments, from which he realized, in the aggregate, a considerable sum of money. Although Mr. McCoy has been an active, industrious man of business, and a good farmer, he has not, in his old age, a large accumulation of property or moneys, and this is rather creditable than not, for the cause is to be found in the many generous acts of the last half of his life. He has the reputation of having done, quietly, a great number of substantial kindnesses, and has been, in every sense, a generous and liberal man to those persons and causes which have been in need and were worthy. His life has been without reproach, admirable in its earnestness and simplicity. He is a member of the old school Presbyterian church, and the house upon east Main street, where he has, these many years, taken part in worship, stands upon a lot which he donated for the purpose of its erection. In politics, Mr. McCoy is a Republican, of Whig antecedents.

Lynch in September, 1862, and continued in office seven years. He resigned in 1869, withdrawing altogether from the cares of any avocation to that studious ease which the weight of years and his cultured tastes made desirable. Our citizens still speak with regret of the loss of this scholarly gentleman and honored citizen.

Mr. C. S. Smart followed Mr. Barney in January, 1869, and resigned after six years' service, in January, 1865, having been elected State school commissioner in October previous. He was engaged at a salary of one thousand four hundred dollars, which was raised to one thousand eight hundred dollars at the close of the school year. Under "Improvement of the System," mention has been made of the changes introduced by him.

In February, 1875, M. H. Lewis entered upon the duties of superintendent, at a salary of one thousand eight hundred dollars. Under the appropriate topic, the changes made through his recommendations in classification and course of study have been specified.

Teachers' meetings have been held weekly, or as occasion required, since 1852. Mr. Lynch, for a time, had all meet at the chapel at half past seven o'clock each Saturday morning, and continue in a kind of normal-institute session until half past eleven o'clock. Later, and still, the general teachers' meetings take place at three o'clock, afternoon, on Friday. The several superintendents have used this hour for counsel, criticism, and general direction.

Since February, 1875, it has been the practice of the superintendent to hold general teachers' meetings only as necessary, once in two or three weeks, while two or three special or grade meetings are convened each week. In these, modes of instruction, government, and special cases are considered.

At the close of 1875 the public schools are arranged as follows: 1, The high school, taught by three teachers and divided into four regular classes. 2, The common school, with four departments of two grades each, and twenty rooms. 3, The colored school, with two rooms and two teachers.

Three special teachers of music, penmanship, and German, complete the corps of twenty-eight teachers.

We append the names of the members of the board of education and instruction for the year 1878-79: S. B. Evans, president; G. F. Wittich, secretary; William Doane, treasurer; George Deavenport, S. A. Moore, James Harsha.

Board of instruction for 1878-9: M. H. Lewis, A. M., superintendent; high school, E. W. Mitchell, Bertha V. Farr, Rosa Hess; A grammar, Lydia A. George; B grammar, Ella C. Drum, Maggie A. Lewis; C grammar, Alice Pedrick, Mary J. MacMullin; D grammar, Ida Peebles, Mary C. Beachtel, Flora Littleton; A primary, Anna Myers, Anna L. Sain; B primary, Mary B. Sheridan, Lizzie Atkinson; C primary, Mrs. Maggie Scott, Clara Littleton; D primary, Ida Cantner, Sallie Moran, Alice Morrow, Julietta Smith, Jennie Hedges, Delilah Anderson; colored schools, Alex. D. Delany, Maggie E. Crawford, Sallie E. Vaughn; music, T. H. Wittich; penmanship, Harp Van Riper.

CEMETERIES.

The reverent affection for the dead which is shown by the human race in all stages of its development, is a striking characteristic of the species, and one of the landmarks of that impassable chasm which separates man from the lower animals. It is, undoubtedly, an outgrowth of the spiritual nature with which the race was endowed at the beginning, and is a proof of its immortality. Hardly any sentiment has left a deeper impress upon the literature of the world than this. It is this sentiment which has made Gray's "Elegy in a Country Churchyard" (although the production of a minor poet) one of the most widely-read of all the efforts of the muse, having been translated into every cultivated language of christendom. And it is this which made Hervey's "Meditations among the Tombs," in spite of its glaring defects of style, one of the most popular books in the most prolific period of English letters. Strike from the world's literature all that has been written in obedience to this sentiment, and what would be left would be but the dry and useless comb after the honey is extracted. It is this sentiment, also, which has led to the setting apart of places for the burial of the dead, and to the decoration of such places with all the attractions which wealth and taste can supply—filling them with the best achievements of artistic skill in sculpture, architecture, and landscape adornment, thus making them places of the most irresistible attraction to the intelligent and the thoughtful, to the lovers of beauty in nature and art. The man of health and leisure, who should spend even a week's time in one of the great cities—New York, Boston, London, or Paris—without visiting Greenwood cemetery, Mount Auburn, Westminster Abbey, or Pere la Chaise, would stand self-convicted of a strange insensibility of soul; and a history of one of those cities which should make no mention of its celebrated burial place, would be indeed "like the play of Hamlet, with the part of Hamlet omitted."

And so, in our humbler history—even in writing sketches of rural townships and unincorporated villages—we are expected, in each instance, to devote a chapter to its burying ground, where and doubtless many an eye will be attracted to these chapters, unpretending though they be, which will find very little attraction in any others.

There are four public burial places in the township of Circleville—two within the limits of the city, and two just beyond those limits, on the north; but they are all, as will be seen, proper outgrowths of the city, established, at the first, to meet the city's wants, though at all times largely used by those outside of it.

Aside from these four there are, in different parts of the township, several family and neighborhood burying grounds, some of which have gone into disuse, and in others interments are still made. We have been able to visit but two of these outlying burying places, one on the Crouse farm, just out of the city, on the northwest, near the river. It has long been disused, unfenced, and neglected. It occupies the top of a high knoll, which is covered with trees, and the field about it is cultivated but does not seem to be very fertile, while here and there a patriarchal apple-tree shows that the ground was once covered by an orchard. Near by are some ice houses, that have been filled from the river on whose bank they stand. At several of the graves slabs, of a kind of sandstone, are still standing; at others, they have been broken off and are lying on the ground. The stone being soft and flakey, several of the inscriptions have become quite illegible. The oldest that can still be made out is as follows: "In memory of Margaret, wife of Aquilla Justus [the name is elsewhere spelled Justice], who died Nov. 9, 1813, aged 47 years." An advertisement in an old number of the Circleville Herald shows that this same Mr. Justice had a mortgage on this same ground in 1830. Another inscription reads as follows: "In memory of John Justice, who departed this life Oct. 8, 1821, in the 73d year of his age." In the chapter on settlements it will be seen that this Mr. Justice entered the southwest quarter of section five, which occupies the northeast corner of the township, a little over two miles from the place where he was buried.

The other outlying burying-ground, which we visited, is on the farm of Jacob Ludwig, in the southeast corner of the township. It contains several new graves, the oldest being that of Thomas Ludwig, a young man of twenty-one, who died in 1810. Mr. Jacob Hitler, who lives near by, thinks that it began to be used in 1807. It covers about half an acre of ground, is securely fenced, and contains several very tasteful family monuments—that of Hosler, gray granite; those of Hitler and Lutz, white and clouded marble; those of Seall and Rudy, red granite. It was a great pleasure to find this little village of the dead so well cared for.

Of the four cemeteries properly belonging to city, the one first established is on east Mound street, adjoining Trinity Lutheran church. It consists of lots number one hundred and fifteen and one hundred and sixteen, of the original town plat, and was set apart by order of the court of common pleas, for the use of the German Lutheran and Calvanistic congregations, in 1811. We have not been able to ascertain the date of the first interment, nor the name of the first person buried in this ground. No costly monuments were erected there, and no interments have been made since 1850. The oldest inscriptions are in German, and many have become illegible from the friable nature of the stone employed. The first interment of which we found any record, was that of a child named William Betzer, who died in 1812, aged about six years. A blunder of the stone-cutter (leaving out a cipher) makes this child born in 186. This blunder, however, seems to be corrected, after a fashion, on another stone, which gravely informs us that Jacob (surname not legible) was born in 17093. If this statement were correct, and Jacob were now living, he would be just fifteen thousand, two hundred and fifteen years less than one year old. It will take an algebraist, however, to cipher it out. One of the German inscriptions is as follows, verbatim et literatim: "Hier ruhet Andreas Foltz, gebohren in Strasburg, Euroba den 9 Oct., 1756, gestorben den 23 dag Sept. 1813. Alt worden 57 Jahr, 11 monet, 2 wochen, 2 tag. Gezengt 11 kinder, 8 sene und 3 Dechter." Some of the words may be Pennsylvania German, they certainly are not the German of Germany. A literal translation is as follows: "Here rests Andrew Foltz, born in Strasburg, Europe, the 9th of Oct., 1756; died the 23d day of Sept., 1813. Was aged 57 years, 11 months, 2 weeks and 2 days. Begot 11 children—8 sons and 3 daughters." Comparatively few of the present descendants of the New England fathers will leave so worthy a record as that.

The two lots adjoining this cemetery on the east, (numbered one hundred and thirteen and one hundred and fourteen) were, at a very early day set apart for a similar purpose; but we have not been able to ascertain either the date or the manner of doing it. The two grounds were kept separate by a fence, and the one on the east was called, sometimes the public, sometimes the English, and sometimes the city burying-ground. In the year 1863, a decree of the court of common pleas having been obtained for that purpose, the most of the bodies were removed from this part, and the Trinity Lutheran church and parsonage which now occupy the ground, were erected there.

The burying grounds just described soon became insufficient for the accommodation of the public, and therefore, on the nineteenth of March, 1831, the town council purchased of Samuel Watt and wife, a piece of land containing nearly five acres on East High street, along the border of Hargus creek. It is a part of original section nineteen, and the price paid was one hundred and twenty-five dollars. This the council laid out as a burying ground, and called it the Circleville cemetery. In common parlance, however, it was for a long time called the "new," as it is now called the "old" cemetery.

Prominent in the council which purchased this ground, and the chief mover in the enterprise, was Mr. George Crook, an influential merchant of the city at that time He probably little thought that the ground he was so active in securing for the public convenience, would so soon become his own last resting place; that he would, in fact, be the first to be deposited there, amid the tears of sorrowing friends. Such, however, was the case. A plain marble slab near the entrance to the ground, bears this inscription: "Sacred to the memory of George Crook, who departed this life Jan. 1, 1832, in the 33d year of his age, leaving a widow with four small children to mourn their irreparable loss. But they mourn not as those without hope." Then follows an epitaph which, although rather commonplace as a whole, contains two lines (the ones printed below in italics) that strike us as being equal to anything we have ever met with in elegiac poetry:

"Wond'ring I ask, where is the breast
Struggling so late and racked with pain;
The eyes that upward looked for rest,
And dropt their weary lids again.
Peace, fluttered soul, the storm is o'er,
Ended at last the doubtful strife.
He flies to Heaven, returns no more;
A widow thou, no more a wife."

The monuments, here also, are mostly plain and unpretentious. The same friable sandstone, heretofore mentioned, has been too largely employed, and many of the inscriptions, in consequence, can no longer be deciphered. The grounds are not as well kept as they ought to be; but it is a pleasant, though melancholy, place to stay and meditate in the cool of a summer evening.

A little beyond the limits of the city, about a mile north of its center, on the west side of the Columbus turnpike, lie the beautiful grounds of the Forest cemeterp.

They comprise about fifty-one acres of land, purchased by the cemetery corporation in 1857, mostly of Mrs. Agnes McCrea, but partly of Jacob Mader, for one hundred dollars per acre. They were laid out, the same year, under the direction of William Renick, and exhibit great taste and skill in the fine art of landscape gardening.

The following pledge and subscription will show how and by whom the money was raised for the purchase of these grounds:

We, the undersigned, being desirous of providing suitably for the burial of the dead, do hereby subscribe the several sums annexed to our names respectively, for the purpose of buying and embellishing grounds, to be used forever for a rural cemetery, near the city of Circleville. The premises to be bought for this purpose shall contain not less than forty acres. These subscriptions to be binding whenever ratified by the subscribers, or a majority, in amount. This association to be organized under the law of Ohio passed February 24, 1848. The sums hereto subscribed shall be in the nature of a loan to the association, subject to be repaid out of the proceeds of sales of burial lots, under such rules and regulations as the association may prescribe.

The association which bought the grounds was incorporated the same year, as shown by the following articles of incorporation, recorded September 8, 1857:

On the thirtieth day of July, A. D. 1857, William Renick, Samuel Marfield, Samuel Rogers, Wayne Griswold, Adam McCrea, John Groce, William Doane, W. W. Bierce, Jonathan Renick, George H. Fickardt, and twenty-two other citizens of Circleville, assembled at the court house, in the city of Circleville, for the purpose of forming themselves into a cemetery association under an act of the legislature, passed February 24, 1848; notices of said meeting having been published in the Circleville Herald and Watchman twenty days before said meeting.

On motion, Adam McCrea, esq., was elected chairman of the meeting, and George H. Fickardt clerk.

A majority of the members of the association being present, on motion it was resolved that the said persons present form themselves into a cemetery association by the election of seven trustees and one clerk.

The meeting then proceeded to the election of trustees and clerk, when the following gentlemen were elected trustees, viz.: William Renick, president; William Doane, Wayne Griswold, John Groce, W. W. Bierce, Jonathan Renick, E. C. Clarke—three to serve for three years, two to serve for two years, and two to serve for one year.

George H. Fickardt was elected clerk, to serve for three years.

On motion, it was resolved that the name of the association shall be "The Forest Cemetery of Circleville."

On motion, a constitution for the government of said association was adopted.

I, George H. Fickardt, clerk of the Forest Cemetery of Circleville, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true record of the proceedings of the meeting held at the court house, in the city of Circleville, on the thirtieth day of July, A. D. 1857, for the purpose herein before mentioned.

Signed: GEORGE H. FICKARDT,
Clerk of Forest Cemetery, of Circleville, Ohio.

July 31, 1857.

The following are the names of the present officers: Dr. Marcus Brown, president; Geo. H. Fickardt, treasurer and clerk. Trustees: John Groce, E. C. Clarke, S. A. Moore, M. Brown, John Boyer, S. Marfield, sr., and William Doane.

The grounds of Forest cemetery were, July 28, 1858, solemnly dedicated for the uses and purposes as specified in article seven of the constitution, by an oration by the Rev. Joel Swartz, pastor of the Evangelical Lutheran church in this city, and by other appropriate exercises.

The following were the order of exercises:

1st, Anthem, by the Circleville Musical Association.
2d, Invocation, by Rev. Mr. Swartz.
3d, Ode.
4th, Prayer, by Rev. Mr. Felton.
5th, Hymn, to Old Hundred.
6th, Address, by Rev. Mr. Swartz.
7th, Ode.
8th, Benediction, by Rev. Mr. Felton.

We regret we have not space to publish the beautiful oration of Rev. Mr. Swartz.

The first body laid at rest in these beautiful grounds was that of Mrs. William P. Darst, October 12, 1858.

There are many fine and costly monuments erected here, the three most noticeable being that of Dr. Chas. H. Hawkes, consisting of a marble statue of hope, larger than life, on a lofty pedestal of gray granite; that of Wm. Renick, entirely of red granite (except the base, which is gray)—the pedestal being surmounted by a tall pyramidal shaft; and that of Col. John Cradlebaugh, of a grayish marble, distinguished from all the rest by its beautiful, life-size statue of Christ in benediction, the work of an Italian sculptor, which would be justly regarded as an attraction, in any cemetery in the word.

On one of the tablets of the last named monument, is told a sad story of domestic bereavement, viz.: That Mrs. Cradlebaugh, and a son aged over two months, both died on the same day, June 19, 1852. Twenty-one years later, in 1873, the colonel himself, having cherished in the loneliness of widowhood, and amid many strange vicissitudes of fortune, the memory of his youthful companion, died in the midst of great reverses at Eureka, Nevada; and six years after his death, on decoration day, May 30, 1879, his remains were brought back and deposited by the side of his loved ones, under the sacred benediction of those marble hands.

Nearly opposite to the Forest cemetery, but a little nearer the city, is the newly opened cemetery of St. Joseph's (Roman Catholic) church. It consists of six acres, purchased in August, 1877, of Caspar McCabe, for one thousand dollars. Two avenues only have been laid out through the grounds at right angles, in the form of a Roman cross. It was consecrated July 4, 1878, and the first interment took place on the same day—that of Miss Mary Roach, a young lady, about eighteen years old. Only six or seven graves have been added since that time. The most of the ground has been cultivated in wheat during the present season.

MERCANTILE INTERESTS.

A complete history of the mercantile interests of the place would embrace a sketch of all the leading merchants, both past and present, that have ever done business here in any department of trade. We regret that we have no space for such a history, but must content ourselves with little more than a bare enumeration of the individuals and firms now engaged in three of the principal branches of merchandise.

I. DRY GOODS.

Those engaged at present in this business are the following: Wolfley & Hartmeyer, Delaplaine & Doane, J. Darst, W. S. Jacobson & Co., D. Peirce, Wallace & Bro., J. Weill, Wallace & Schleyer, and L. Abt & Co. Of these, Wolfley & Hartmeyer represent the oldest establishment, dating back to about the year 1829. The name of Darst has been prominent in the mercantile history of Circleville for many years. The first who bore it in that capacity were two brothers—Isaac and William P. Darst—who established themselves here, in the dry goods trade, in 1832, both having previously been clerks for Bradshaw & Turney, pioneer merchants of Circleville, as early as 1816. They were brothers of Joseph Darst, for many years a shoe merchant in this place. The present J. Darst is the survivor of two cousins of the same name—Jacob Darst—who were in partnership here for a long time, having become successors to Darst & Hedges. The elder of the two cousins (now deceased) was the father of Miss Lillie C. Darst, editor and proprietor of the Circleville Herald.

II. HARDWARE.

The only ones doing a general hardware business at present in Circleville are the following: Cyrus Benford, W. A. Ensworth & Co., and B. H. Moore. Of these, Benford has the oldest store, having been established about the year 1845.

III. DRUGS.

The druggists now doing business here are the following: Z. H. Fickardt, W. W. Ballard, Evans & Krimmel, and H. E. Grand-Girard. Mr. Fickhardt came here in 1839, and his establishment dates back to 1830, being the oldest drug store in the city. He is the proprietor of an excellent tonic medicine called "Angelica Bitters," from the principal ingredient, and "Poor Man's Tonic," from the low price at which it is sold.

BANKS.

Of these, there have been six of a public character. The first, known as the Bank of Circleville, was organized in the fall of 1834, under a special act of the legislature, passed March 3d, of the same year, with a capital of $200,000, having for its commissioners Joseph Olds, Samuel Rogers, N. S. Gregg, Andrew Huston, William Renick, sr., William Renick, jr., Elias Florence and Samuel Lybrand, who, on the first Monday in June, opened the books for subscriptions to the stock. During the twenty years it did business, it had three presidents, viz.: Joseph Olds, N. S. Gregg and Joel Franklin; and two cashiers, of whom Hoel Lawrence was the first, and his son, Hoel K. Lawrence, the second. For a period of about seventeen years, the bank was under an able direction, and advanced to a high degree of prosperity. At length, in 1853, the elder Lawrence died, an event which was soon followed by a negotiation for the transfer of a controlling interest to some new parties, and the consequent resignation of its judicious president, N. S. Gregg. Thenceforward its welfare waned, and, in one of the months of 1854, it failed.

On the sixteenth of August, 1839, books were opened by John Barr, Jacob Shoemaker and Jonathan Renick, three of the twelve commissioners, for subscriptions to the stock of the second bank, whose act of incorporation reached back to January 14, 1818, also entitled the Bank of Circleville, having an authorized capital of $300,000, with right to commence business when $150,000 were subscribed, and fifteen per cent. thereof paid in, and the governor's certificate procured. It would appear that there was not much readiness on the part of more than a few of the citizens of the county to become shareholders, and only after non-residents of the county and State entered their names for the deficient sum, was the organization perfected. A Mr. Brown, whose given name can not now be recalled, a resident of New York, was elected the president, and one Charles Cornwell, the cashier. For reasons, which seem not to have been made public, the governor of Ohio declined to certify that the bank had complied with the provisions of the statutes, and, it being deemed important that this official declaration by the bank should have a verification by disinterested parties, the board appointed E. B. Olds and P. N. White to make examination of the books and to count the funds. They, having complied with the request, reported that they found the institution in possession of $23,000, gold and silver, a sum $500 in excess of the fifteen per cent. necessary to have before operations could be begun legally. There may be now no one living who knows just how long the said $23,000 was held as a real basis for a two-fold, or more, circulation, but two or three individuals yet survive who have always believed that another bank were creditors therefor, and that the loan was of short duration. However that may be, on the sixth of April, 1840, business with the public began; whether in sin, to bring forth iniquity, or in honesty, to bear good fruit, the current sentiment of the day got into no controversy. Suffice it to say, that not twelve months elapsed before president number one gave place to number two, and the first cashier to the second. Seymour G. Renick becoming the successor of the one, and William McCulloch that of the other. But the ebb and flow of affairs did not improve. The notes of the bank were a source of annoyance. As children, they had too warm affection for their parents, and back to them they would continually go. At length an hour of paralysis came, and on the morning of the fourteenth of April, 1842, after an asthmatic existence of two years and eight days, it expired. Its worthy incumbent cashier was humiliated, and, for a little while, became a recluse. It happened that some of the directors were small depositors, and felt that their balances needed attention. The dejected official who held the keys of the vault was visited, and importuned therefor, and on the plea of a desire to take an inventory of the contents of the safe, the keys were surrendered. The repository was soon opened, and the ledger examined. A found himself a creditor for one hundred dollars, B for two hundred dollars, and C for three hundred dollars. There must be no loss to them. The trunks were found to be replete with the bills of the corporation, but to contain no other. "What per cent. of their face will they probably bring in the open market?" was the query. Fifty cents on the dollar became the estimate. "Then," said they, "let us take enough of them, at those figures, to square accounts." So doing, the Bank of Circleville, ear-marked "the old," was left to dance on the sea of public opinion as best she could; and on she went, drifting for twenty-nine years, until, at length, by the weight of the last judicial determination, she went down to join the kindred dead.

The third organization was that of the Pickaway County Savings Institute, with a capital of $25,000, of which M. Brown was made president, and O. Ballard, jr., cashier.

In 1851, the Institute was merged into the Pickaway County bank, a corporation organized under the act to authorize free banking, passed March 21, 1851, by the general assembly of the State of Ohio, with capital stock of $200,000. The board of directors consisted of Samuel Rogers, James E. Rice, J. A. Troup, James R. Hulse and Marcus Brown.

On the tenth of October, 1863, the stockholders of the Pickaway County bank accepted of the provisions of the "act to provide a national currency, secured by the pledge of the United States bonds," and organized under it as the First National bank of Circleville, with a capital stock increased to $260,000. The board of directors consisted of N. S. Gregg, Samuel Rogers, S. H. Ruggles, James E. Rice, Hanson Rock and Marcus Brown. Marcus Brown was elected president, and O. Ballard, jr., appointed cashier, and now, after the lapse of thirty years, these officers are still in the management, and few banks have had better success.

The sixth, and last, organization occurred on the fourteenth of January, 1864, when the Second National bank, with a capital stock of $125,000, opened its doors to the public, having elected N. S. Gregg, esq., its now venerable president, as its highest officer, and Henry N. Hedges, jr., still its second official, as the cashier. This institution, also, has been well conducted, and its shares have proved to be a valuable acquisition to the holders.

CANAL BUSINESS.

The completion of the Ohio canal gave a great impetus to the prosperity of Circleville. The construction of the work gave employment to large numbers of men, and support to their families. By reducing the expense of importation it lessened the price of all sorts of merchandise; and by affording readier means for the export of home products, it increased their volume and stimulated still greater production. In 1846 the clearances from this port, of the five principal articles of export, were as follows: Of corn, 106,465 bushels; wheat, 24,918 bushels; broom corn, 426,374 pounds; pork, 1,277,212 pounds, and of lard, 1,458,259 pounds. The business continued to increase till the year 1856, when the first railroad through Circleville (the Cincinnati & Zanesville, or Muskingum Valley road) was built. From this time the business by canal diminished till, in the year 1876, the record for the five articles named, stood as follows: Corn, 44,492 bushels; wheat, 7,588 bushels; pork, 134,317 pounds; lard, 92,233 pounds; broom corn, none. The next year the Scioto Valley road was completed, and the result was that, in 1878, the year following, the clearances by canal had almost entirely ceased, the only exports reported being: of pork, 6,857 pounds, and of flour, 798 barrels, the latter having amounted, in 1875, to 1,280 barrels. This falling off is, of course, due to the fact that the railroads are able to underbid the canal in the price of freights. For exports the latter has become useless, and almost the only import which it still controls, is that of coal. Should the railroads secure the handling of that, the canal would, in all probability, be abandoned.

FIRE DEPARTMENT.

It would be interesting and instructive to trace the history of the Circleville fire army (or, as it might better be called, water army, since its object is to fight the "fire fiend" with water) from the first organization of the "bucket brigade" in pioneer times, through the days of the "Thames" rotary engine, the "old Scioto," with its end brakes, and the "new Scioto" with its side brakes, down to the present era of steam fire engines and pumping works. For this, however, we have not room, but must plunge at once in medias res of the present system.

The Circleville fire department consists at present of one hundred and thirty members, divided into four companies, and organized under the leadership of chief engineer H. H. Nicholas, first assistant engineer T. H. Casper, and second assistant engineer Charles McLean. The organization was created and is controlled by municipal law, and is a combination of the pay with the volunteer principle—the officers, during the time of fires and when on parade, being clothed with police powers.

Circleville company No. 1, consists of forty members, having in charge the steam engine "Circleville," with the following officers: F. Drescher, engineer; W. M.

Todd, stoker; B. Wolfram, foreman; Jos. Ridgeway, first assistant ditto; John Crayne, second assistant ditto; George Denman, secretary; Mayor I. P. Todd, treasurer; Peter Foerst, messenger, and J. Streich, pioneer.

Buckeye engine and hose company No. 2, consists of forty members, having in charge "Buckeye" steam engine No. 2, and one or two hose carts, under the following officers: Andrew Rudle, engineer; D. Thockmorton, foreman; L. Seigwalt, assistant ditto; H. Weimer, secretary; F. Hoffman, treasurer; W. Schwartz, foreman of hose department; J. Hester, assistant ditto; Charles Butler, first pipeman; Frank Feeny, assistant; Thomas Sharkey, second pipeman; H. Williams, assistant; A. Todd and J. Sheridan, pioneers.

Niagara hose company, No. 1, consists of twenty members, having in charge two hose carts, the officers being as follows: E. Case, foreman; A. Krimmell, assistant ditto; R. D. Moffitt, secretary; Charles McLean, treasurer; M. Donelly, first pipeman; Geo. Wilson, assistant; D. Brannan, second pipeman; D. Gephart, asssistant, and Thos. Tracy, pioneer.

Scioto hand engine company consists of thirty colored members, having charge of hand engine "Scioto" and two hose trucks. The following are the officers: J. Jackson, foreman; J. McMann, assistant ditto; J. Norman, secretary; W. H. Weaver, treasurer; W. Hohlms, foreman of the hose department; T. Turner, first pipeman; J. Grant, second ditto, and R. B. Peterson, pioneer.

The steam engines mentioned above are the most elaborate and expensive of their kind, and (like all the other apparatus named) are kept in perfect order and ready for efficient service at a moment's notice. The remarkable exemption of the city from destructive fires, during the past quarter of a century, proves conclusively the rare effectiveness of the department. And we are pleased to learn that, as in the great political rebellion of 1861, so in the smaller fire-rebellions which they now eagerly aid in quelling, the "colored troops" still fight nobly, thus establishing their claim to be regarded as useful citizens of the country whose life they helped to save.

MANUFACTURING INTERESTS.

These, for a town of seven thousand inhabitants, are very well represented in Circleville. We begin with

THE SCIOTO MACHINE WORKS.

These works, embracing machine shop and foundry, were established in the fall of 1850, by Messrs. Bright & Bierce. The first iron was melted in August, 1851. In 1852 Bierce sold out to Bright, and the latter took, as partner, H. J. Lawrence. The next year Lawrence sold out, and George West became partner with Bright, under the firm name of Bright & Co. This firm failed in 1855. In 1856, Irvin & Miller rented the property, and carried on the business about nine months. Then Risher & Dunkle rented it, in the latter part of 1856, carried on the business of making wheat drills for about two years, and failed. In the latter part of 1858 it was purchased by W. W. Bierce, for nine thousand dollars, and carried on successfully till 1864. They made a specialty (as the other firms did, for the most part) of steam engines, threshing machines, and stoves. In 1864 Bierce failed, and the property passed into the hands of Haswell, Wright & Co., who owned it till August, 1878, and then sold out to the Scioto Machine company for fifteen thousand dollars. Of this company, which was organized on the twelfth of August, 1878, with a capital of thirty thousand dollars, the following are the officers: President, T. C. Wallace; superintendent, A. R. Dumm; auditor, J. Q. A. Oliver. They employ, on an average, about thirty-five hands.

These works are situated on the corner of Main street and the Ohio canal, and it is a part of their history that the main building was erected as a hotel, by Andrew Cradlebaugh, about the year 1836. Mr. Cradlebaugh also had a tannery at the rear of his hotel. The building was considerably enlarged in 1842, soon after which time Mr. Cradlebaugh died, his widow continuing the business till 1850, when the property was purchased by Bright & Bierce, as stated above.

CIRCLEVILLE TANNERY.

This establishment is located on the opposite side of the street from the machine works. It was built by John Hayes, about the year 1850. He sold out to Howard & Jackson, in July, 1856, for four thousand dollars. Howard sold his half interest to George Metzger, in 1858, and the present proprietors, George and William Roth (brothers), bought out Jackson & Metzger, in 1871, paying ten thousand dollars for the building and grounds. Harness leather is a specialty with them, of which they turn out about seventy-five hides a week. Ten men are employed in the business.

Farther up the canal, on High street, are two large

PORK PACKING HOUSES.

The first we come to, on the south side of the street, is the one owned by S. H. Ruggles. On the opening of the canal, in 1832 or 1833, the business was commenced, in a small way, by Samuel Rogers and William Martin, with whom was associated Mr. Baldwin, of Cleveland. Mr. Ruggles, as we understand, became proprietor of the concern in 1843. The establishment was rebuilt and enlarged in 1869. Since that time the average number of hogs slaughtered annually has been from ten to fifteen thousand. The limit of capacity is about twenty thousand. Curing hams is a specialty. From fifty to sixty hands are employed during the slaughtering season.

The establishment on the north side of the street is the one now owned by John Groce & Son. The business was commenced here by Olds & McCoy, in 1837. They sold out to Atwater & Groce, in 1848. Mr. Atwater died in 1852, and Mr. Groce then became sole proprietor. In 1870, while they were attempting to place a new foundation under the old wooden building, a heavy rain coming on and washing out the supports, the whole fell in ruins. Out of these ruins sprang the commodious brick structure which now occupies the ground. In 1878 a summer packing house was added, which is kept almost at the freezing point by a large refrigerator, forty-eight by forty feet, the coolness being propelled by six hundred tons of ice. In this, three hundred hogs a day can be cared for, with as much safety as in mid-winter. This is claimed as the most convenient establishment of the kind in the Scioto valley. From ten to twelve thousand hogs is its annual slaughtering capacity. It is worthy of remark that the foreman of the concern, George W. Downs, a native of Circleville, has been in the employ of Mr. Groce for twenty-seven years—a compliment both to employer and employed.

Far out on Washington street, south of the railroad, is located

THE SWEET-CORN CANNING AND DRYING ESTABLISHMENT.

The proprietors are C. E. Sears & Co., who began the business in 1873, at first only for drying. They commenced canning in 1876. In that year Evans, Day & Co., of Baltimore, Maryland, came on and put their apparatus into one of the drying houses, Sears & Co. furnishing the corn, and Evans, Day & Co. doing the packing. The next year [1877] Sears & Co. purchased the canning apparatus, and have since carried on both branches of the business. They raise all their corn on leased ground. The first year they put up the smaller drying house, and dried the corn raised on one hundred acres. The next year they put up the larger house (nearly twice as large as the former) and dried the product of at least three hundred and fifty acres. Since that time they have cultivated from four to five hundred acres. In 1878 they sold fifteen hundred barrels of dried corn, and over three hundred thousand two-pound cans of canned corn. For eight months, in planting, cultivating and harvesting both corn and fodder, about twelve men with teams are employed. During the harvesting season the largest number they have ever employed, at one time, was four hundred, comprising men, women and children. Last year, for one item of labor, they paid out ten thousand dollars. Surely, a most beneficent industry.

THE GAS WORKS

are situated on the corner of Mound street and the canal. They were established by Coverdale & Bierce, in 1859. They commenced furnishing light in January, 1860. In 1863, Colonel S. A. Moore, having previously been a large stockholder, became sole proprietor. The original capital was twenty-six thousand dollars, and the annual dividends, notwithstanding the exaggerated notion so prevalent, as to the profits of the gas business, have not been over ten per cent. It requires courage and enterprise to establish gas works in a town of five thousand inhabitants (which is probably more than Circleville had in 1859), and when capitalists are found sufficiently public-spirited to furnish their fellow-citizens with such a convenience, they certainly deserve a liberal patronage.

THE BROOM-CORN INTEREST

Is one of the largest and most important industrial interests of Circleville at the present time. It is proper, as well as convenient, to class it among the manufactures, although the corn is simply made into bales and then sold in bulk, to be manufactured into brooms and brushes in various parts of the country.

Eaton Brothers were the pioneers in this business, commencing about the year 1838, and continuing until 1851. They cultivated about one hundred and fifty acres of ground.

Messrs. Edward and J. P. Smith commenced the business in 1852. In 1856 J. P. Smith left, and Edward Smith carried it on alone during the next year. Then James H. Lynch became a partner, continuing in the business for two years. J. P. Smith returned in 1860, and since that time the two brothers have continued together. At first they cultivated but two hundred acres. Since 1863 the average number has been about one thousand. One year [1864 or 1865] they had one thousand two hundred acres under cultivation. In 1864 they paid to the government a tax on forty-two thousand dollars, as the income from their business for that year. Up to 1862 they cultivated, for the most part, rented land; since then, almost entirely, land of their own. During the cultivation of the crop, about sixty men, with as many horses and mules, are employed. During the harvesting season of two months, some three hundred persons are employed, consisting of men, women, and children. Over twenty-five thousand dollars are paid out annually for labor. The average product of their business is three hundred and fifty tons, which is distributed through nearly all the northern States. The process of their work may be briefly stated as follows: The first thing done, after cutting the corn, is the removal of the seed, which is of course done by machinery; then it is taken to the drying sheds, and left till it is thoroughly air-dried; thence to the bale-house, where it is pressed and baled. Sometimes it is shipped directly from this point, but more commonly it is taken to the large store-house on Court street, just south of the railroad, where it is stored until the accumulation of orders demands its shipment. This building, with the ground on which it stands, cost over seven thousand dollars. A low estimate of the capital invested in the business amounts to a hundred and twenty thousand dollars, as follows: lands, one hundred thousand dollars; buildings, thirteen thousand dollars; horses and implements, seven thousand dollars. About three hundred acres of the land cultivated lies in Circleville township; the rest, in Jackson.

Mr. Edward Smith, the principal proprietor, has a charming suburban villa on south Court street, near the city limits. The fine mansion stands in the midst of spacious grounds, skillfully laid out and planted with shrubbery and trees, of various kinds, deciduous and evergreen—the planting having been done many years ago by Mr. Smith's own hands, or under his direction. This magnificent property, which is worth "a mint 'o money," is not embraced in the estimate given above.

THE PLOW MANUFACTORY of Schwartz & Son was established in 1852. A part of the large brick building now occupied by them, on the corner of Franklin and Pickaway streets, was, some time previous to that date, a place of worship, having been built by a branch of the Methodists, calling themselves the "Mutual Rights Methodist Episcopal Church." The other part of the works was built in 1866. The proprietors buy the castings for their plows in various markets, make the wrought-iron portions at their own forges, and do the wood work in the upper part of their building. Repairing machinery of all kinds is now a large part of their business. They turn out an average of a hundred plows annually, all of which are sold in the county.

OTHER FACTORIES ENUMERATED.

There are several other manufacturing establishments, now in operation here, some of which are perhaps quite as deserving of extended mention, as the most of those already noticed; but want of space compels us to content ourselves with a brief enumeration. These establishments, with the names of their owners, are as follows:

Three flouring mills, owned by Mr. Delaplane, Heffner & Co., and Jacob Young. Two planing mills, manufacturing sash, doors and blinds, by John Pickering, and C. B. Tyler. Four carriage factories, by Wm. Bauder & Son, Brobeck & Denman, James C. Duffey, and a joint stock company in Acker's building, on Court street. (Wm. Bauder built the first buggy ever made in Circleville, and that was forty years ago. The firm of William Bauder & Son now turn out about fifty fine carriages a year—this kind of work being with them a specialty. They keep the best lumber wagons on sale, but not of their own manufacture.) Nine tailor shops, by G. Christy Bayer, Kinzel & Hannig, B. M. Thompson, Matthew Littleton, Henry Alspaugh, Thos. Howard, James Steele, Chas. Sprates, and Franz Mœller. One gun shop, by Chas. M. Siebert, manufacturing the wood work of guns and rifles. Two brick yards, by Mr. McCollister and Mr. Brunnshein. One broom shop, by Michael Gœller. Five tin shops, by Wm. Richardson, Hoffman & McMullen, Haswell & Co., Henry Greer, and John Cull. Six boot and shoe shops, by T. J. Epps, E. E. Bock, Thos. Orpwood, Charles Fismer, H. Bowling, and A. D. Schurn. Five harness and saddle shops, by W. A. Empie, Sapp & McCollister, A. Smith, Harry Clemens, and Thos. Stover. Two marble shops, by James Harsha, and Price & Glick. Three cooper shops, by James Sapp, Gideon Reif (turning out five thousand barrels a year), and Conrad Ritchie. Three bakeries, by M. Bish, Jacob Mader, and John Mader. One confectionery establishment, by G. F. Wittich. One book bindery, by B. W. Morris. One brewery, by Krimmel & Hoover. Two cigar factories, by Henry Voneif, and Fen. E. Dyas.

There may be others worthy of mention, but these are all we are able to find.

DEFUNCT MANUFACTORIES.

On the left bank of the canal, a little below the gas works, stands a large three-story brick building, with a number of wooden buildings connected with it. This building contains the machinery for carrying on an extensive business in the manufacture, by steam power, of woolen goods; but it has lain idle for the past four or five years.

It was built by George Crook as a commission and storage warehouse, about the year 1831. After Mr. Crook's death, it was owned and carried on by J. W. Finley & Co., for some years. In 1844 it was purchased by P. B. & J. G. Dodridge, and turned into a woolen factory. Their successors were Thomas Drakely, W. W. Bierce & Co., and Miller & Hassenpflug. It has been a very extensive business, but, as may be judged by its frequent change of proprietors, has never been what could be called a pecuniary success. Since the failure of Miller & Hassenpflug, four or five years ago, it has lain idle, as above stated. Opinion differs as to the probability of its ever being resuscitated.

About the year 1845, Darst & Yerington started a foundry near the site of the present gas works. This was kept up for five or six years, and was the lineal predecessor of the Scioto machine works, already described.

A match factory was established, near 1853, by J. Wyman and T. Bussert—Wyman (who was a lawyer) furnishing the money, and Bussert manufacturing the matches. The busines was carried on, only about a year, in a house which stood near the present city building. After supplying this place with matches, they employed Mr. C. C. Niebling to peddle out the remainder of their stock (consisting of a wagon load or more) through the neighboring towns and villages.

Frank Head put up a saw-mill and carding machine on Hargus creek, near the old cemetery, about the year 1825 or '26, which did considerable business for some ten years, when it was given up. There was also, at one time, a carding machine near the canal, a little above Groce's packing house.

About the year 1820, Thomas Bell established here a factory (in a small way) for the making of cut nails, employing a Mr. Orr to do the work. It lasted only four or five years.

Wilkes Allen, about the year 1840, commenced the manufacture of fanning-mills, in a building near the Emmett warehouse, on the canal. It continued in operation some fourteen years.

As early as 1818 or '20, Valentine Keffer began the manufacture of linseed oil, in a small way. It continued but a few years.

About the same time, a Mr. Reed built a woolen mill on Hargus creek, in the north part of town. The establishment changed hands twice, and was given up some time between 1840 and 1850.

A soap and candle factory was established by G. A. Hartmeyer, about 1840, candles being made until petroleum drove them out of the market. A good article of laundry soap was made, and the business continued till near Mr. Hartmeyer's death, which occured in 1874. Although the business was very limited, Mr. Hartmeyer doing nearly all the work with his own hands, yet it made a good living for himself and family, and left them a comfortable home.

A Mr. Josinski established here a distillery, about 1820, which continued in operation only a few years. The buildings were still standing, when the canal aqueduct was built, about 1832, and were used as a boarding house for the hands employed in the construction of that important work. The business of distilling is spoken of as having been singularly disastrous to all the parties that

MATTHEW McCREA.

ADAM McCREA.

Matthew McCrea, one of the old time residents of Circleville, and one of the most active of its early business men, was born in the year 1792, in the county of Down, Ireland. He was of Scotch ancestry, and the son of Adam and Martha McCrea, who were also the parents of nine other children, six sons and three daughters. Matthew came to America with his brother Joseph, stopping first at Hagerstown, Maryland, where he remained two years. In 1817 he removed to the village of Jefferson, Pickaway county, Ohio, where his brother had previously gone, and was at that time clerking for Henry Neville. Thomas Bell, of Circleville, hearing of Matthew's arrival, sent for him and gave him a place in his store, in which he was doing a large and prosperous business in general merchandise. It was in Circleville that he met his future wife, Agnes, daughter of Hugh and Ruth Foresman. She was of Scotch origin, and her mother was of the Slocum family, famous in connection with the Wyoming massacre and wholesale abduction. She was born June 6, 1797, and married Matthew McCrea September 16, 1819, four years after his arrival in this country, and two years after his coming to Circleville.

Matthew McCrea established himself in business upon his own account in the fall of 1820, at the village of Jefferson. He traveled all of the way to Philadelphia on horseback to buy goods, which were loaded on the heavy, old-fashioned wagons, on Market street, and transported in that manner to their place of destination. Not being satisfied with his location in Jefferson, Mr. McCrea purchased property in, and removed his building to, Circleville, in 1821, locating himself on the east side of the old circle, where he continued to prosecute a very successful business until 1828. Being the owner of a considerable quantity of land, he then sold out his goods and devoted himself to farming for the remainder of his life, excepting a period of one year, in 1834 and 1835, when he was in partnership with S. S. Denny, in the dry goods business.

Mr. McCrea was probably the first successful adventurer in transporting pork, lard and flour from Circleville, by the Scioto, Ohio, and Mississippi rivers to New Orleans. His first trip, in 1819, was made for his brother-in-law, Thomas Bell. He continued this profitable, although somewhat risky enterprise, until his retirement from the mercantile business, making annual trips, and carrying pork, lard, flour, and other provisions to the great southern mart. It was his custom after disposing of his stock in New Orleans, to sail for Philadelphia, where he purchased goods, before returning home, to sell during the ensuing year in his Circleville store.

Mr. McCrea was a man of broad and generous nature, and of much dignity and perfect probity of character. His hospitality seemed to have no bound. His house was always open, and his friends, or for that matter, strangers, always welcome. Ministers, and especially those of his own denomination, were guests whom he took an especial pleasure in providing for; and if the number of those who accepted his kindness, and the frequency of their visits afford any means by which to judge, we may be sure that they fully appreciated his entertainment. He was a man in whom the people generally reposed the highest degree of confidence, and when he died, one attestation of this fact was shown in his having a considerable sum of money which he had been given to hold in trust. As one of the founders of the first Circleville academy, he exhibited his interest in education, and gave the cause the practical assistance of his influence and pecuniary support. He was for many years one of the trustees of this institution, and throughout its existence took great interest in its welfare and usefulness as he did of other institutions in their time. Always upon the side of good morals and improvement, he became at an early day a strong and consistent advocate of temperance. He was one of the very first to take the unpopular step of dispensing with liquor in the harvest field. A man of strong and fine religious feeling, a quality, perhaps, in his Scotch blood—he was an active member of the Presbyterian church, and for twenty years or more a ruling elder.

Politically, Mr. McCrea was a strong Whig of the Henry Clay school. He was, in 1845, elected by the legislature as associate judge of Pickaway county—a position which he held until his death.

His life closed September 4, 1874. His widow is still living.

The children of Matthew and Agnes McCrea were eight in number. Three died in infancy. The others were Adam, born August 19, 1821; Joseph, born December 14, 1827; Eveline Amanda, born March 24, 1829; William, born March 22, 1831; and George, born December 9, 1834. Of these, Joseph and Eveline Amanda, are deceased; William is living in Illinois, George in St. Louis, and Adam in Circleville.

ADAM McCREA.

Adam McCrea, eldest son of Matthew and Agnes McCrea, passed his boyhood at the home of his parents, and in the year 1837, when sixteen years of age, entered the preparatory department of Miami university, and graduated in the summer of 1842. During the latter part of his college course he read law, and when he returned to his home, entered an office for the purpose of studying for the profession; but in the spring of 1843 he abandoned the study of law to gratify the wish of his father, and entered actively in the business of farming, in which he continued until after the death of his father, in the fall of 1847. In January, 1848, he purchased an interest in a dry goods store with N. J. Turney. This partnership existed for two years, when Mr. C. F. Machir bought out Turney's interest. The firm was then McCrea & Machir, and continued for but one year. Upon Mr. Machir's retiracy from the firm, Mr. McCrea associated with himself his brother Joseph, who remained in partnership with him for six years. After that he took his brother George into partnership, and they continued to conduct the business until 1871. Shortly after that Adam McCrea removed to the city of New York, where he remained for over two years. In the winter of 1873–4, he returned to Ohio, and on the first of April, 1874, became proprietor of the Pickaway House, which position he continues to occupy up to the present time.

Mr. McCrea was, politically, a Whig, up to the time the Republican party was organized, when he became one of its adherents. He is one of the old members of the Central Presbyterian church, and has been for many years one of its ruling elders. He was first elected to serve in this capacity after the death of his father, and to fill the place made vacant by his decease. He remained in this office until his removal to New York, and since his return to Circleville has been re-elected, and is at present holding that position. For twenty years prior to his removal to the east he was superintendent of the Presbyterian church Sunday-school, and president of the Pickaway county Bible society. He has been an untiring and valuable worker in these fields of labor, and in consideration of his services was constituted a life director of the American Bible society, and of the Presbyterian board of foreign missions. Mr. McCrea was one of the earlier members of the board of education of Circleville, and president of the board for seven years; and while holding that office the first class in the high school was graduated.

Mr. McCrea was married January 18, 1846, to Isabella, daughter of Mr. Daniel and Janet Sterling Turney. They have had four children, three of whom died in infancy or early childhood. The first, Janet Denny, was born June 14, 1847, and died October 5th, of the same year. Matthew was born August 9, 1849, and died April 6, 1850. Nelson Turney, born November 12, 1850, and is at present associated with his father in business. Fannie Delano, born July 12, 1855; died August 7, 1860.

have ever engaged in the same in the county of Pickaway.

Four tanneries had been in existence in Circleville, before the one carried on, as already stated, by A. Cradlebaugh, in the rear of his hotel; one of the four having been owned by the same Mr. Cradlebaugh, the others by James Bell, James Long and Robert Hayes.

The manufacture of cabinet-ware, chairs, shoes and hats, was carried on here by a good many different parties, from thirty to fifty years ago. In the Circleville Herald and Olive Branch, for September 4, 1830, we find the advertisement of G. W. and F. Myers, cabinet-makers; of George Wildbahn, cabinet and chair maker, and of Joseph Landes, hat manufacturer. The latter calls for "one or two good boys, sixteen or seventeen years of age, as apprentices to the hatting business."

Robert Hall, where G. H. Fickardt's drug store now is, had a shoe shop in which some twenty hands were employed. Mr. Fickardt remembers to have seen as many as sixty journeymen shoemakers going about the city in a body, "on a strike." This is probably four or five times as many as are now employed in all the six shops at present carried on in the city.

Hargus creek was once an important factor in the manufacturing interests of Circleville, the machinery of the saw-mills, carding and woolen-mills, mentioned in this article, having been propelled by the power of that stream. Now, however, it has shrunk to such a diminutive size, that it could no longer aspire to the dignity of a mill-stream, even if its power were never so much needed. Creeks, therefore, as well as men, may join in the complaint of the ancient poet:

"Tempora mutantur, et nos mutamur in illis."

MASONRY.*

The Masonic order of this city ranks as one of the original institutions of the county, its organization being two years prior to the incorporation of the then town of Circleville, and its records, aside from those of the county, are probably the oldest now extant, that were made in Pickaway county, and, valuable as they would be for reference, the minutes of the lodge for the first few years have been misplaced, and cannot now be found. From the proceedings of the grand lodge of the State, in session at Chillicothe, General Lewis Cass presiding, we learn that on Monday, January 4, 1813, "a petition from a number of master Masons residing in the county of Pickaway, praying to be erected into a lodge in the town of Circleville, in said county, to be called Pickaway Lodge, No. —, was handed in and read, whereupon it was referred to brothers Merwin, McArthur and Dillon to make a report, and on Tuesday, January 5, this committee reported as follows:

"The committee to whom was referred the petition of sundry brethren of Circleville and vicinity, have taken into consideration the same, and are of opinion that the prayer of the petitioners ought to be granted. They would recommend that a dispensation be issued accordingly.

(Signed) E. B. MERWIN, Chairman."

On motion, the report was agreed to. Accordingly, a dispensation was issued, and a lodge was organized soon thereafter, to be known as Pickaway Lodge, No. —, with the following officers, to-wit: Ralph Osborn, W. M.; Peter Parcell, S. W.; James Renick, J. W.; Jonathan Renick, treasurer; Richard Douglas, secretary; James Russel, S. D.; Ira W. Pier, J. D.; Able Renick, tyler. In addition to the above the following master Masons were returned at the annual meeting of the grand lodge, in Chillicothe, January 3, 1814, viz.: Wm. Renick, Wm. Seymour, James Denny, Geo. Brown; and the following fellowcrafts: Wm. Florence, Johnson Hunter, James Bell and James R. Hulse. The lodge began its labors February 6, 1813, James Bell being the first member initiated. At the annual communication of the grand lodge of Ohio, held at Masons' hall, in the town of Chillicothe, M. W. Henry Brush presiding, January 2, 1815, Ralph Osborn, of Pickaway lodge, delivered to the grand secretary the dispensation of said lodge, and moved that the grand lodge do grant said lodge a charter in lieu thereof, which upon being seconded, passed without division. On the following day, January 3, 1815, a charter was issued to be known as Pickaway Lodge, No. 23, with the following brethren as charter members, viz.: Ralph Osborn, Peter Parcels, James Renick, James Denny, Jonathan Renick, James Russel, James Bell and James Keller. The charter is signed by M. W. Henry Brush, G. M.; Jacob Burnett, D. G. M., pro tem.; Edward W. Tupper, S. G. W.; Levin Belt, J. G. W.; David Kinkead, G. T.; and Robert Kerchival, G. S.

In consequence of the loss of the journal for the four years succeeding its organization, but little is known of the many inconveniences, trials and tribulations an organization of this character was subjected to during these infantile years of both the society and the State.

Before the order became the owner of a lodge room, they met in the dwelling standing on the southwest corner of Scioto and High North streets (now occupied by George W. Sapp), afterwards occupying a room in the court house that stood in the center of the old circle. At a regular communication July 7, brother Henry Sage presiding, the following resolution was adopted, to-wit:

Resolved, That it is expedient to appropriate the funds of the lodge to the building of a lodge room, in connection with a school-house, if sufficient funds can be raised to complete a building for that purpose."

Whereupon a committee of five, consisting of brothers Huston, Doane, Kinnear, Bell and Leiby, were appointed to solicit subscriptions and report at a special meeting. Subsequent reports fail to show what success this committee met with, further than at the special meeting referred to, the lodge ordered the appointment of a building committee consisting of brothers Huston, Bell, Webb, Kinnear and Wolfley. This committee was authorized to contract for furnishing the upper part of the building for lodge purposes, which cost the lodge sixty-five dollars and twenty-three and three-fourth cents, and the building (the upper story) cost the lodge the modest sum of four hundred and forty dollars and seventy-three and a half cents, making a total outlay to the lodge of five hundred and five dollars and ninety-seven and one-fourth cents. The lodge moved into this hall in 1825, and June 24th, of the same year, it was dedicated by the grand lodge of the State.

*By S. B. Evans.

The lodge continued to meet here until 1845, and on Tuesday evening, March 4th, of that year, a communication was received from Edson B. Olds, offering to sell to the lodge the third story of the building over the stores of Lyman N. Olds, William Tripplet and Sage & Dunkin, for the sum of one thousand, five hundred dollars. At the regular communication, March 19th, a committee, consisting of Joseph G. Doddridge, J. A. Roof and H. N. Hedges, jr., appointed February 24th, in reference to the purchase, were ordered to contract with Mr. Olds at the price named, which was accomplished March 24, 1845, and June 18th a contract for finishing the new hall was let to Messrs. Gephart and Hartz for the sum of one hundred and twelve dollars, with Thrall, Sage and G. C. Gephart as building committee.

Friday, August 22, 1845, the new hall was dedicated by the grand lodge of the State, M. W. William B. Thrall, G. M., presiding, after which an oration was delivered by brother William B. Hubbard (G. H. P. of Grand Chapter), at the English Lutheran church, on Franklin street. This lodge room was used, uninterruptedly, for thirty-two years for masonic purposes.

On the first day of April, 1874, the lodge bought of Mr. and Mrs. John Henry, for the sum of six thousand dollars, the premises upon which now stands the beautiful temple erected in 1875–6.

February 23, 1874, a joint stock company was incorporated under the name of "The Masonic Temple Association of Circleville, Ohio," by Samuel W. Courtright, Samuel B. Evans, William E. Bolin, Charles F. Krimmel, William F. Hurst, and John H. Bortz. The capital stock was twenty thousand dollars, divided into shares of ten dollars each, the lodge subscribing six thousand dollars, and, in consideration thereof, transferred to the association the lot upon which the temple stands. The remainder of the stock was mostly subscribed by members of the lodge. The corner-stone was laid by Pickaway lodge, on Thursday, July 29, 1875, by brother S. W. Courtright, grand master by proxy, and on Tuesday evening, July 3, 1877, the lodge, headed by Wittich's cornet band, marched from the old to the new hall, and after prayer by Rev. brother James T. Franklin, the members, and a large concourse of ladies and gentlemen, were addressed by brothers C. F. Krimmel, I. N. Abernathy, and S. W. Courtright.

The building was erected by Vorys Brothers, of Lancaster, Ohio, at a cost of twenty-two thousand dollars, under the supervision of brothers N. J. Turney, S. A. Moore, and W. E. Bolin as building committee, with J. T. Harris, of Columbus, Ohio, architect. The structure is forty-six feet wide by one hundred and ten feet long, and three stories high. The first story, since the completion, has been occupied by Amos Beach, on the north side, with a grocery store, and Darius Pierce, on the south side, with dry goods. The second story is used for offices, and the third story for masonic purposes exclusively. The lodge room proper is forty-three feet wide, sixty feet long, and the ceiling twenty-four feet in the clear. After the brethren had their hall and adjoining rooms magnificently carpeted and furnished, at the stated communication of the lodge, February 5, 1879, it was unanimously decided publicly to dedicate it to masonic purposes, and, on motion, a committee of arrangements was appointed, consisting of brothers N. J. Turney, John Boyer, J. N. Abernathy, S. Ward, and A. R. Bolin. Brother S. B. Evans was subsequently added to the committee.

The committee and other members of the order worked unremittingly for the affair, and had the satisfaction of seeing their efforts crowned with abundant success. Citizens seemed to vie with the members of the order in trying to make the city appear in its most lovely holiday attire. Arches and banners spanned the streets in every direction. The day was clear, bright and warm. At half past ten o'clock, forenoon, Pickaway lodge was opened in due form in the temple, and, at eleven o'clock, the grand lodge of the State having first assembled in Odd Fellows' hall, M. W. Grand Master William M. Cunningham presiding, entered, accompanied by P. G. M. brother Robert Morris, of Kentucky, took possession of and proceeded to dedicate the new hall in due and ancient form; after which a procession was formed and marched to the fair grounds, where a sumptuous dinner was served; succeeding which, an oration was delivered by brother Robert Morris, of Kentucky.

The above are a few of the many points of interest connected with the rise and progress of the order in this city; and it is but justice to the memory of such veteran members as brothers Daniel Turney, Guy W. Doane, William B. Thrall, S. S. Denny, E. Webb, N. Franklin, Matthias Robbins, Andrew Huston, Henry Sage, George C. Gephart, William Leiby, D. Kinnear, P. K. Hull, and a host of others, that their names should be inscribed on the roll of honor; for rarely did a meeting occur that they were not in attendance for many years subsequent to the organization. It is also worthy of record that, during all the long and bitter persecution of the order, from 1826 to 1835, the members of old Pickaway never failed to "meet upon the level and part upon the square."

Brother William B. Thrall was honored with the office of M. W. Grand Master of the State four successive years—1843, 1844, 1845, and 1846.

There are enrolled upon the roster of Pickaway lodge, at the present time, one hundred and forty-nine master Masons in good standing, four fellow-crafts, and three entered apprentices. The following are the present officers: Samuel B. Evans, W. M.; A. R. Bolin, S. W.; William A. Griner, J. W.; B. H. Moore, treasurer; H. R. Clarke, secretary; J. D. Newton, S. D.; J. D. Yeager, J. D.; Germain Joseph and Thomas R. Bill, stewards; Peter Barnedt, tyler.

Stated communications first and third Wednesday evenings of each month.

CIRCLEVILLE CHAPTER NO. 20, R. A. M.

February 23, 1830, a number of R. A. Masons met at the office of James D. Caldwell and organized by selecting James D. Caldwell chairman, and William B. Thrall secretary. Resolutions were adopted expressive of the feeling of members regarding the organization of a chapter of R. A. Masons in Circleville, which resulted in the appointment of the following committee (to superintend the preparation of the hall for the conferring of chapter degrees): H. Sage, J. D. Caldwell, and W. B. Thrall. The following companions were appointed to be the first officers: H. Sage, H. P.; W. B. Thrall, K.; Andrew Huston, S.; Otho M. Herron, C. H.; J. D. Caldwell, P. S.; Matthias Robbins, R. A.; Captain James R. Hulse, M. F. V.; Andrew Shaughnissey, M. S. V.; and Nelson Franklin, M. T. V.

The first meeting under the dispensation was held May 17, 1830, for the purpose of adopting by-laws. At the same time the following petitions were received and referred, to wit: brothers James W. Finley, John Cochran, and Seymour G. Renick. No degrees were conferred until the seventh of June, 1830, when all the degrees of the chapter were conferred on James W. Finley, John Cochran, and George A. Patterson. January 5th, A. L. 5831, a charter was granted to the above-named companions, to be known as Circleville Chapter No. 20, R. A. M., signed by John Scatterthwaite, G. H. P. P.; William Gwynn, D. G. H. P. P.; Timothy Baker, G. K. P.; Henry Sage, G. S. P.; John L. Starling, G. S.

In 1834 companion H. Sage was called upon to preside over the deliberations of the grand chapter of the State. He was succeeded by companion William B. Thrall, who was again honored by his companions with the office of M. E. G. H. P. in 1839.

Circleville chapter has steadily grown in numbers, until now there are ninety companions enrolled. This body has also invested its surplus capital in masonic-temple stock. The meetings have always been held in the same hall with the lodge. The present officers are: S. B. Evans, H. P.; W. C. Finkel, K.; John Boyen, S.; B. H. Moore, T.; T. K. Wittich, S.; Palmer Lowe, C. H.; A. R. Bolin, P. S.; Ger. Joseph, R. A. C.; I. N. Abernathy, G. M. T. V.; A. Smith, G. M. S. V.; W. H. Moyst, G. M. F. V.; P. Barnedt, G.

Regular meetings first Monday evening of each month.

TYRIAN COUNCIL NO. 7, R. AND S. M.

Wm. J. Reese, puissant grand master of the grand council of Ohio, on the seventeenth day of May, 1838, issued his dispensation to Wm. B. Thrall, T. I. G. M.; John H. Tennant, D. I. G. M.; George C. Gephart, P. C. of W., and Henry Sage, Wm. Y. Emmett, D. Kinnear, M. Robbins, S. Diffendaffer, and J. M. Milligan, royal and select master Masons. They were recommended by Lancaster Council No. 4, to organize a council of R. and S. M. in this city, as to be known as Tyrian Council No. —. The first meeting under authority of dispensation, was held in the lodge hall, Academy building, May 17, 1838. Petitions for degrees were received from R. A. masons, as follows: P. K. Hull, J. Case, G. Bruner, G. Botkin, E. Kirkbride, H. S. Chenoweth, J. W. Julian, D. Bruner, J. C. Hunter, and G. Tey. A charter was granted Tyrian Council No. 7, by the grand council, convened at Lancaster, June 22, 1838.

The last record of Tyrian Council No. 7, was made April 6, 1846. The funds were transferred to Pickaway lodge, F. and A. M., for use of hall.

Tyrian council was reorganized March 20, 1872, by a special dispensation from Jos. B. Conrad, puissant grand master of Ohio, to companions E. Z. Hays, as T. I. G. M.; S. A. Moore, D. I. G. M.; A. Smith, P. C. of W.; also J. T. Duncan, H. N. Hedges, jr., Jacob Rutter, Jason Case, W. B. Thrall, and Nelson J. Turney, all royal and select masters.

The council was constituted March 22, 1872, by companion Oristes A. B. Senter, by proxy from P. G. M. Jos. B. Conrad. A charter was issued by grand council, in session at Columbus, on the twelfth day of October, A. D., 1872, to Tyrian council No. 60, R. and S. M., signed by Jos. B. Conrad, P. G. M., and it was duly constituted by companion O. A. B. Senter, by proxy of Grand Master Jos. B. Conrad, January 21, 1873. The first petitions were presented by companions J. D. Courtright, S. B. Evans, S. W. Courtright, George R. Miller, T. K. Wittich, B. H. Moore, John Courtright, and P. Lowe.

Companion S. W. Courtright was elected thrice illustrious grand master of the grand council of the State for three years in succession, 1875–76, and '77. The present enrollment numbers fifty.

The present officers are: S. B. Evans, Q. I. M.; P. Lowe, D. I. M.; A. Smith, P. C. of W.; Germain Joseph, treasurer; W. C. Finkel, recorder; W. H. Moyst, C. of G.; J. N. Abernathy, C. of C.; Acker King, steward; James O'Neal, sentinel.

Regular meetings second Thursday in each month.

ODD FELLOWS.

Columbia Lodge, No. 32, I. O. O. F., of Circleville, Ohio, was instituted on Monday evening, August 12, 1844, in the lodge room of the Masonic fraternity, in the second story of the old academy, by Joseph Pheris, acting as most worthy grand master of the State of Ohio, assisted by a number of the brethren of Charity Lodge, No. 27, and Chillicothe Lodge, No. 24, in accordance with the established usages of the order, and a warrant delivered to Peter S. Hoffman, Asa Spurgeon, George Umbaugh, Henry A. McCulloch and William Medcraft as charter members. An election was held, and the following officers were elected and installed: Peter S. Hoffman, N. G.; Henry A. McCullough, V. G.; William Medcraft, secretary; Samuel Marfield, treasurer. On the same night the petitions of the following persons were received and favorably acted upon, and the petitioners, being in waiting, were regularly initiated into the order, to wit.: Justus B. Bell, George Wilmore, John Brotherlin, Joseph L. Redd, Farus Crouse, W. N. Skinner, James H. Ladd, David Leonard and Samuel Marfield. The only surviving charter member is Peter S. Hoffman, who now resides in Indiana; and of those who joined the first night, the only survivors are J. B. Bell, George Wilmore and Samuel Marfield, the last-named being the only one of these who still retains membership in the lodge.

The first quarterly election was held September 20, 1844, when the following brothers were elected and installed: H. A. McCullugh, N. G.; William Medcraft, V. G.; J. B. Bell; secretary; Samuel Marfield, treasurer; J. Redd, warden; George Wilmore, conductor; John Brotherlin; O. G.; H. S. Chenoweth, I. G.; S. H. Olds, R. S. S.; L. N. Olds, L. S. S.; F. Crouse, R. S. to N. G.; George H. Fickardt, L. S. to N. G.; Jas. H. Ladd, R. S. to V. G., and David Leonard, L. S. to V. G.

In October, 1844, the lodge, having rented and furnished two rooms in the third story of Dr. Olds' block, commenced to hold meetings there, and continued to do so until the fall of 1862, when they purchased the block on the corner of Court and Main streets, now known as "Odd Fellows' block," and moved into it. The purchase was stoutly opposed by a number of the members, but that it was a judicious investment is shown by the fact that the revenue of the block has paid over half of the purchase money, the taxes, insurance, and the cost of all the improvements, besides adding to the lodge fund. The property is now valued at twenty thousand dollars, being one of the finest locations for business in the city. At the present writing, the lodge has a larger widow and orphan fund than any other lodge in the State.

The first death that occurred among the members of the lodge was that of John B. George, who died December 28, 1845, and was buried with the honors of the order, December 30th.

Although not as large, numerically, as a great many others, the lodge is built upon a good foundation, financially, and has become one of the permanent institutions of Circleville. The lodge building is an ornament to the city, and, with few exceptions, will compare favorably with any in the State. Its prosperity is, in a great measure, due to the prudent and careful management and business oversight of its property trustee, brother William Doane.

Its present officers are as follows: Hiram B. Denny, N. G.; Jacob D. Hedges, V. G.; Orin F. Thompson, R. S.; Alfred Pedrick, F. S.; William Bauder, treasurer. Number of contributing members, one hundred and fifty-eight. Number connected with Odd Fellows' benevolent association at Columbus and Zanesville, eighty-nine.

ENCAMPMENT.

Pickaway Encampment, No. 11, I. O. O. F., was instituted in the hall of Columbia lodge, on the evening of April 21, 1846, by Isaac Hefley, grand chief patriarch of the grand encampment of Ohio. The following were the petitioners for a charter: Edson B. Olds, Thomas Brown, L. H. Olds, John Brotherlin, L. N. Olds, A. P. Howe, James M. Pratt and Wilson Baker. After the encampment was regularly instituted, an election of officers was held, which resulted as follows: Edson B. Olds, C. P.; L. N. Olds, H. P.; A. P. Howe, S. W.; John Brotherlin, J. W.; Wilson Baker, scribe; James M. Pratt, treasurer. The result having been declared, these officers elect were duly installed into their respective offices. Applications for membership being received from Michael Strayer, John Maiden, Justin B. Bell and C. M. Foresman, the applicants were elected and initiated the same evening.

The following are the present officers; Jacob D. Hedges, C. P.; George Krim, H. P.; John Wholoner, S. W.; Emanuel Rife, J. W.; William R. Lilly, scribe; D. B. Wagner, treasurer. Number of contributing members, one hundred and forty-seven.

LOGAN GRANGE.

The third organization of the sort in Pickaway county, and the only one ever established in Circleville, was organized June 20, 1878, by Deputy Newton Rector, of Deer Creek township. The officers appointed were as follows: Bentley Groce, master; M. V. B. Lindsey, overseer; L. E. Scoville, lecturer; Amos Dunkle, steward; John Greene, assistant steward; John L. Lindsey, chaplain; J. T. Nending, treasurer; W. S. McCollister, secretary; Adam Wegerly, gate-keeper; Mrs. Bentley Groce, pomona; Mrs. W. S. McCollister, flora; Mrs. Isaac W. Stage, stewardess.

The organization has become essentially defunct. The last master was elected in 1877. The last secretary was Ira May, elected in the same year.

KNIGHTS OF PYTHIAS.

The Knights of Pythias lodge was instituted in the city of Circleville January 19, 1874. It is known as Philos Lodge, No. 64. The charter members were Wm. Doane, M. K. Marshall, S. A. Collins, J. W. Irwin, J. P. Todd, C. F. Krimmel, W. H. Nichols, Jos. S. Collins, M. B. Radcliff, S. A. Swineheart, S. B. Evans, T. J. Stevens, B. H. Moore, W. F. Tolbert, E. B. Bauder, C. B. Tyler, Geo. Krinn, E. E. Winship, J. C. Redman, J. Z. Krimmel, A. Smith, A. T. Anderson, Z. A. Meeker, A. H. Rouland, Wm. Simpson, T. K. Wittich and Noah Weaver.

The first officers of the Lodge were: Wm. Doane, P. C.; M. K. Marshall, C. C.; E. B. Bauder, V. C.; J. W. Irwin, P.; E. E. Winship, M. of E.; J. Z. Krimmel, M. of F.; Jos. S. Collins, K. of R. and S.; C. F. Krimmel, M. of A.; C. B. Tyler, J. G.; Wm. Simpson, O. G. Since the lodge was instituted they have lost by death brother knights: S. A. Swineheart and K. C. Peeples.

The Lodge has a fine, though not large, membership, and is in a good financial condition. The present number of members in good standing is forty six.

The present officers, July 7, 1879, are as follows: C. B. Tyler, P. C.; S. B. Evans, C. C.; J. F. Zerch, V. C.; E. E. Bock, P.; M. Hammel, M. of E.; W. F. Tolbert, M. of F.; T. J. Stephens, M. of A.; M. K. Marshall, J. G.; Wm. Simpson, O. G. lodge representative: M. K. Marshall. Trustees: Wm. Doane, M. H. Moore, T. J. Stephens.

THE COLORED MASONS.

St. James Lodge No. 8, F. and A. M., was organized on the 23rd of May, 1866, by R. W. David Jenkins, D. G. M., with nine charter members, viz: George Blok, W. M.; John Dickerson, S. W.; Henry Stonup, J. W.; John Thornton, treasurer; R. H. Irving, secretary; George Hacket, S. D.; Lorrence Gornes, J. D.; Henry Nickens, tiler; and R. L. M. Hogan, acting as a chaplain. The degrees conferred at the organization were at an occasional lodge opened in the office of Dr. Brooks, on Main street, now occupied by the Union-Herald printing office. On the 20th of June, 1867, this lodge received its warrant at the annual meeting of the grand lodge, held at Xenia, O., J. W. Goff, G. M.; and J. R. Blackburn, G. S. John Dickerson was its first master under the warrant, and he has held that position every term since, save two. After the organization the lodge occupied a part of the Niles warehouse, where they fitted up a nice hall and leased it for five years, from the then owner, Captain Wm. Triplet. He became financially embarrassed, and the brethren had to seek another place of meeting, which they did by securing the south rooms of the third story of Olds' block, on the corner of Court and Main streets, which place they have occupied since, save the years 1875 and 1876. The lodge now consists of nineteen members with I. N. Lucas, W. M.; Wm. Stonup, S. W.; A. Haithcock, J. W.; F. V. Lewis, treasurer; Wm. Mitchell, secretary; Geo. Henderson, S. D.; E. Mitchell, J. D.; L. Gaines, S. S.; L. Woody, J. S.; and H. Harvey, tyler.

KNIGHTS OF HONOR.

Scioto Lodge No. 1370, Knights of Honor, was instituted on the evening of February 12, 1879, in Circleville, Ohio, by brother G. D. J. King, of Westerville, Ohio, acting grand district deputy dictator. The first dictator of said lodge was Rev. C. M. Bethauser. The present officers are: H. E. Grand Girard, dictator; Milt Morris, vice-dictator; A. J. Grigsby, assistant dictator; S. L. Grigsby, reporter; George W. Bauder, financial reporter; James Harsha, treasurer; C. B. Tyler, guide; S. M. Lewis, guardian; William Simpson, sentinel; John C. King, medical examiner; Hon. Samuel W. Courtright, representative to grand lodge; S. L. Grigsby, Geo. W. Downs, William A. Chaney, trustees. There were twenty-four charter members. It now has a membership of thirty-one. Meetings on the first and third Tuesday evenings in every month, held in Odd Fellows' hall.

RED MEN.

W. BOLSTON, G. J. S.
W. E. R. KEMP, G. P.
CHARLES S. RITTS, G. C. R.
GEORGE A. PETER, G. K. W.

This tribe now numbers forty-four members in good standing. The past sachems of the tribe are as follows: S. W. Courtright, William Doane, I. P. Todd, S. A. Swinehart, E. E. Winship, Levi Hammel, William Veith, R. C. Peoples, Charles Roth, M. K. Marshall, James Brown and Jarvis Conor.

The present officers are: George Macready, sachem; G. L. Shipley, S. S.; William Birch, J. S.; James Brown, prophet.

Following are the names of members who have died since the tribe was instituted: B. F. Thomas (S. S.), G. W. Throne, S. A. Swinehart (P. S.), Henry Douthty, R. C. Peoples (P. S.).

This organization is in good standing, and good working order.

PUBLIC LIBRARY.

The nucleus of this library was formed by the Young Men's Christian association, a society which, having existed for some years, was disbanded in 1873. On the sixth of March, in that year, they donated their books, amounting to several hundred volumes, to the city council. It was not, however, until the following year that a regular organization was effected under the Ohio State law of 1868. The first board of managers, appointed in that year, was as follows: W. Marshall Anderson, president; W. B. Marfield, secretary and treasurer; Mayor George R. Miller, D. B. Barks, W. E. Bolin, C. C. Neibling, and E. D. Bowers. A room in Odd Fellows' building was leased by the council for the use of the library, and Mrs. Mary Carper was appointed librarian—an office which she has ever since held. A large addition has recently been made to the number of books, which now amount to about three thousand, besides the leading magazines. The interest manifested in this important means of public instruction and enjoyment, is in a high degree creditable to the city.

The names of the present board of managers are the following: C. A. Helwagen, president; William Drum, secretary and treasurer; Mayor I. P. Todd, W. Marshall Anderson, W. B. Marfield, Charles E. Groce and M. Hoover.

THE CITY BUILDING.

This is a fine brick structure, with a slate roof, situated on the corner of Court and Franklin streets, opposite the court house. It was commenced in the spring of 1860, and finished in June of the following year. It is three stories high, thirty-eight feet in width, fronting on Court street, by seventy-five in length, on Franklin. William Doane was the designer of the plan and the superintendent of construction; and both the design and the execution are creditable to his artistic and mechanical skill.

The front part of the lower story is occupied as an engine room of the fire department. The mayor's office is in the west end, fronting on Franklin street. The second story is occupied by the council room, solicitor and clerk's office, and room for city engineer. On the third floor are three neatly furnished rooms to accommodate the members of the several fire companies; and in the basement, under the mayor's office, is the city prison.

The whole, though far enough from being pretentious, is very creditable to the city, and was evidently built to last. The cost was fifteen thousand dollars, including the furniture of the mayor's office, council room, and city prison. But the building shows for considerably more than this money, as it was very economically built, the work being let in parts to several mechanics, by a committee of the city council.

THE FLORAL NURSERY AND GREENHOUSE.

The love of flowers is an indication of a refined nature; and the community that fosters their cultivation by giving a generous support to those who have made it a study and a business, is one in which cultivated people would choose to live.

The Circleville greenhouse was established in 1868 by John Stein, an educated florist and gardener, from Strasburg, in Germany. The floral garden consists of about two acres, in which are cultivated a large variety of flowering plants, and the large greenhouse is well filled with rare exotics. Mr. Stein carried on the business very successfully for about eight years, and succeeded in accumulating from it a very handsome little property. But in the fall of 1875, from too close an application to business, he contracted a painful disease (inflammatory rheumatism) which, after more than a year and a half of suffering, terminated fatally. He died, July, 1877, in Florida, whither he had gone, like Ponce de Leon, in seareh of the fountain of health and youth, which, like the same enthusiastic explorer, he found only the grave.

The writer of this cherishes a grateful remembrance of Mr. Stein, with whom it was his good fortune to be intimately associated during three pleasant years, in central New York. To the happiness of those years Mr. Stein largely contributed, by his fine social qualities, his rare fund of information, and (more than all) his generous christian culture. It is a pleasant and altogether fitting coincidence, that his mortal remains should now be reposing in the "flowery land;" but it is still more pleasant to think of his immortal spirit enjoying, in a state of conscious felicity, the rest of paradise,

> "Where everlasting spring abides,
> And never-fading flowers"— flowers of which those he here loved so well, are only the faint type and resemblance.

In May, 1877, the nursery and greenhouse were sold to John Stevens, who is the present proprietor.

A RARE LITERARY AND SCIENTIFIC ENTERPRISE.

We deem it a pleasure, as well as a duty, to notice a rare literary venture which would be noteworthy, even if undertaken in any of our great intellectual centers, and by our most celebrated scientific men. But emanating from a small "provincial town," remote from great literary institutions and publishing houses, and conceived by the courageous minds of two young ladies previously unknown to fame, it is simply marvelous. We refer to an illustrated serial work (only one number of which has as yet been issued) on an important branch of ornithology, thus far slightly treated, with the following title: "Illustrations of Nests and Eggs of Birds of Ohio, with Text: By Genevieve E. Jones and Eliza J. Shultze."

The recent sad and widely lamented death of Miss Jones will not, we understand, interrupt the progress of the work—her mother, who is amply qualified for it (and from whom her own rare qualifications were largely derived), having consented to take her place.

In their "announcement" to the public, the authors make the following statements, which embody their estimate of the work they have undertaken:

> "The innumerable difficulties of such an undertaking, have heretofore discouraged all attempts in this direction, and to-day this work stands alone, the only publication of the kind in America."
>
> "When completed, the volume will contain an illustration and description of the nest (if a nest is constructed) and eggs of each species known to breed in the limits of the State. This will comprise about seventy plates and two hundred pages of reading matter, and when bound will be one of the most beautiful and desirable works that has ever appeared in the United States, upon any branch of natural history."

And that this is only a moderate self-appreciation, is fully evinced by the concurrent testimony of the leading American ornithologists, to whose judgment the first part has been submitted. This is from Dr. Brewster: "If the high standard of excellence established in Part I. be maintained throughout the succeeding numbers, the work, when completed, can scarcely fail to take rank high above anything of the kind that has appeared in this country." This from Dr. Cones: "I had no idea that so sumptuous and elegant a publication was in preparation, and I am pleased that what promises to be one of the great illustrated works on North American ornithology, should be prepared by women." And this from Mr. Minot: "My enthusiasm has not been so excited for a long while. After careful consideration, I can think of no book of natural history, in which the beauties of art and of nature are so largely combined."

Although we do not feel qualified confidently to predict the pecuniary success of this volume, yet we have no hesitancy in saying that it ought to succeed. But whether it succeeds or fails, the undertaking is an honor to Circleville, and well worthy of a place in its history.

We trust that we violate no confidence when we state that the text which accompanies the illustrations in this book, is from the facile pen of Dr. Howard E. Jones, brother of the lamented young lady to whom the inception of the work is largely due.

AN OBLITERATED VILLAGE.

The town of Livingston was laid out about the year 1805, by Daniel Dreisbach, in what is now the southeast corner of Circleville township. It thus had the start of the town of Circleville by six or seven years, and, if it was born in Heath, Franklin county, Massachusetts, December 16, 1814, of Scotch-Irish parentage. He was the third son, and fourth child, of William and Lovina Thompson, who were natives of Coleraine, Massachusetts. His mother's maiden name was Caldwell. She was the daughter of Joseph Caldwell, who was one of the earliest settlers of Coleraine.

His boyhood was spent upon his father's farm. He had the advantages of the common schools of the day, and attended two terms at Whiting Griswold's high school. With such educational facilities, he was enabled to acquire a good general knowledge of the common branches, and an acquaintance with mathematics and the natural sciences, sufficient for all practical purposes of life. At a very early age he began teaching in the district schools, during the winter, working on the farm during the summer time. The social peculiarities of the community in which he was born, had a more powerful influence upon his character, in its development, than his education in the schools. It is related of Heyne, that he knew of but one essential for making a scholar: "He should be able to read;" all else could be acquired by application. To learn to read, a teacher is necessary; having learned this, the thoughtful student has in his possession the master-key which unlocks everything else. Dr. Thompson was born in a community known far and wide for its intelligence and stern christian morality. Catechetical training by the "country parson," and, at the fireside, by the parents, was the common custom of the times. The Bible was the text-book, on reading, in the common schools. Men were brought daily to the consideration of the highest problems of duty to God and humanity. Discussion of theological questions was the evening pastime of neighbors when they met, during the long winter evenings. Among such surroundings, at first a listener, at last a participant, the young man grew, and without knowing it, had become an acute reasoner, and no mean antagonist in debate. He knew things, but not definitions. There was a lack of polish, but there was strength. Men grew up self-reliant, conscientious and competent—fitted for any sphere. This was his preparation for the study of medicine.

In February, 1838, he became the student of Wayne Griswold, of Whitingham, Vermont, who, subsequently held an enviable practice in Circleville, where he died in 1873. In the fall of 1838, he attended his first course of lectures, at Pittsfield, Massachusetts, in the Berkshire medical college. After the close of the lectures, he became the pupil of Hon. S. W. Williams, M. D., of Deerfield, Massachusetts, a man who, at that time, had few peers, and no superiors, in the medical profession of Massacusetts. In October, 1839, he came to Ohio, and completed his medical course under the direction of his brother, J. C. Thompson, M. D., of South Bloomfield, Ohio. During the winters of 1839-40, and 1840-41, he attended lectures in the Medical College of Ohio, at Cincinnati, where he received his degree, M. D., in 1841. He took the highest stand in his class in the studies of anatomy and chemistry.

He located in the practice of medicine at Kingston, Ohio, in June, 1841, where he remained till 1859, when he moved to Circleville, where he has ever since, with the exception of a few months, been in the active practice of his profession. During his residence in Circleville he has held, much of the time, the largest practice in the county—a portion of the time larger than any one man ever held.

In 1863 he formed a professional partnership with D. N. Kinsman, M. D., who now resides in Columbus, and at its termination, in May, 1866, with the late S. D. Turney, M. D.—this latter arrangement existing nearly six years—in 1877 with George T. Row, M. D., who is still with him.

He has had an active professional life of almost forty years, in a practice both surgical and medical, such as rarely falls to the lot of medical men. The marks of his success are to be seen in the confidence of his patrons, and the affectionate esteem in which he is held. He is a close observer, and possesses a rare faculty of holding in his mind the details of his cases; in this respect we know of no man in our professional acquaintance who is his equal.

Before the discovery of the anæsthetic properties of ether had been published to the world, Dr. Thompson had, for himself, discovered its wonderful power, and introduced its use in labor cases. He was probably the first physician in the Scioto valley to administer chloroform as an anæsthetic; and so, during his entire professional career, he has stood in the ranks of the advanced thinkers, and has kept pace with the rapid developments of modern medical science, both in theory and practice. As is common in a long course of practice, he became confident, self-reliant, though ever ready to gratify the wish of friends, or better the condition of the patient, by accepting the advice of the learned and experienced in his profession; and, in return, was sought as an advisory physician, having, for a long time, held a large consultation practice.

The value of such a life to any community cannot be estimated. In storm and sunshine, by day and night, alike by deeds of kindness and of sympathy, he has shown himself a lover of his fellow man. He has shown himself worthy of being trusted at all times and on all occasions, when the highest courage and promptest decision were required.

In August, 1844, Dr. Thompson was married to Miss Diantha M. Entrekin, of Pickaway county. To them were born three children—Clifton B., Florence L., and Kate C.—all of whom survive their mother, who died in August, 1858.

Dr. Thompson was again married in May, 1860, to Miss Harriet B. Lyon, of Oxford, Ohio. To them have been born four children—Fannie M., Mary E., William G., and Anna E.—all of whom are living.

had not been swallowed up by its more fortunate successor, it might now have been the capital of Pickaway county. We fear that Circleville has a good deal to answer for. It sat down upon the works of a prehistorical race, and crushed them out forever. It sprang up in the neighborhood of two already promising villages (Livingston and Jefferson), just breathed upon them with its more prosperous breath, and they vanished away. But let it not boast itself, as if it alone were immortal. Its destroyer will also come, and all that its peaceful inhabitants, in their present sense of security, can say, is, "After us, the deluge." Livingston became quite a thriving village, containing some thirty or forty families. It had three or four stores, the first established being that of William Carlisle. . John Ely had a silversmith's shop, and the other trades were quite well represented. It was vacated about the year 1830, and the ground which it occupied forms (we believe) a part of the old Ludwig farm. Every trace of it has now disappeared, and when (as may very well happen) some future Goldsmith of the west shall sing its romantic but melancholy fate, he will not call it the "deserted," but the obliterated village.

A MEMENTO OF THE PECULIAR INSTITUTION OF A NEIGHBORING STATE.

While rummaging among the early records in the recorder's office at Circleville, we stumbled upon the following interesting relic, which seemed to us well worthy of a place among our historical collections. It is a deed of manumission, in the form of a will, made by one Edmond Lyne, a slave owner, in Bourbon county, Virginia, November 26, 1791, signed by Thomas West and Richard W. Downing, as witnesses, and admitted to probate, in the county court, the next month, on motion of Harry Innis, the friend and executor of the said Lyne. A copy of the will, and proof, is furnished to Booker, one of the slaves manumitted, (and doubtless to others) to serve as "free papers," with a certificate by the said Innis, as executor—all the copies being attested by Thomas Arnold, clerk of Burbon county.

The inference is that Booker, having strayed into Pickaway county, some nineteen years after the transactions referred to, had the papers recorded, as a matter of precaution, in the recorder's office at this place. The will seems to us exceedingly touching in its quaint simplicity, and must have been written (as is evident from a comparison of the dates) when the testator was very near his end—that "last wish" being, perhaps, almost his last word. The several documents, with their signatures, are as follows:

"Whatever form or mode the State of Virginia may or shall adopt for my appointing my friend, Harry Innis, to govern or execute my design, or forward the execution of this, my last will and testament, is uncertain, as I am not acquainted with the form of law. However, this much I wish to be done. First, after my death, each slave that is in bondage under me, shall be liberated. This far I hope my friend, Harry Innis, will conduct and perform, which is my last wish.

EDMOND LYNE,

THOS. WEST, Nov. 26, 1791.
RICH'D W. DOWNING.

[A copy]. Teste: THOS. ARNOLD, C. B. C.

BOURBON COUNTY, December Court, 1791.

On the motion of Harry Innis, executor of Edmond Lyne, deceased it is ordered to be certified that the slaves emancipated by said document are Matt, about thirty years of age; Dick, about forty ditto; Booker, about twenty-seven ditto; Sarah, about thirty-five ditto; Jemima, about twenty-five ditto; Mill, daughter of Jemima, born Feb. 18, 1787; James, son of ditto, born Sep. 20, 1788, and Lucy, daughter of ditto, born March 3, 1791.

Teste: THOS. ARNOLD, C. B. C.

The bearer hereof is Booker, a slave emancipated by the within will. Witness my hand this 28th day of December, 1791.

HARRY INNIS,
Executor of Edward Lyne.

[A copy.] THOS. ARNOLD, C. B. C.

Here, then, was another noble Virginian, who, like another noble son of the "Mother of Presidents," was not ashamed to acknowledge, by an affecting and impressive act, that he "trembled when he remembered that God is just." This was eight years before the death of the noblest of all the Virginians, who also refused to go out of the world leaving a slave in "bondage under him." If the generous spirit of emancipation, which actuated these men, and which was, at that time, evidently rife throughout the South, had been cherished, instead of being smothered out, the desolating, but, fortunately, unsuccessful rebellion waged two generations later for the perpetuation of slavery, would, happily, have been avoided; and the precious treasure, and still more precious life, which (as elsewhere shown) the county of Pickaway so generously furnished for the suppression of that rebellion, would have been preserved for better uses in happier, if less heroic, days.

COLONEL ANDERSON'S CABINET.

One of the most interesting and instructive institutions of Circleville is the cabinet of Indian curiosities owned by Colonel W. Marshall Anderson. The colonel is deeply versed in all matters pertaining to American archæology. His reading, in this most interesting department of learning, is very extensive, and his personal explorations have been, perhaps, still more extensive. Few men in the west are more familiar than he with the mounds, and other relics of the ancient races, both in this country and Mexico. His cabinet is largely the result of his own explorations, and it has been made the receptacle of similar contributions from his many friends in various parts of the country. His collection is especially rich in articles of ancient American pottery, and probably contains the largest number of entire vessels in that style of primitive art to be found in any existing cabinet. It is well known that the most of the specimens of ancient pottery, taken from the mounds, are found only in fragments. Any eastern antiquary, exploring a mound in the west, would feel himself well repaid for his labor, if he should find a piece of genuine and unmistakable ceramics an inch square. To such a one the large number of entire bowls and other utensils, contained in Colonel Anderson's collection, would be a sight to behold. We regret that we have neither time nor space for an elaborate description of the interesting relics contained in this cabinet, but we advise all our friends to take the first opportunity to see it for themselves. They will find its gifted proprietor accessible, courteous, and affable; and even more entertaining and instructive than the sight of his rare curiosities will be his intelligent and graceful account of them.

CIRCLEVILLE JOTTINGS.

We consider Circleville one of the most pleasantly-shaded towns with which we are acquainted. Almost every street, except in the very center of the business part of the city, is bordered by trees, whose overhanging boughs protect the pedestrian from the heat of the summer sun at all hours of the day. The soft maple, so well adapted to cultivation as a shade tree, from its beautiful form, dense foliage, and rapid growth, is the one most frequently met with here. But the hard maple, elm, and other choice forest trees, common throughout the northern States, have been planted in considerable numbers; and among them, here and there, may be seen that magnificent flowering tree, a native of the south, but fairly acclimated to the winters of this latitude—the catalpa, whose broad, dark-green leaves render it attractive during the entire season, but which, during the month of roses, is made gorgeously beautiful by its great clusters of white blossoms, flecked with yellow and purple.

The walls of the stone church (St. Philip's Episcopal), of several of the brick churches, and many private dwellings built of the same material, are beautifully decorated by that finest of the American climbing plants, known in botany as the Ampelopsis quinquefolia, but commonly called Virginia creeper, or American ivy; and, on some of the finest residences, the experiment of naturalizing the English ivy has been made, but with unsatisfactory results—since that historic plant is not of our winters "to the manor born." A succession of mild seasons had sent it up, in some places, almost to the roof; but the last winter, which was of unusual severity, nearly froze it out, leaving its naked stalks, interspersed here and there with lines of green leaves—a sad defacement upon the walls which they had recently covered with a rare and beautiful decoration.

But while it gives us pleasure to record the instances of good taste in arboriculture, manifested by the people of Circleville, "the truth of history" requires us to make note of one painful exception. We refer to the planting (in only a few localities, however, we are glad to say) of that most unambrosial misnomer, "the tree of heaven;" which, when in blossom, smells as—well (not to put too fine a point upon it) as no tree so named ought to smell. It was our misfortune, while writing a portion of this history, to occupy a room, near the window of which stood one of these Chinese intruders, in full bloom. The tortures we underwent, during that one malodorous week, often led us inwardly to exclaim, with a distinguished statesman of the past generation, "our suffering is intolerable!" If any of our readers have ever endured a tithe of what we then suffered, they will pardon, even though they cannot justify, the apparent uncharitableness of the resolutions which were passed, nem. con., by the general assembly of our own mind, and which we will here put on record, as a warning to the tree importers of future times. They are as follows:

"Resolved, That the man who first brought to our shores that stinking exotic, the Ailantus glandulosa, ought to have been hung to one of its branches till he smelled as bad as the nuisance which he perpetrated upon the country: Provided, it were possible for human carrion to achieve such a miracle of stench.

"Resolved, That the A. g., above named, is one of the Chinese that 'must go.'"

But it is the condition of its streets, walks and alleys, which gives to Circleville its chief pre-eminence over all the cities we have ever seen, without exception. It is literally a mudless city. All the roads leading into it are turnpikes, made of pebbles, or cobble-stones, covered with gravel. All these were once toll-roads, but some of them have been bought up by the county and made free, and the freedom of the others is only a question of time. Every one of the city streets has been skillfully graded, turnpiked, and covered with gravel, of which inexhaustible beds of the very best quality for the purposes of road making, are found in and about the city. Some of these streets furnish drives as luxurious as the famous "shell road" of New Orleans. The gutters are almost everywhere paved and kept unobstructed, so that, after a rain, the water runs off in an incredibly short time. The sidewalks, with which every street is furnished, are of unusual width, and constructed largely of brick—though some are of flagstone and some of a cement made of coal-tar and gravel. And, what would strike our western friends as something marvelous, all the alleys, even, are covered with the last-named ubiquitous material, and kept so free from filth and rubbish that, whenever convenience requires, they are used as thoroughfares both by drivers and pedestrians. We repeat, therefore, what we have already said, in substance, that, as to its streets, walks and alleys, Circlevile may safely challenge comparison with any city in the country.

But, as we felt compelled to notice one exception to the general good taste and judgment manifested by the people of this city in the matter of tree-planting, so we feel bound, as impartial historians, to make note of a somewhat similar exception to the general rule of tidiness in their streets and alleys. We refer to their unaccountable toleration of the pig nuisance. It is proverbial that familiarity with characters deemed respectable sometimes breeds contempt. And we fear that, conversely, familiarity with objects contemptible sometimes breeds, if not respect, at least indifference. And thus it may have come about that a cultivated and refined community, from long familiarity with the pig nuisance, have ceased to be aware that, really, in sense as well as in sound, it is a big nuisance; that hogs of all ages, sizes and colors, grunting and nosing about the streets and sidewalks, in front of business houses and private mansions, are not sightly and agreeable objects; and that the Irish gentleman,

> "Who kept the pig in the parlor,
> And that was Irish, too,"

is not a fair sample of the outgrowth of modern civilization.

By an architectural peculiarity of the place, this allusion to "the pig in the parlor," is rendered less extravagant, as a description of the state of things in Circleville, than one who has never been here would imagine. We refer to the fact that many, even of the more elegant houses, are built close to the street, without yard, or fence, or the possibility of any. As many of these houses are not provided with halls, the parlors open directly upon the sidewalks; and here, during the summer season, the families and their guests are accustomed to bring out their chairs in the cool of the day, to enjoy a social chat and the evening breeze. But this, of course, is almost a literal extension of the parlor into the street, and since, by common consent, the street is the pigs' habitat, where, sauntering along in their lazy dignity, they might at any time make themselves part and parcel of some group of bipedal intruders, we see that "the pig in the parlor" ceases to be a figure of speech, and becomes a possibility, if not an actual fact.

But we would not do the pig any injustice. On the contrary, we are disposed to be charitable; and, like Southey, we would fain write an "apology" for him. Permit us to say, then, that he is a very peaceable citizen, and always attends strictly to his own business. If all other citizens were like him, in this respect, the public peace would never be disturbed; and there would never be any angry controversies, social, political or religious. He was never known to be taken to the calaboose, for any offense whatever. And if the authorities had (which they have not) a pound for his especial accommodation, and he were taken there ten times a day, it would never once be his own fault. He never gets intoxicated; and if, cocasionally, he is seen in the gutter, you may be sure he went in, not "drunk as a lord," but sober as becoming an honest and orderly pig. And since, as already stated, he never—"hardly ever"—finds any mud there, he is never less a nuisance than then. But when a bipedal pig, having made a swill-barrel of himself (though with which swill no true hog would ever taste) rolls helplessly into the gutter—bah! Who can endure the sight?

We feel compelled, therefore, to admit that, even in the quiet, well-ordered and beautiful town of Circleville, the pig is by no means the most offensive of citizens.

TOWNSHIP.

ORIGINAL PROPRIETORSHIP.

All the lands in Circleville township, until they were purchased and entered by private individuals, were owned by the United States. In other words, they are known as "government lands," in contradistinction from the "Virginia military lands," which comprise some of the other townships in Pickaway county.

SETTLEMENTS.

We have obtained the original entries of all the lands now comprised in the township of Circleville. It is certain that a few of the persons making these entries never settled on the lands they entered; but that most of them did, is verified by the recollection of two of the oldest residents of the original township of Washington, viz.: George Try, now (and for many years) living in Circleville, and Jacob Hitler, living just beyond the line, east; also by that of Samuel Lutz, now of Salt Creek township.

The township of Circleville contains sections five to eight (inclusive), seventeen to twenty, twenty-nine to thirty-two, and fractional sections one to seven, of the original township. The original entries of all these sections and fractional sections are as follows—the most of the sections being entered in quarters:

Section five was entered by John and James Reed, George Moots, John Justice, and Peter Bunn, in 1804, 1805, and 1806; section six by George and Philip Moots, Joseph Yates, West Miller, and Thomas McNeal, in 1804 and 1805; section seven by Conrad Moots, West Miller, John and William McNeal, and Thomas McNeal, in 1804, 1805, and 1806; section eight by John Dunkle, Benjamin Yates, and John Stine, in 1805; section seventeen by Jacob Hosselton, Mitten & Clark, William Walker, and Henry Zimmer, in 1804 and 1805; section eighteen by Weaver & Roush, Thomas McNeal, Jesse Kent, and John Geehr, in 1804 and 1805; sections nineteen and twenty by Jacob Zieger, sr., May 7, 1801; section twenty-nine by Samuel Hill, on the same date; section thirty by John Wright, Joseph Lane, and Adam Weaver, in 1804; section thirty-one by Joseph McCune, June 8, 1803; section thirty-two by Robert F. Slaughter, June 9, 1801; fractional sections one and two by Anthony Boucher, who procured his government patent April 30, 1813; fractional sections three and four by John McNeal, July 10, 1804; fractional section five by Jacob Zieger, sr., May 7, 1801; fractional section six by William Stump and George Breyfogle, November 12, 1805; and fractional section seven by Joseph McCune, January 8, 1803. Section nineteen, about half of each of the sections twenty and thirty, together with fractional section five, and about half of fractional section six, now make up the territory of the city of Circleville.

The heirs of Anthony Boucher, who entered fractional sections one and two, still live upon the same land.

Samuel Hill, who settled on section twenty-nine, was from Kentucky.

Jacob Hitler says that the first settlers on section thirty-two were Samuel and John Thomas, brothers, from Pennsylvania.

John Wright, who purchased one one-quarter of section thirty, was an uncle of Mrs. George Try. In early life he had been captured by the Indians, was with them several years, and spoke their language readily.

Mr. Gregg now owns section thirty-one, entered by Joseph McCune.

Daniel Ludwig came from Berks county, Pennsylvania, about 1805, and purchased section thirty-two, which had been entered by Robert F. Slaughter, being situated in what is now the south-east corner of Circleville township. His son, Jacob Ludwig, still lives on the old homestead—the fine brick mansion built many years ago by his father, being the first in the county constructed of that material.

Jacob Hitler and his brother now own the farms directly north of Ludwig's, on which they have lived many for years. Their father came to this county as early as 1798.

Henry Triece (or Trees) came from Northumberland county, Pennsylvania, about the year 1806. He purchased the land on which the Forest cemetery now is, and owned it till about 1840, when he sold it to Mr. Mowery.

John Rowe, grandfather of Mayor Todd, about 1808 purchased the farm west of John Wright's in section thirty.

ADDITIONAL NAMES OF OLD SETTLERS.

Henry Foresman was born in Lycoming county, Pennsylvania, September 19, 1786, and came to Ohio in 1811, driving out one of the teams of his uncle, William Foresman, a pioneer settler in Wayne township. He married his cousin, Jane L. Foresman, daughter of Alexander Foresman, March 17, 1814. He subsequently purchased a farm a short distance west of the old village of Jefferson, in Pickaway township. The purchase price was six thousand dollars, of which he paid four thousand dollars down, but was never able to pay the balance, owing to the hard times succeeding the war of 1812. The sad result was, that he lost the farm and all that he had paid. After renting a farm for a year or two, he settled [1823] in Circleville, where he commenced working at the blacksmith's trade, which he followed the most of his life. He died September 17, 1860. His wife died January 6, 1869. He had four children, of whom the three sons are all living, viz.: William K., a blacksmith, living in Circleville; Robert, a mile north, and Alexander, in Florida. The daughter, Sarah Jane (Plumb), died December 13, 1857.

Alexander Foresman (brother of Henry, mentioned above,) came from Northumberland county, Pennsylvania, to Pickaway county, in 1812. He was a weaver by trade, and located in Circleville, where he continued to live until his death, in 1832. He was a captain in the Revolutionary war.

Henry Burget came from Hampshire county, Virginia, to Pickaway county, in 1811, and in 1812 bought the farm owned by Mr. Denny, just north of the corporation of Circleville. There he lived till 1836, when he removed to one of his houses in town, only to die, and be buried in what is now called the old cemetery. He had married in Virginia, about 1803, Mary Dickson, of whom he had nine children—four born in Virginia, the rest here. All these are dead but two sons and one daughter. The two sons, James and Washington, live in Illinois, and the daughter, Mrs. Sarah (Burget) Smith, still lives in Circleville. She married, in 1826, William D. Smith, of this place, a farmer by occupation, who died in 1856, having had, in all, sixteen children, nine of whom are still living.

INCORPORATION OF THE TOWNSHIP OF CIRCLEVILLE.

The first recorded action that we can find, looking toward the division of the old township of Washington, and the erection of its western part into the township of Circleville, is the minutes of the commissioners of the county of Pickaway, of 1830 to 1837, as follows:

"PICKAWAY COUNTY, OHIO, March 4, 1833.

The petition of sundry citizens of Washington township, in said county, was this day laid before the commissioners of said county, praying for a division of said township, which was continued till tomorrow, March 5, 1833."

Immediately under this, on the same page, stands the following:

"MARCH 6, A. D., 1833.

The above petition, being viewed and considered on this day, there was a division [i. e., disagreement] of the commissioners present, to-wit: John Boggs, esq., against division; John Mills, in favor of division; and a notice of Daniel Dreisbach, esq., in favor of the division, which is now on file."

Across both of these minutes several lines of erasure were drawn; but several pages further on we find the following:

"MARCH 6TH, 1833, PICKAWAY CO., O.

On the application of sundry citizens of Washington township, for an immediate advertisement for an election to be held in the new township, as petitioned for, named by two of the commissioners, (to-wit, Daniel Dreisbach and John Mills) Circleville township, and that a board not being present, and a division in the opinion of those present, it is therefore ordered that the above petition and application be suspended until 18th March, inst.

JOHN MILLS,
DANIEL DREISBACH."

"March 7th. Notice of appeal this day entered by John Shoup, esq."

"And on the 11th March, A. D., 1833, a notice was filed, directed:

TO THE COMMISSIONERS OF PICKAWAY COUNTY:

Gentlemen—You will please to take notice that the undersigned citizens and residents of Washington township, in Pickaway county, have taken an appeal from your decision, made by you at your March session, A. D. 1833, dividing Washington township in said county of Pickaway, and that the same will be presented to the court of common pleas of said county, at the next May term, for hearing.

Yours, &c.,

JOHN SHOUP,
JOHN YATES,
ANDREW BRINER."

These are all the records to be found in the minutes of the board.

It would seem from this, that the erased minutes were really the record of an action, taken by the county commissioners, which was regarded as an actual division of the township. But whether this was so or no, it is pretty obvious that action was taken, of which no record has been preserved. For instance, there is no record of the naming of the new township by Dreisbach and Mills, who constituted a majority of the board. How it happened that a part of the records were kept, and not all; and what has become of the papers which are spoken of as being placed on file, we have found nobody that can tell. The eighteenth day of March, the day set by the commissioners for considering "the application of sundry citizens for an immediate advertisement of an election to be held in the new township," we may suppose to have been allowed to pass without any action, because nothing could be done before the hearing of the "appeal," which was set for the May term of court. But who authorized the election which, as we shall see, must have been held about the first of April, will probably forever remain a sealed mystery.

Duaing its May term, the court of common pleas, as we find in the records, made the following order:

"John Shoup and others, May term, 1833. } An appeal taken from a decision of the commissioners of Pickaway county, making a new township by the name of Cirnleville township.

The court, having carefully inspected the papers in the case, and heard the arguments of counsel, do order that the same be stricken from the docket for want of jurisdiction."

Meanwhile the people had "cut the Gordian knot" by holding an election of officers for the new township. In the office of the township clerk we find a record, not of their election, but of their being sworn into office on the 2d of April, 1833. We hence conclude that the election must have been held about the 1st of April. The officers inducted at that time, were the following: Jacob Leiby, township clerk; Ferguson Flemming and John Groce, trustees; Henry B. Joy, Wm. L. Pembroke and Edwin R. Reigen, constables; George C. Gephart, fence viewer. Whether any other officers were elected that year cannot now be ascertained. The first election of which we find a complete record, was the one held March 4, 1836, when the following officers were elected: Valentine Keffer, township clerk; sworn into office before John Ludwig, justice of the peace. Matthias Robins, Thos. Pedrick and Jacob Try, trustees; sworn in before the clerk, Valentine Keffer. Jerome Wolfley and James Gill, constables; sworn in before the same. Andrew Briner, Francis Dana and Thomas Moore, supervisors; sworn in before the same. Wm. R. Rinehart and Henry Forseman, overseers of the poor; sworn in before the same. John L. Green, James Gill and Wm. McArthur, fence viewers; sworn in before different officers.

We close our notice of township incorporation, by giving a list of the present officers. It will be seen that several new offices have been added, and that of "fence viewers" dropped. The election took place April 7, 1879. Parmer Lowe, Lewis Atkinson and Jason Case, justices of the peace; George Gearhart, Wm. Cage and Franz Moeller, trustees; J. F. Hoffman, treasurer; W. H. Sweyer, clerk; Wm. Mitchell, constable; H. Seigwald, E. K. Rife, Jerome Wolfley, Louis Meyers, James Simmes and Lew. Pontious, assessors; Erwin Jones, Wm. Noonan and James Shaner, supervisors.

INDUSTRIAL PURSUITS IN THE TOWNSHIP.

These are hardly as diversified as might be desired. The wonderful adaptedness of the soil to wheat and corn, the universal demand for those staples, and the small amount of capital, as well as skill and practice, necessary for their cultivation, gave to them an early preponderance over other industrial products, which they have been allowed to hold longer, perhaps, than they should. The raising of cattle for the eastern market has, at different times, been quite largely carried on, and the "hog crop" has always been large, as the immense "clearances" of pork and lard abundantly show. But the citizens complain that not a pound of cheese is raised in the township, for sale, and hardly butter enough for the home demand, and that, too, of an inferior quaility. With a soil capable of producing the most nutritious grass in abundance, there would seem to be no good reason why both cheese factories and creameries could not be made to yield a handsome profit. Let us hope, too, that at no distant day, mills for the manufacture of linseed oil and fibre will be established in Circleville; thus stimulating the cultivation of flax, and giving employment to many, otherwise idle, hands, and much unemployed capital.

Several portable steam-engines, manufactured by the Scioto machine works, are owned in different parts of the township, and are operated by their owners wherever needed, in sawing wood and lumber, and, more especially, in threshing grain.

In the vicinity of the town, there are several large vegetable gardens, one of which (that of Mr. Geo. Sweiger) raises vegetables for the Columbus market—all the others being needed to supply the home demand. There are, also, several brick kilns, owned and operated ouside of the corporation, one of the largest being that of Mr. McCollister, just north of the city.

In going about over the township, we have been much gratified by the general evidences of thrift and comfort everywhere presented. The primitive mode of architecture, as seen in the log cabin, has not yet disappeared, and we will not deny that its occasional appearance adds somewhat to the picturesqueness of many a beautiful landscape. But we own ourselves better pleased with the elegant farm mansion, so often met with, located on its well-chosen site, overshadowed by graceful trees, amid decorated grounds, which tell unmistakably of the presence of wealth, of culture, and of refinement.

THE MEDICAL PROFESSION OF CIRCLEVILLE.

The early physicians of Pickaway county, in common with all the early settlers in a heavily timbered country, had, from their first arrival, and for many years, a life of hardship to endure and gigantic obstacles to overcome. The patients they were called upon to visit lived, in most cases, at a considerable distance from each other, and the only roads were blind paths and blazed trees from one habitation to another. A journey of many weary miles each day, accomplished on horseback, had to be taken in order to visit a very few families, and often these journeys were attended with great danger, for no matter how wild the storm, or how swollen the streams, suffering humanity must be relieved. Fevers and ague were the prevailing diseases, and at some seasons they baffled the skill of the best physicians of the day, and became malignant, threatening at times to depopulate the country, and drive the settlers back to the borders of civilization to preserve their lives from the unseen foe.

Among the first physicians to locate in Pickaway county, were Dr. Daniel Turney, Dr. Erastus Webb and Dr. William N. Luckey. Dr. Turney removed from Shepherdtown, Virginia, to Ross county, Ohio, in 1800. He first commenced the practice of medicine in Jefferson, Pickaway county. He removed to Circleville about the time the town was first laid out, in 1810, and became the first resident physician of the place. He was an eminent physician and surgeon, and made himself thoroughly acquainted with the various types of disease incident to the disturbance of the virgin soil of the new country. He was eminently successful in his practice, and never remitted his exertions to heal the sick while life lasted. He remained in Circleville until 1823, when he removed to Columbus, where he continued in practice until his death, in 1827.

Dr. Erastus Webb was the second physician to locate in Circleville, arriving about 1815. His former home was in New York State. He continued in successful practice throughout the adjoining county, having an extensive ride, and possessing the confidence of the people in a marked degree until his death, which occurred in 1848.

Dr. William N. Luckey was the next physician in Circleville, coming to that place from Pennsylvania in about 1819. He did his share of the practice, and was known as a careful and painstaking practitioner. He continued in business until his death, in 1847.

Dr. Hill was a student of Dr. Webb, and after preparing himself under the instruction of so good a practitioner, he began the practice of medicine in about 1825 or 1826. He remained in practice in Circleville a few years, when he removed to near Terre Haute, Indiana, where he practiced until his death many years later.

Dr. Edson B. Olds came to Ohio in 1818, then a poor young man of sixteen years of age. He taught school to procure the means for obtaining a profession, and commenced the study of law with his brother, Joseph Olds. Owing to an impediment in his speech, he was discouraged from continuing the study of law, and shortly began the study of medicine with Dr. William N. Lucky, finishing his studies at a Philadelphia medical university. He began practice at Kingston, Ross county, in 1824, and remained there about four years. In 1828 he came to Circleville and conducted a successful practice until 1837, when he engaged in a general produce and mercantile business. He became an active politician, and was several times elected to the State legislature, and twice to congress. He removed to Lancaster in 1859, and died there in January, 1879.

Dr. Peter K. Hull settled in Circleville about 1834 or 1835, and practiced medicine until about 1844, when he removed to Monticello, Indiana, where he died about 1858.

Dr. T. H. Gibson was a native of Pickaway county, and early commenced the study of medicine with Dr. William N. Luckey. He began practice about 1823, and continued at his profession until 1836. He suffered from consumption, and visited White Sulphur Springs, Virginia, for relief, but died from the disease when on his return to his home, in 1836.

Dr. Finley practiced medicine in Circleville from about 1825 to 1833, when he removed to South Bend, Indiana.

Dr. A. W. Thompson is a native of Massachusetts, and in that State commenced the study of medicine. Before completing his studies he came to Ohio and read with his brother, Dr. J. C. Thompson, of South Bloomfield, after which he graduated from Berkshire medical college. He first commenced practice in Kingston, Ross county, and, after a short time, removed to Circleville, where he has built up a large and lucrative practice. An extended notice of his life appears in another part of this work.

Dr. J. B. Jones was a graduate of the Jefferson medical college, Philadelphia, in the class of 1837. Immediately after graduating he began the practice of his profession in Muskingum county, where he remained two years, in 1839 removing to Circleville, where he built up an extensive practice. He was a victim of consumption, and spent one winter in Texas, in search of a relief from the dread disease. His death occurred in Circleville, in 1846. He left a widow and one child, who now live in Circleville.

Dr. Wayne Griswold was born and received the benefit of an academical education in Buckland, Franklin county, Massachusetts. He studied medicine and graduated from Berkshire medical college, Pittsfield, Massachusetts, in 1834. Immediately after graduating he commenced the practice of medicine in Whitingham, Vermont, where he remained until 1839, when he removed to Circleville. He had a house and office on the lot now occupied by the court house, and, after obtaining a good start in business, lost all by a fire, which destroyed his buildings. He then commenced again, and, with indomitable energy, built up a large and lucrative practice, which he continued until 1872, when he retired from active labor, leaving his business to Doctors Wilder and Bowers, his nephew and son-in-law. In 1849 he engaged with his brother-in-law, W. W. Ballard, in the drug business, continuing his connection with this business until 1865. To him a great deal of the credit of the present mission-school system of Circleville is due. He was an indefatigable worker in the cause of education, and served some time on the school board and in the city council. Politically a democrat, he worked for the success of his party, and, in 1847, ran for State senator, and, in 1851, for representative, but did not secure an election. In 1853 he was elected member of the board of public works, and served one term. His death occurred in October, 1873.

Dr. Chester Olds came from Vermont to Circleville about 1850, and engaged in the practice of medicine, at which he continued some ten years, when he died.

Dr. Louis Bierce came from Athens some time after 1840, and died in Circleville, after practicing about two years.

Dr. H. C. Johns read medicine in Circleville with Dr. J. B. Jones, and engaged in practice with him for a short time. He removed to Decatur, Illinois, about 1849, and is now in practice there.

Dr. Kingsley Ray practiced in Worthington and in Delaware, and, in 1845, removed to Circleville, where he practiced until 1865, and where he now resides. His biography appears on another page of this work.

Dr. Charles H. Hawkes graduated at Berkshire medical college, Pittsfield, Massachusetts, in 1845. After graduating, he read another year at Middlebury, Vermont. In 1847, he commenced practice at Tarlton, Pickaway county, and in 1848 came to Circleville, and entered into partnership with Dr. Marcus Brown, with whom he continued one year. In 1849, he opened an office by himself, and continued in practice until 1873, when he was seized with a disease of the brain which eventually caused his death, in 1878. He was placed in the insane asylum at Dayton, for a time, and then at Athens, where he received marked advantages, and was, after a time, able to return home, where he remained some fifteen months. His malady returned, and he was taken to the asylum at Columbus, where he died.

Dr. Taylor commenced practice in Circleville about 1848, and continued until his death, from cholera, in 1850.

Dr. Marcus Brown, first commenced practicing in Williamsport, Ohio, in 1825. He remained there eleven years, when he removed to Circleville, and continued to practice until 1850, when he sold his business to Dr. Taylor. In 1849 he engaged in banking in Circleville. An extended notice of his life will be found in this work.

Dr. Samuel D. Turney read medicine under Dr. P. K.

Hull, and attended one course of lectures at Starling medical college, in 1849–50. He graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in 1851, and immediately engaged in practice in Circleville, and continued in active business until his death, in January, 1878. His biography appears on another page of the Circleville history.

Dr. N. E. Jones graduated from the Cleveland medical college, in 1846, and practiced in that city two years. He then spent several years in the West, a part of the time in Dubuque, Iowa. In 1853, he came to Circleville, where he opened an office, and has built up an enviable practice. In 1878, he associated with him his son, Dr. Howard E. Jones, who had read medicine with him, and graduated at the Ohio medical college, in Cincinnati, in the winter of 1875–6 He afterwards took a post-graduate course at the college of physicians and surgeons, in New York.

Dr. William L. Peck came to Circleville about 1855, and practiced in company with Dr. Chester Olds until 1861, when he he was commissioned as assistant surgeon in an Ohio regiment. He was afterwards promoted to surgeon of a regiment, and served until the close of the war. Soon after his return he was appointed superintendent of the Columbus insane asylum, where he remained until after the institution was burned. He was in charge during the rebuilding of the asylum, until it was near completion, when another took his place, and he removed to Cincinnati, where he established a sanitarium. He remained in Cincinnati for some time, and then removed to Indianapolis, Indiana, where he now resides.

Dr. Baldridge practiced the eclectic system of medicine for a time, previous to 1857.

Dr. Longshore practiced the eclectic system for a time, and died in Circleville in 1854 or '55.

Dr. Jephtha Davis was an eclectic physician here from about 1858 until 1872, when he removed to Kansas.

Dr. C. C. Sharp came to Circleville from Galveston, Texas, about 1857, and remained in practice until about 1869, when he removed to Columbus. He left there for Lexington, Kentucky, thence to Louisville, and is now located in Chicago.

Dr. D. M. Kinsman came to Circleville when a young man, and was for some time employed in the schools of the place. He read medicine with Dr. William L. Peck, and graduated from the Ohio medical college, Cincinnati, in 1863. After his graduation, he entered into partnership with Dr. A. W. Thompson, which continued until 1866, when he removed to Lancaster. There he remained five or six years, when he became connected with Starling medical college, Columbus.

Dr. G. A. Wilder read medicine with Dr. Wayne Griswold, in 1856, and for several years afterward. He attended lectures at Berkshire medical college, Pittsfield, Massachusetts, and graduated in 1864. In 1865 he entered into partnership with Dr. Griswold, in Circleville, where he has since remained. Dr. Griswold gave up his practice in 1872, since which time he has been in partnership with Dr. Bowers. Previous to entering upon the regular study of medicine he was employed in the drug store of Griswold & Ballard, and, while there, made considerable progress in his studies.

Dr. E. D. Bowers commenced the study of medicine under Dr. H. Culbertson, of Zanesville, where he remained but a short time, when he went to Philadelphia, and studied nearly three years, graduating in 1861, at Jefferson medical college. In 1862, he was commissioned assistant surgeon of the Ninety-third Ohio infantry, and in March, 1865, was promoted to be full surgeon. Soon after being mustered out of service, in October, 1865, he was, for a time, in the asylum for the insane at Columbus, as assistant, and in 1867 entered into partnership with Drs. Griswold & Wilder, in Circleville. Since 1872 he has been in partnership with Dr. Wilder.

Dr. M. Hammel read medicine with Drs. Griswold & Wilder, in 1865, and in 1868, graduated from the Ohio medical college, of Cincinnati. He engaged in practice at Five Points, in Monroe township, where he remained five months, when he removed to Waterloo, where he practiced six months. In the spring of 1869 he located in Circleville, where he has since remained.

Dr. A. H. Shaeffer graduated from Starling medical college in 1849, and soon after commenced the practice of medicine at Royalton, Fairfield county. He remained there but a short time, when he removed to Oakland, in the same county, and practiced eighteen years. In May, 1860, he came to Circleville, where he has since been engaged in the practice of his profession.

Dr. L. C. Vernon read medicine with Dr. Sharp, in Circleville, in 1857. He graduated from the Eclectic medical institute, at Cincinnati, in 1864, and went to Zanesville, where he practiced until 1873, when he came to Circleville, where he has since practiced. Previous to his graduation he practiced for a time at Washington Court House.

Dr. A. P. Courtright was a student with Drs. Turney & Thompson, in 1864. He attended lectures at Miami medical college, Cincinnati, where he graduated in 1867. After graduating he was chosen by competitive examination, physician in the old commercial hospital, (now the Cincinnati hospital) for one year. He was then appointed assistant physician at Longview lunatic asylum, Cincinnati, where he remained three years and a half. He then engaged in private practice in Cincinnati for a year and a half. In 1873 he came to Circleville and opened an office. He was in partnership with Dr. Turney from January, 1877, until his death, since which time he has conducted business by himself. He has built up an extensive and lucrative practice in and about Circleville.

Dr. G. T. Rowe read medicine in the office of Dr. S. D. Turney in 1874–7, graduating the latter year from the university of Maryland, at Baltimore. He attended one course of lectures in 1876, at the Ohio medical college. In 1877 he entered into partnership with Dr. A. W. Thompson, with whom he is still associated.

Dr. Thomas Blackstone was a student with his uncle, Dr. William Blackstone, of Athens. He attended one course of lectures at the Ohio medical college, in 1872, and graduated from the Bellevue hospital medical college, in New York, in 1873. In 1874 he was appointed assistant physician at Athens asylum for the insane, where he remained three years. He then spent a year in London and Vienna, at their famous hospitals, and in the fall of 1878 came to Circleville, where he now practices. Previous to entering upon the study of medicine, he graduated from the Ohio university, at Athens.

Dr. F. Baker practiced in Ashland, Kentucky, for a time, and in 1878 came to Circleville, where he is now in practice.

Dr. John C. King graduated from the university of Nashville, in 1874. In 1872 he commenced the homœopathic practice in Allegheny, Pennsylvania, and served on the staff of physicians at the homœopathic charity hospital of Pittsburgh, for three years. In 1878 he came to Circleville, where he has built up a good practice, being the only physician of that school in the place.

Dr. George A. Rowe read medicine with Dr. L. C. Vernon, in 1875, and graduated from the eclectic medical institute of Cincinnati, in 1878. Since that time he has been located in Circleville.

Dr. Tomlinson came to Circleville in 1878. He had been in practice in other places some fifteen years previous to his location here.

Biographical Sketches.

WILLIAM B. THRALL.

William Barlow Thrall was born in Rutland, Vermont, the twenty-first day of June, 1798. His father, Jesse Thrall, was born in Windsor, Connecticut, and settled, as a farmer, in Rutland, in 1791. He was the son of Samuel Thrall, a farmer, and captain of a company in the war of the Revolution. Samuel was a son of John Thrall, second, who was a son of John Thrall, first, who was a son of Timothy Thrall. Timothy was a son of William Thrall who, in 1829, was a member of Rev. Mr. Wareham's church, organized at Plymouth, England, for the purpose of emigrating to America.

In 1630, the church arrived in America, and located at Dorchester, Massachusets, but, in 1635, it removed to Windsor, Connecticut, where William B. Thrall's father, Jesse, was born. William's mother was Mabel Rose, the daughter of Justus Rose, of Granville, Massachusetts. Justus was one of a numerous family of great longevity. His mother lived until she was one hundred and three years old. When she was one hundred years old, a meeting was called, a sermon preached, and her descendants enumerated. Of these there were found to be living over four hundred and fifty.

Thus, William B. Thrall's ancestors can be traced back until they are found participating in that bloody struggle which gave this country its freedom, through the war of the Revolution, and, back of all that memorable conflict, to the old Puritans, who left England that they might enjoy civil and religious liberty.

Eighty-one years ago, even in New England, education was yet in its infancy. There were, it is true, a few colleges struggling into life, but, with the average farmer of that early day, when the sterile hillsides and contracted valleys had furnished food and raiment for the family, there was seldom anything left with which to supply the ambitious boy the wherewithal to secure a collegiate education; and so, the primitive country school must suffice. Such was William B. Thrall's lot; and, thus equipped, at the early age of fifteen, he entered the office of the Rutland Herald, William Fay, owner, to learn the art of printing. But the termination of the lad's schooling was by no means, the termination of his studies. On the contrary, it was but their commencement, growing with his years, and, during his long and useful career, furnishing him with pleasant occupation for each leisure moment. Nor were the duties of the printing office sufficient to satisfy his developing capacities. He soon began, himself, to write short articles for publication in the newspaper where he was serving his apprenticeship; and, thus early, was commenced that great talent in journalism which characterized his after life.

Whether any of these boyish efforts shared the common fate of beginners—the waste-paper basket—or not, is not certainly known; sure it is that some did not, and he soon had the supreme satisfaction of seeing his own young ideas in print, besides not only having had the previous pleasure of placing them in type and reading the proof, but also of striking off the newspapers. Thus, step by step, William advanced from roller-boy onward, until, at the end of four years, he was declared a competent journeyman printer. During this time, not content with his printer's task, his hours for the reading of useful books, and his newspaper productions, he burned midnight oil in the practice of epistolary correspondence, and so laid the foundation of that terseness of expression and gracefulness of style, which, during his long life, never ceased to charm those who were so fortunate as to be recipients of his letters.

Now that the trade was learned, and that the dawn of manhood was showing itself in the first down of the coming beard, William looked up at the mountains and across the hills of his Vermont home, and they seemed small, and the valleys appeared cramped. There came into his heart a desire to be out and away from what was rapidly growing to be something like a prison life. He found his eyes strained in the direction of the setting sun—toward that wonderful western wilderness. It was the old story that was being repeated in that New England home, in this boy's feelings and desires. The swarming time was at hand with him, and so the populous hive started out another of its representatives to the then far west. Nor trunk, nor even sachel, was needed to carry his slender wardrobe; it was all comprised in the space of a cotton handkerchief, which, on a stick, slung across the shoulder, with a few shillings in his pocket—the savings of his printer's experience—made up his worldly wealth. Thus equipped, and with the blessings of his christian parents, in the early autumn of 1817, William turned his face westward.

Without reflection, this journey to Ohio seems a small matter, because since then, thanks to steam, space has been almost annihilated, so that a trip from Vermont to Ohio, now, is scarcely more than a visit from one neighboring village to another. Then, it was, as it were, going from one world to another. There were to encounter, wild beasts and savage Indians; to traverse bridle paths, called roads; to pass through hundreds of miles of interminable forests; there was the fording of streams, sometimes swollen by recent floods; camping out by night; and the rude fare. It was all that can be embodied in the idea of companionship with primitive nature. To say good-bye to one in those days, who was to undertake a journey such as William was about to commence, appeared like saying it forever. And what made this journey more remarkable was the fact that he was a lad of only nineteen, his worldly possessions in a little bundle, with only a few shillings in his pocket, and nothing beyond them but his trade to rely upon for his support—thus equipped, going out into this western wilderness. Just what young Thrall was proposing to do, however, thousands like him in New England had done, were doing, or would do, later, and in this way. With this grand material was the great west, in a large measure, to be populated. Remembering this, we are not surprised that the development has been so rapid and substantial.

It was safe to feel that boys who had the courage to encounter pioneer life as William was about to do, had the material in him to make a success, and this doubtless buoyed up his parents to bravely undergo the trying ordeal of separation. Good fortune met our young hero on the threshold of his departure. A neighbor of the Thralls, Deacon Pratt by name, prepared to journey his way, and he secured the opportunity of riding with him. At frequent intervals, however, through the hilly and mountainious regions, and over the bad roads, the men had to get out and walk; thus much of the way to Ohio was made on foot by our young emigrant.

Fifteen years previous to this time, what was known as the Granville company, had emigrated from Granville, Massachusetts, to what is now known as Granville, Ohio. The colony was composed of three families of the Roses, relatives of William's on his mother's side; one family of Thrall's, his father's relatives, and one family of Graveses, which had intermarried with both the Thralls and Roses. After undergoing all the hardships of first settlers, this colony was now well established, and was constantly receiving new accessions from New England. Thitherward our party of emigrants bent their way. The journey occupied a full month. When they started, the foliage was in the green of summer, but ere they had reached their destination in Ohio it had taken on the glorious hues of autumn. This Granville colony was a band of devout christians, and when their time was not occupied with their severe tasks of opening up the new country, it was spent in devotional exercises. Deacon Pratt's party chanced to arrive at Granville just as one of their frequent religious meetings had opened under the trees, where, in the pleasant days, it was their wont to hold service. They were attracted to the spot by the sweet strains of sacred music. The services were stopped to give the new comers a cordial greeting. Either through the occasional mails, or the incoming settlers from New England, the coming reputation of our journeyman printer had preceded him, and so it was the wish of the congregaton, made up largely of his relatives, that he should take part in the service, which he did, reading them a sermon in his travel-worn costume and fatigued condition, delighting every one by his modesty, graceful manner, and clear enunciation.

This episode made young Thrall at once the hero of the Granville colony. He was carried off in triumph by his uncle, Lemuel Rose, to his home, where he remained until the following spring. There were two daughters, his cousins, about his own age, in the house, and not content to be idle, William assisted them in milking the cows, besides making himself generally useful in wood chopping and helping at the general farm chores. Plow-boys and axemen were more in demand at this time than journeymen printers, and so, when spring came, William found it necessary to hunt for work in his line, and thus, for two years, he vibrated between Granville, Zanesville, and Worthington, winding up in Columbus, in the fall of 1818.

These journeys from village to village he usually made on foot. Once, in going from Worthington to Granville, having to pass a stretch of woods fourteen miles in extent, he was followed the whole distance by what he supposed was a dog. The animal was large, lean, and hungry-looking. Telling his uncle about it when he reached his house, he was informed that the supposed dog was a wolf, and, from his having followed him so far, he was a hungry one at that, and that he had made a narrow escape in not being attacked.

At the time of young Thrall's first entrance into Columbus, both Worthington and Franklinton exceeded it in size and population. Three years previous to his arrival it could only boast of one brick house, in the location corner of Broad and High streets, as it now is known, with simply the foundation of the State house laid. The year previous the first trees had been girdled, of which there was a dense growth, the dead trees being cut down the following spring. Thus, when Thrall's eyes first rested on Columbus, it was but little more than a village of stumps.

The Western Intelligencer was at this time purchased by Griswold, Olmsted & Buttles, and moved from Worthington to Columbus. In addition to publishing this paper, they had the contract for State printing, and in this office Thrall found himself a journeyman printer. There being neither hotels nor boarding houses, as yet, to speak of, in this newly-fledged capital, the employees of the office were given board and lodging among the families of the proprietors, and here, for the first time since he had left Vermont, our wandering printer had the promise of something like permanent employment. As the result, he felt a home feeling springing up in his breast; another fate, however, was in store for him.

His brother Walter had swarmed from the parent hive in 1815, first locating, as had William afterwards, at the Granville colony, then at Worthington, and finally at the village of Circleville, where there was already a newspaper published. It was called the Olive Branch, and its proprietors were Guy W. Doane, Gen. Joseph Renick, and J. M. Hays. The owners were not satisfied with their printer, which Walter Thrall learning, he called upon them, and gave them the information that he had a brother in Columbus who was a competent printer and a reliable young man, whose services he thought they might secure. Delighted at these testimonials, they immediately engaged Mr. Thrall to go to Columbus and secure the services of his brother, and to bring him back with him at once.

Mr. Thrall found his brother reluctant to go. "I have," said he "three months' steady work here, and don't think I ought to leave it."

"At Circleville you have a chance for three years' steady work instead of three months'," was Walter's reply.

Finally, William consented to go. Walter had come from Circleville, on horseback, and it was arranged that they should take turns in riding back; as the saying was, they would "ride and tie." William's arrangements for departure were simple enough. His wealth had not increased since leaving Vermont, and so the old handkerchief and staff were again brought into requisition.

It is impossible to say which of the two brothers' turn it was to ride when they reached Circleville, but, either riding or walking, in this primitive way William at last reached the little village, which, for the next quarter of a century was to claim him as a resident, and which he was to honor, and which was, in turn, to honor him with public positions, kindly feelings and warm affections, such as falls to the lot of but few men, either to experience or deserve.

Only a few months previous, the subject of this sketch had passed his twenty-first birthday, so that his first appearance in Circleville was in the earliest blushes of manhood. With his hand upon his heart, we believe he could look back upon his twenty-one years of life, and truthfully say that not only had there been no sowing of wild oats, but they had not been marked by a single act, the recollection of which could bring the blush of shame to his cheek; and yet, doubtless, somewhere, and at different times, through his limited school experience, or printer's apprenticeship, or in his wanderings since he left the parental roof, temptations had been offered to him, which boys of a different mould would have absorbed as the sponge absorbs water—which, indeed, but few reject as completely as he had done. And now, here he was in this little village, a man at last. Though with all the enthusiasm of the boy, and with mirth, humor, and a cheerful disposition, that he never parted with during his life, yet, he was thoroughly practical; and eager was he to commence the task which, while it was to assist in the growth of the village, would, also, result in leading him up to substantial success.

Circleville was, at this time, about all embraced within the circle of the old fort, which, wheel-shaped, sent out from the hub, where the court house was located, four roads, like spokes. The houses were built fronting on the court house circle, and so were narrowed in the front, widening out in the rear. There were about five hundred souls, all told. Thus, it was scarcely more than a settlement, and its future, in more ways than one, all lay before it. Small as it was, however, it could yet boast of the inevitable tavern, with its indipensable tap, where liquor was drank, not always by the glass, but more often out of a tin cup, and the habit of drinking was then as common a practice as it is now uncommon. This tavern was kept by a jolly fellow named Olney Payne, and the tap-room, which was also the office, was the general lounging-place for the villagers. The landlord thoroughly believed in the saying, "laugh and grow fat," and practiced the same upon his guests, by provoking rounds of laughter from them over his funny stories. At this tavern Mr. Thrall located himself, at two dollars a week for his board and lodging. Money was then but little known, a great deal of the business being done through barter. This, Mr. Thrall soon found out, and so he arranged to pay his board as he was paid, that is, by orders upon the establishments for whom the printing office was doing work.

At the time of Mr. Thrall's location in Circleville, he describes the general situation, as follows:

"The country was then emerging from the effects of the war of 1812, which effects were most disastrous to the growth and progress of this then frontier region. There were then no great thoroughfares in Ohio to bear off the surplus products of the soil. Railroads were not even thought off, and canals only heard of as the topic of speculative enterprise on the one hand, and of vituperative ridicule on the other, by the politicians of New York. We much question whether there was a single mile of macadamized turnpike in all the southern half of the State. The periodical January and June freshets in the Scioto were the sole reliance for getting off to a precarious market the surplus products of this whole region; and many were the lives sacrificed to that perilous trade. The financial expedients consequent upon the war, or, perhaps, inseparable from the formation of new and remote settlements, had destroyed every safeguard to a prudent and prosperous business. Currency, such as it was, was sufficiently abundant, but actual bona fide cash was quite another thing. "Owl creek," and "coon box," and "muttontown," were household words applied to the apology for a currency, but real cash dollars were almost unknown. While one dollar in cash could not be realized for a hundred pounds of flour, coffee was retailing at fifty cents a pound; and it was thought a peculiar hardship when the merchants refused "cut quarters," and required round silver in payment, which became the case soon after the inventive genius of the time suggested the practicability of realizing five "cut quarters" from a dollar."

What a piece of photography is this description, and what a change has the last half century wrought in the section described! No man in the country contributed more towards it than did Mr. Thrall through that pen, which in his hand, was certainly "mightier than the sword."

Mr. Thrall did not long remain journeyman printer in the office of the Olive Branch. He formed a partnership with Mr. Joseph Olds, and they purchased the establishment. His next step, a year later, was to purchase his partner, Mr. Olds' interest, and thus at the age of twenty-one, he became the sole owner and editor of the Olive Branch, which he continued to own and edit either under that name, or that of the Herald, for twenty-five years.

Characteristic of the spirit which animated our young republican editor, he adopted as the motto for his editorial head, that line from the immortal bard of Avon, which he puts into the mouth of the wary Cassius, "I was born free as Cæsar; so were you."

Still later in his journalistic experience, he transposed and modified the name of his paper so as to read Circleville Herald and Olive Branch. In a letter upon the subject in after life, he says:

"A whole chapter might be exhausted in assigning reasons for this change. Suffice it to say that times were sadly out of joint—a radical change was being assiduously infused into the spirit of our public institutions—the executive was rapidly absorbing both the other branches of the government, and we were making railroad speed towards absolutism."

The paper was outspoken in denunciation of these perilous innovations, and the switch with which it scourged was anything but a mild and peaceful olive.

Thus, forty years after it occurred, he tells us that his paper was too belligerent to be sailing under such peaceful colors, and so he must needs put them in the background. What delicacy of feeling does it not disclose! And this gives us the opportunity to say that William B. Thrall, whether with friend or foe, or in whatever capacity in life, always and everywhere, was just what he seemed to be. This refined sentiment, that in his early life induced him to make the above change in his newspaper, because he was engaged in a warfare, while it was an emblem of peace, went with him through life, and when the candle was flickering in the socket, it shone out brighter than ever.

The purchase of the Olive Branch thus early in life, illustrates one of Mr. Thrall's striking characteristics: that of steadfastness of purpose. The reader will remember how, at the age of fourteen, he resolved to become a journalist, and, while he was learning the manual part of the business, how he was also practicing epistolary correspondence and writing articles for publication, besides seizing every spare moment to store his mind with useful knowledge, and here he had accomplished his intention upon the very first opportunity which had opened to him.

We say they "purchased" the Olive Branch, when we should have said that they bargained for the purchase. Neither of the partners had any money, and so they simply agreed to pay four hundred dollars as fast as the office earned it!

So much confidence had Mr. Thrall inspired in himself, that his late employers did not even require a note for the purchase money.

As an editor, Mr. Thrall rapidly developed the faculty of saying whatever he meant, and observed the habit of meaning what he said. Disdaining alike concealment and equivocation, it was always known where he might be found, and there was no mistaking his position. Entering upon his duties with fundamental rules like these for his guide, he was ever prompt to contend for what he regarded as the right; and, prompted by feelings of the highest patriotism, it is not surprising that, in a career of much longer duration than falls to the lot of most editors, he found frequent occasion to shiver a lance with an adversary. Nor was he found either slow or unwilling in defence of his principles, when assailed by a foeman worthy of his steel.

The office throve under Thrall & Olds' administration; but the latter, feeling that there was not a sufficient support for two persons in a village newspaper, and desiring to enter upon the study of law, offered his share to his partner for three hundred dollars, to be paid at convenience.

This offer disclosed another life trait in Mr. Thrall's character—extreme caution. Instead of accepting the offer at once, he waited to consult his brother, Walter, who advised him by all means to purchase; and so anxious was Walter, for his brother's sake, that he insisted upon going at once to find Mr. Olds and close up the bargain. They finally found him a couple of miles from the village, at Mr. Short's, a shrewd farmer, whom he had gone out to consult as to the advisability of the proposed sale. Mr. Thrall informed his partner at once that he would take his interest at the price named, but was answered that, upon consultation with his adviser, the farmer, he had decided not to sell for less than four hundred dollars. The purchase was a desirable one, and so Mr. Thrall accepted the increased price, thus having to pay one hundred dollars for his caution. Two hundred dollars, his share of the first purchase, and now four hunered dollars for his partner's interest, put Mr. Thrall in debt six hundred dollars, which he had to pay from the earnings of the office, besides keeping it up and giving him a support. Every business man knows how difficult it is to accomplish this task. Six hundred dollars now seems like a very small sum, but at the day of which we are writing, it was a great deal of money.

Doubtless it was the work of years, with the closest management, to lay by the means from the revenues of his office, to cancel this debt; and in order to accomplish it at all, for a long time the sole employee of his office was a boy, whose parents deputized the young editor to scold if he did not do right, and this failing, to whip.

The press was a "Ramage," the kind used by Benjamin Franklin. The ink was put on by means of a ball, and it was difficult to spread it even, so as to get a good impression; nor was this at all accomplished in the office of the Olive Branch until Mr. Thrall, finally taking advantage of the parental authority with which he had been deputized, several times administered the birch, and at last, either because the boy had learned, or through fear of further castigation, he managed to do his work well.

A year after Mr. Thrall's arrival in Circleville he had the satisfaction of being able to leave the tavern for a pleasant home with his brother Walter, who married at that time.

Illustrative of the general scarceness of this early day, it is recorded that the newly-married couple could only find six plates in the village of Circleville, this being the entire stock of crockery ware in the settlement; and for cups and saucers they were forced to wait until some one visited the then far off pretentious town of Chillicothe.

Three years after Mr. Thrall's settlement in Circleville, in 1822, he was married to Nancy Graham, who died the following year. Two years later, in 1825, he maried

Maria Rockwell, who still survives him. Out of nine children, as the fruits of this marriage, four only reached maturity. Thus, grief was not an unfrequent visitor to this household, and the chastening hand showed itself in its softening influence upon the father. The names of the children who reached maturity, and who, save one, are still living, are William Rockwell, Caroline Maria, Henry, and Theron Russell. They have all done credit to their ancestor.

When Mr. Thrall first located in Circleville the postmaster was George Wolfley. He died in 1822, and his last request made to Mr. Thrall was that his widow should be his successor in office, as her only means of support. Mr. Thrall at once made application to Mr. Adams for Mrs. Wolfley's appointment, but, to the great disappointment of all, was informed that it was against the rules of the department to appoint a woman. Not to be thwarted, however, in the accomplishment of the husband's dying request, he made application for the place for himself, which was successful, and, notwithstanding his other tasks, he himself performed all the duties of the office during his entire term, save the receiving and distributing of the mails, which was done by the widow Wolfley, turning over to her every penny of its revenues.

Mr. Wolfley was only one of the many, who, in the few years of our young journalist's residence in Circleville, had learned to love him for his many good traits of character, and so he was constantly being sought for as an adviser and friend in distress; and this increased from year to year during his residence of a quarter of a century in Circleville, and never was he known to turn a deaf ear to the cry of distress, or to close his voice when his advice was sought.

His leadership in Circleville commenced with his residence, and this as strikingly illustrated in the rapidity with which the habit of whiskey-drinking, hitherto so prevalent, either disappeared or became disreputable, and ere long the general tone of this western settlement commenced to improve; not that Mr. Thrall's example alone accomplished this good work. All that can be claimed for him is that he was one of the leaders; and as it was his wont always to vigorously denounce whatever he disbelieved, just as he always strenuously advocated his beliefs—and, moreover, being at the head of the newspaper, and so preaching his weekly sermons—all this made him a powerful factor in the accomplishment of good; and it is therefore safe to say that no one did more for the general advancement than he.

The Herald, under his administration, at once conceived the true sphere of the local newspaper, that of publishing the news—and so, with the rest, there was always a faithful record of marriages and deaths. As an illustration of his graceful style at an early age, we give below one of the first of the former notices to appear: "Joining of the cereals at ——: Alfred Corn was married to Julia Wheat." A highly complimentary notice of one John Welker, deceased, also appeared about this time, the circumstances of which Mr. Thrall delighted to relate as one of the humorous incidents of his early life. John's father was a German, and, upon his son's death, he at once proceeded to the Herald office, and, in his broken speech, said: "Mr. Drall, my son Shon he go died last night, und I wants you to put him in the newsbaper, und gif him a goot recomadation; for Shon vas a goot poy."

We have said that at this time money was but little known. This, first the Olive Branch, and then the Herald, fully testifies to, by such notices as the following:

"A few well-dressed buck-skins are wanted at this office in payment of debts."

"Maple sugar will be received, at the market price, on subscription, or in payment of debts, at the Olive Branch."

"Bacon hams will be received in payment of debts due the printer, if delivered soon; also, the hind-quarters of beef."

There was an epicure about somewhere when this last advertisement was penned, to only want the hind-quarters of the beef!

"Those who have engaged to pay the printer in wood, are requested to deliver it now."

Which meant that the cold days were at hand, with no money to buy fuel. And, finally, in one of his early years, when, it may be, debts were pressing for payment, there appeared the following:

WANTED, IMMEDIATELY!

375 bushels of wheat.
120 barrels of flour.
530 gallons of whiskey.
240 weight bacon.
400 weight of sugar, &c.
575 dollars in cash!

The highest market price will be allowed for any of the above articles, in payment of debts due me (special contracts excepted), if delivered by the first of June next.

W. B. THRALL.

What the "&c." was to the sugar, and how he could regulate the market price of "575 dollars in cash," are mysteries, if they do not mean irony; and then, what in the world was he going to do with so much whiskey, if, indeed, it was not, as is likely, the most marketable article on his list. Not only was the newspaper offering to take in exchange, for debts due it, almost every conceivable article, but it was well sprinkled with advertisements of those in all classes of business who were also willing, indicating that a system of general traffic, with but little exchange of money, was the order of the day.

About the time Mr. Thrall's last advertisement, just quoted, appeared (then contemplating marriage), he had purchased the ground on which he afterwards erected a fine residence, and where he continued to live during his sojourn in Circleville, but which, at the date of purchase, could only boast of a log cabin, which, when weather-boarded, constituted his new home. It is more than likely, that either the whole or part of the purchase price of this was the articles enumerated in the advertisements, and that he hit upon this plan to at once collect up his debts and utilize the barter in the purchase of a home. It is evident that with all the offers of our young journalist to receive his pay in any sort of barter, it was yet either impossible, or up-hill business, to accomplish it, to his entire satisfaction, as the following notice indicates:

"Dr. Ezekiel F. Eastman, of Fayette county, Ohio, after reaping the fruits of our labor, and being called upon to discharge his account, amounting to seven dollars and fifty cents, resorted to the miserable subterfuge of denying our accounts. We have resolved to publish to the world the names of such other gentlemen as may have recourse to similar means to defraud us of our just dues."

As no further advertisement of this character appeared, the remedy must have been effectual.

When we have told the reader that in addition to these advertisements for barter, among which was that of an enterprising merchant who was willing to pay thirty-seven and a half cents a bushel for wheat, in exchange for debts due him or for goods; and another who was willing to pay the market price in the same way for as much as a thousand bushels of corn. There were three for estray horses and estray indentured boys, and that they were a large part of the advertisements—when the reader knows this, on the principle that the advertisements of a community index its occupation, he will have an excellent idea of how these early settlers were largely employed.

At the time of Mr. Thrall's settlement in Circleville, there was an Episcopal organization and a Masonic lodge in the village, both of which he soon joined, and thus early in life he surrounded himself with these safeguards, and laid the foundation for the substantial service which through his long life he rendered in these causes.

He was at once assigned to the position of secretary both in the church and the lodge, and rapidly advanced until he was warden in the church and master of his lodge, which positions he continued to occupy during his residence in Circleville. It would be impossible to overrate his services in these two fields. At the date of his enlistment their existence was scarcely more than in name. The church had no roof to cover it, and so was compelled to worship in the court house—no preacher, and so there had to be lay reading. The workers in the lodge were both few and new, and so they wrought but little, and that crudely.

What is true of an army is equally true of a church or a lodge; in order to succeed there must be a leader, and he of the right sort. Mr. Thrall was largely that in St. Phillip's church, while in the lodge he was entirely so. It is much when we can say of a man that he honored Masonry; it is all, when we can say that he honored religion. Truthfully can we say these of William B. Thrall. With such and kindred duties added to his journalistic, it is easy to see that Mr. Thrall had little leisure to listen to Olney Payne's jolly tavern stories, or ever to become one of the village loungers. To him life was too earnest and real for such pastimes. There was the purchase of his newspaper, and a little later that of a home, all to be paid out of his earnings. His charitable contributions, which he distributed with a liberal hand even while yet in this slough of indebtedness, with his dread of being in debt, came the mighty desire to be rid of it, to accomplish which his good sense told him there was not a penny to be spent needlessly, or an hour to be wasted on frivolity. And yet if he chanced to stop to or from his meals for a moment in the tap room, there was always a welcome for him. Thus the life of rectitude and morality he had marked out for himself was not to be one that would repulse those who might act or think differently from him. He was in the community, his course declared, and more than the words he would utter, was the life he would live, to be the example to follow. Not that he was ever otherwise than outspoken as to his unbelief, or that he was even tolerant of the opinions of others when opposed to his; because with his great sincerity of character it could not be otherwise than that he believed what he advocated, and in fact with his clearness of perception, it seldom was otherwise; but he had such a happy way of expressing himself that all personal enmity as against him, fell to the ground. We think the term of being universally popular could be applied to him as appropriately as it can ever be to any one. Illustrative of this is an event which occurred considerably later. When he was at the head of the Ohio State Journal, Samuel Medary was at the head of the Ohio Statesman, the former being the leading Whig editor of the State, the latter the leading Democratic editor. There were years of bitter warfare between the two, and yet when Mr. Medary died, his relatives came to Mr. Thrall to write his obituary, which he did.

The first public office Mr. Thrall was elected to was in 1829, that of recorder of the town. His published report of its expenses, under his administration, for the year was: Receipts, one hundred and forty-one dollars and thirty-one cents; expenditures, one hundred and twenty-five dollars and fifty-three cents, which was pronounced by all to be a model of public frugality. In 1830 he was advanced to the position of mayor of Circleville, and so popular was his administration that he was annually re-elected for eight successive years; once unanimously, and once with only five dissenting votes. In 1837, he was elected from Pickaway county to the general assembly of Ohio. He was now an accomplished journalist, with a State reputation as such. Consequently a hearty reception greeted him at the capital, and he at once assumed the prominent position in the legislature which his talents merited. In 1839, he was elected a director in the Circleville and Washington turnpike company, just then being organized, and contributed largely, by his influence, to the successful accomplishment of this then very important work.

Mr. Thrall's two winters in the legislature brought him into intimate personal relations with the newspaper men of Columbus, the consequence of which was that he spent one or two winters later at the capital as the reporter of legislative proceedings, in which capacity he gave great satisfaction and made many friends.

In 1845 he was appointed, by the legislature, a judge of the court of common pleas in Pickaway county, which office he resigned in 1846, and moved to Columbus for the purpose of taking the editorial chair of the Ohio State Journal, he already having become part owner of the same. For some years previous, owing to his official and many other duties, Mr. Thrall had associated with him, in the operative department of the Herald, Mr. Jason Case, who assumed control of the paper upon Mr. Thrall's departure to Columbus, though, for several years, he held his interest in the Herald, and furnished the leading editorials.

During his twenty-five years in Circleville, there had been no great apparent growth. All that could be said in its favor was, that it was laying the foundation for its future prosperity. The country was slowly filling with people, farms were being opened, and an outlet for its products, through the establishment of its canals, had been accomplished, and to which the Herald had given its best efforts, as it did to everything that tended to the public good.

Thus, at the age of forty-eight, Judge Thrall passed from his local sphere to one which comprised the whole State. It was with less reluctance that he did so because, as we have said, there had been no great increase in Circleville, while in Columbus the increase had been decided. But notwithstanding these facts, and the further one that his ripened capacity called for a larger sphere of usefulness, he did not make up his mind with alacrity to bid adieu to Circleville. On the contrary, it required many months of urging from those interested in having him take charge of the Journal, before they could secure his consent. It is safe to say that never an office or an advancemet came to this man through any solicitation of his, and particularly was this true in this case. So far as the promise of profit, it was not good. The Democrats were in power in both the State and Nation, so there was not a vestige of public patronage to be had. If the paper was to be sustained, it must be by the voluntary patronage of the people. As a financial venture it was, therefore, uncertain, and with his great dread of being involved in debt, he hesitated. Then there was, to this man of modest merit, the immense responsibility of having to be the leading teacher of his party, as he would be, the paper being the State organ of the Whigs. Lastly, there were all the associations surrounding his long residence in Circleville. These are generally strong, but with his temperament they were especially so. His warm affections for, and devotion to, his friends and relatives, his pleasant home, and his church—all these held him with the power of cable chains, and he finally secured his consent to leave them all, much as the brave soldier secures his consent to go into battle—simply from a sense of duty.

As the result shows, he had spent more than half of his business life in Circleville, and it was, moreover, that part of it when the growth is rapid and strong, the tendrils of his being running out and taking deep root in the hearts and friendships of those with whom he was surrounded. Very safe, even then, would it have been to predict what afterwards followed—that however absorbing a field of usefulness there was before him, however much he might do honor to what he was about then, or might, in the near future undertake, never, in the new home, would there spring such friendships and affections as he was then leaving.

In the paper of October 22, 1846, appeared this simple announcement, penned by his predecessor:

"The Journal will hereafter be published and conducted by William B. Thrall, whose experience as an editor and publisher is widely known."

A few days later came this notice:

"The editor craves the indulgence of the public, and especially of his brothers of the press, for a brief season, during which he will be principally engaged in those domestic arrangements so necessary to his comfort, and, consequently, to an acceptable discharge of his ordinary labors. So soon as the arrangements can be consummated he will be faithfully at his post."

And then is added the language of a torn heart:

"A home for a quarter of a century can hardly be broken up and remodeled in a day."

The Journal continued under this management until the spring of 1850. Its career was remarkable for purity of purpose, vigor, and general ability, fully justifying the expectations of Judge Thrall's most ardent friends. From a journalist of State reputation, this ordeal ripened him into one of national reputation.

During Judge Thrall's journalistic career, and lasting with their lives, he made unto himself two idols—Henry Clay and Thomas Corwin. The latter became his intimate and warm personal friend. And so, when, in 1852, under President Taylor, Mr. Corwin found himself secretary of the treasury, he expressed a strong desire to have his favorite Ohio editor occupy a position under him. Unfortunately for Judge Thrall, but fortunately for the accomplishment of Secretary Corwin's wish, he was at this time having a tedious lawsuit—his first and last one—for the recovery of the money he had invested in the Journal, which was most of his savings for the twenty-five years previous, and, until the suit was decided, he was in no condition to embark in a new enterprise, and not then, of course, if the case went against him. So, during the years 1852, 1853, and 1854, he was at the head of a bureau at Washington, at the end of which time he had the satisfaction of recovering his money in full, whereupon he reluctantly said good-bye to his chief and dear, devoted friend, and gladly returned to his family, in Columbus. This was Judge Thrall's first and only financial embarrassment, and, while the suit was pending which was to decide his fate, he always found a wise counsellor in Mr. Corwin.

Upon Judge Thrall's return from Washington he found occupation for his pen in his old place in the State Journal, and shortly thereafter he also became the Columbus correspondent of several of the leading newspapers in the State—among them, early in 1856, over the name of "Spectator," in the Cincinnati Commercial, who thus introduces him to its readers:

"We are glad to be able to say to the readers of the Commercial that we have succeeded in securing the services of a gentleman of talents, character, and experience, as our correspondent at the seat of government. His letters will present a refreshing contrast to the heterogeneous collections of bald gossip, silly conjecture, groundless rumor, and malicious misrepresentations, that, coming from nobody and having neither sense nor authenticity, are palmed off on the public as truth, in regard to the doings at the capital. We believe that our Columbus correspondent is destined to acquire a wide popularity with the readers of the Commercial.

The following year Judge Thrall was the "Pontiac" of the Sandusky [Ohio] Register. His correspondence with these newspapers had a wonderful run, being largely copied by the press, and taken as standard authority. Closing the year's correspondence, the Sandusky Register says:

"We to-day give to our readers the last of our esteemed Columbus correspondent's letters for the season. It is with regret we part with such an able and faithful friend and contributor as is "Pontiac," and we know our readers will miss, as much as we, his daily-offered banquet of legislative intelligence, comments and gossip, prepared with so prodigal and practical a hand."

Early in 1858, Judge Thrall commenced a series of editorials for the Sandusky Register, then owned and edited by Henry D. Cook, which ran through the most part of the year, and so able were they, that they soon attracted public attention to that paper, giving it a prominent State representation.

A Whig, at the birth of the Republican party, Judge Thrall naturally espoused its principles, and his advocacy of the cause assisted in laying the foundation for its superstructure, which, in the future, was to achieve such greatness. Day after day, either in his masterly editorials or correspondence, he elucidated the motives and objects of the new organization, while also firing effective broadsides into the rapidly-sinking Democratic ship, thus doing good work all along the whole line. It is largely true, that the Republican party had its birth in Ohio, and Judge Thrall's powerful pen performed yeoman's service to this party, of which Salmon P. Chase was the founder, continuing in the good work during his two gubernatorial terms. Governor Chase was soon attracted by Judge Thrall's rare ability and honesty of purpose, and took pleasure in honoring him with special positions of the most delicate trust.

These were the days of free and independent banking in Ohio, and under the laws of the State the institutions had to be inspected from time to time, by some one appointed by the governor. Reports would get abroad as to the standing of some one of them, when a special and searching investigation would have to be made, both of which tasks Judge Thrall was frequently called upon to perform, and as his reports were sent in to the governor, he more and more saw how perfect a trust he might repose in him.

Under Mr. Chase's administration, it was discovered that there was collusion between the State auditor and treasurer, of previous administrations, by which large sums of money were stolen from the State. To prevent a recurrence of this, it was thought best to establish an intermediate office between them, as a check upon each, which the legislature did, under the name of the comptroller of the treasury. The qualities needed for the faithful performance of the duties of this office, will at once suggest themselves to the intelligent reader.

There were, of course, numerous applicants for the place, among which Judge Thrall was not one. He was, however, appointed by Governor Chase, and afterward elected by the people, serving the State faithfully in this position from 1858 to 1862. In March, 1864, he was appointed by Governor Brough, and in 1870, by Governor Hayes, one of the trustees of the Central Ohio lunatic asylum, which position he held until his death.

To a mind endowed as was Judge Thrall's, ever seeking new avenues to fields of active benevolence and usefulness, it is not singular that the claims of the Masonic fraternity should have commended themselves to his understanding and appealed to his highest instincts, as we have already found they did, early in his life, thus adding to his means of furthering the highest needs of mankind in works of benevolence. His Masonic record is as follows: He was initiated into Pickaway Lodge, No. 23, at Circleville, on the third of May, 1820. He served as secretary, junior warden, senior warden, and master, from the time he was eligible until he moved to Columbus, in 1846.

In 1841, as deputy grand master, he officiated in organizing Columbus Lodge, No. 30. Two years after his removal to Columbus he was elected master of that lodge, and re-elected for seven years afterwards. In 1823 he was the representative of this lodge to the grand lodge of Ohio. In 1825 and 1829 he was grand junior deacon of the grand lodge of the State, and in 1834 was grand junior warden, and from 1835 to 1843 was deputy grand master, when he was elected most worthy grand master, and served as such until 1846. In 1848 he was grand orator of the grand lodge of Ohio. In 1834, 1836 and 1837 he was grand king, and in 1839 grand high priest of the grand chapter of Royal Arch Masons of Ohio. He was puissant grand master of the grand council of Royal and Select masters of Ohio from 1838 to 1842 inclusive; also president of the order of high priests in the years 1843 to 1846, inclusive. He was one of the original members of the association of Masonic veterans, of which he died president.

Having been advanced to the order of knighthood in 1835, he was faithful in attendance at the annual conclaves of the grand encampment to the close of his life. He was elected grand captain-general in 1848, and grand master in 1850. In 1856 he was a representative to the grand encampment of the United States.

The reports from which we have taken most of the foregoing, says:

"In addition to these various official positions, and during the long period of fifty-three years of devoted active service as a mason, and thirty-eight years of equally incessant service in the ranks of christian knighthood, he was charged, by virtue thereof, with the most important and responsible duties on committees, etc., etc., and his advice and counsel, on important occasions, were largely sought by his companions, and never in vain.

"It rarely falls to the lot of a single individual to attain such a multiplicity of honors as were his; yet the esteem and confidence reposed in him by his companions were never betrayed. He exemplified in his life the exalted characteristics of the true gentleman, devoted mason, and courteous knight."

As a writer on Masonry, Judge Thrall was distinguished. At times he was eloquent, and his productions were ever characterized by sound, practical thought, clothed in language free from ambiguity. Long before his death he had come to be regarded as a patriarch in the annual Masonic assemblies, and so charming was his companionship, that he was always the general favorite of old and young. As a lecturer on Masonry, Judge Thrall was greatly in demand, and whenever it was possible for him to do so, he responded to such calls.

In 1861 he was called to Circleville, to participate in the funeral exercises of one of its pioneers—'Squire James Bell, by name—and while there he was smitten with dyphtheria, which well nigh proved fatal, and from which he never fully recovered, finally, some years later, succumbing to the results of this disease.

While he must have been a considerable sufferer for several years before his death, not even his family knew it. He was always at his place in church, daily indulged in long walks with the erectness and freedom of movement of early manhood rather than the stooping posture and slow pace of old age. But there came a time, a year before his death, when the walks grew few and short, and there was an evident effort to lift himself along, and even before this there had come another symptom of decline—he no longer was weekly seen in any of the Masonic conclaves. He was, of course, greatly missed, and when asked why he did not attend the lodge meetings, the answer of this brave old gentleman was that he was getting so heavy it was too much of an effort to carry himself up the three flights of stairs to the lodge room. There might have been the faintest dash of sadness in his noble face when he gave this answer, but if so, it was rather at the thought that he would no longer be able to enjoy his lodge privileges than over his growing infirmities.

He never brooded, and strikingly true was this of the last seven years of his life, when out of employment and thrown upon his own resources. His well stored mind was a fund of pleasure to him as well as a delight to those with whom he was surrounded. The fact is, he never ceased being a student. It was his habit to constantly pore over some book of useful information—history, all the scientific studies, especially those of languages; and Worcester's dictionary was a companion that he never seemed to tire of. Then, how he enjoyed his grandchildren! and his relatives and friends as often as they were thrown together. His pastime and only game was backgammon, and so fair was he in all his dealing that he made no exception in this; and so when he saw his opponent making what he considered a misplay, he insisted upon correcting it. And thus with books, his own children and their friends and relatives, and backgammon, he past his last years. One would have said to have seen him that they were constant gala days. If he had trouble or care, as he might have had, or physical pain, as he certainly did, no one was ever the wiser for it. That he controlled himself perfectly, was seen when his son, Captain Thrall, adjutant general on General Rosecrans' staff, in 1863, was borne to his last resting-place in the cemetery, and upon his return from the funeral, quietly seating himself, with his torn and bleeding heart, and without the flinching of a muscle, narrating his brave boy's career on paper for publication in the next day's newspapers.

He had one regret, expressed often in his last year, that his early education had not been more thorough. Sitting upon his steps at night, he would look up at the stars and long to know more of astronomy; and then the derivation of words bothered him, and yet hardly so, as he made researches, clumsily, it is true, because of his lack of early scientific education, until he found them; all this with the zeal and enthusiasm of the diamond hunter, and indeed they were the veriest gems to this knowledge-seeker. Thus cheerfully, uncomplainingly, Judge Thrall passed away, June 7, 1873, at the ripe age of seventy-five.

His burial was under the auspices of the grand lodge of the State—a convocation of celebrated knights templar being the especial escort.

SAMUEL D. TURNEY, M. D.

[This biography is in part a condensation from, and in part the words of, a memoir of the late Dr. Turney, prepared by his friend, and professional brother, J. H. Pooley, of Columbus.—EDS.]

The subject of this sketch, the late Dr. Samuel Denny Turney, was born in Columbus, Ohio, December 26, 1824. He belonged to a family of French Huguenot extraction, and which has proved by the men it has produced for successive generations, that it was no mean race. We, as Americans, care little at heart, notwithstanding occasional foolish outbreaks of adulation that seem to speak otherwise, for the vain distinctions of rank and title; and yet we are not without our proper pride in good family connections, and freely endorse the sentiment, "other things being equal, give me blood." And many a fine strain of family, seeking freer outlook and fairer chance in the western world, has left its impress, indelibly and for good, upon our composite American race. Of all of these, none have produced worthier sons, or deserved better of the adopted country, than the French Huguenots.

Dr. Turney's father was a physician, who was born in Shepherdstown, Virginia, in 1786, and removed to Ross county, Ohio, in 1800. He commenced the practice of medicine in Jefferson, Pickaway county. He removed to Circleville about the time the town was first laid out, in 1810; removed from Circleville to Columbus in 1823, where he practiced until his death, in 1827.

The following notice of Dr. Daniel Turney, published in one of the local papers at the time, deserves insertion here:

"The deceased was an eminent physician and surgeon, and for many years an arduous and successful practitioner in both departments. The distinguishing characteristics of his mind were firmness, and energy, and ardor in the practice of his profession. Confident in the resources of the healing art, and in his own mind, he never remitted exertions while life remained. His intimate acquaintance with the diseases peculiar to our climate, arising from a sound medical education, and long extensive practice; his energy, and promptitude, and resources, in alarming and complicated cases, as well as his great personal success, render his death a public calamity, which has caused the deepest sensibility. As a skillful and successful practitioner, Dr. Turney has left few, if any, superiors in the State. He was of plain, unaffected manners, generous and liberal as a man, and without the least tincture of avarice in his composition."

This sketch, meager as it is, is not without interest, as it shows whence came some of the traits of his son, which made him so eminently successful in the same arduous profession.

Youngest of a family of four, left an orphan when thus a mere infant, he grew up under his mother's fostering care without the paternal restraint, so wholesome in its influence, and without those means for a thorough education which he would probably have enjoyed had his father lived. Well for him he had a good mother; one of the many whom the world knows not, save as the results of their lives are seen in noble and worthy sons who rise up in the after time to call them blessed. Her name was Janet Stirling Denny, daughter of General James Denny, an officer of the war of 1812, and one of the pioneer settlers of Ohio.

Even as a child—almost as an infant—the young Samuel showed strong indications of a character of his own. He was distinguished in the earliest days of his boyhood by his love for books and study, and showed the rudiments of that love for art and the beauty of nature, which was a strong characteristic in his mature years. He attended the common schools and the high school, and, after finishing the course at the latter, he went, through the kindness of M. J. Gilbert, esq., who owned a scholarship there, to Milner Hall, at Kenyon college, Gambier, for two years; at the expiration of this short course, being thrown upon his own resources, he became clerk in the drug store of Sumner Clark, in Columbus, working faithfully by day, and studying by night, being his own principal teacher—now, as always, laboring for the much coveted knowledge that comes so easily to some, and is so little prized.

In 1840, the family moved back to Circleville, where he spent the rest of his life. He now entered, as clerk, in the store of Ruggles & Finley, and, having determined upon his future profession, he read medicine assiduously, in all his spare time, at first without anybody knowing what he was about, latterly under the direction of Dr. P. K. Hull. He attended lectures at Starling medical college, during the session of 1849.

Sam D. Perry

and 1830, and at the University of Pennsylvania during 1850–51, graduating from the latter college in April, 1851. He immediately entered into practice in Circleville, where he continued to exercise his profession to the end of his life, with the exception of the time spent in the army during the civil war, and a short vacation of a few months, spent in Europe. He was married, June 17, 1851, to Miss Evalina McCrea, who died in 1870, by whom he had two children, a daughter, who died in childhood, and a son, Harry, who lives to mourn his father's loss and emulate his virtues.

However popular he became afterwards, and no man could be more so, he found a young physician's life, at first, a hard struggle. He had refused a partnership with an older practitioner, proudly desirous of winning his own way. He won his way, professionally, by a hard and long struggle, and became one of the most trusted guides and advisers. He was in partnership before the war, first with P. K. Hull, and subsequently with Dr. A. W. Thompson.

Dr. Turney was never a politician, but he always had opinions, and the people among whom he lived always knew what those opinions were. He was an Abolitionist before the war, even a violent one. His ardent temperament and inborn love of liberty, could not tolerate even the thought of human slavery; and, though these sentiments were by no means popular then and there, he was not the man to flinch from them on that account, but rather the one to die for them, should occasion demand, and this his neighbors and fellow-citizens knew right well.

At the opening of the war he was the first surgeon to tender his services to the State, and, until it ended, he was in continuous and active service. He was first attached as surgeon to the Thirteenth regiment of Ohio volunteers, June, 1861; commissioned assistant surgeon of volunteers by the United States, February, 1863; surgeon of volunteers, March, 1863; and lieutenant-colonel by brevet, for faithful and meritorious services, in 1865; and he was medical director on the staff of General H. P. Van Cleve, division and post medical director of hospitals at Murfreesboro, Tennessee, and held other high and honorable positions, which bore the amplest testimony to his patriotism, devotion to duty, and professional efficiency. The surgical history of the war, that noble monument of life- and limb-saving surgery, bears ample testimony, among that of others, to the labor and skill of Dr. Turney. Had he been so disposed, he might have recorded many more cases, as treated by him, in that treasury of American military surgery; but he was ever reticent of trumpeting his own fame, either by tongue or pen. The cases given in the "Surgical Volume," so, called, parts I and II, sufficiently establish his skill as a surgeon and physician.

At the close of the war he returned to Circleville, and, in partnership with Dr. A. W. Thompson, resumed his practice, which in a few years became the largest and most lucrative ever enjoyed by any member of the profession in Pickaway county. It was particularly in the department of surgery his services were, during this period, demanded, so much so that nearly, if not quite, all of this business passed into his hands, and the important operations of lithotomy, tracheotomy, ovariotomy and amputation, necessary within the circuit of his practice, were all performed by him. An intense student, keeping pace with all the reforms in diagnosis and practice, his ideal of resources of the medical art, was never attained; and yet when baffled, such was his infinity of resource, that, instead of ever surrendering to his enemy, disease, he nobly sustained the strife, and yielded only in the presence of the conqueror, Death himself.

Dr. Turney was made surgeon-general of the State of Ohio, in 1868, by Governor Hayes, and again, in 1872, by Governor Noyes—compliments well deserved by his eminent ability and public services during the war. He was appointed professor of physiology and pathology in Starling medical college, Columbus, Ohio, in 1867, but only lectured during one season—that of 1867–68—his large practice precluding the possibility to further devotion to this department of duty. He was very diffident, too, and seemed to have but little confidence in himself as a speaker, but, at a later period, he resumed professorial functions with great success. His partnership with Dr. Thompson was dissolved by mutual consent, January 1, 1874. Retaining a large practice, and devoting himself actively to it, his incessant labor began to tell upon his health. In June, 1875, warned that he must either take a vacation or soon desist altogether, he went to Europe. He remained abroad until 1876—not a sufficient length of time to thoroughly recuperate—and, on his return, immediately entered practice. He was first in partnership with Dr. C. A. Foster, but, in 1877, went into partnership with Dr. A. P. Courtright, with whom he was associated until his death. In the fall of 1876 he was appointed professor of diseases of women and children, in Starling medical college, which chair he filled with great and increasing acceptance to the close of his life. He was only spared to give one completed course of lectures, and a part of another.

Dr. Turney was, in every sense, a cultured physician—diligent, conscientious, generous; and many kind professional charities endear him to the memory of that class of patients unable to pay for their doctor's services. As an operator he was fearless, quick, and characteristically nervous and impatient of delay or negligence on the part of an assistant. He was extremely modest, and had a repugnance to professional or other display. In person Dr. Turney was of medium size, rather slender, but of symmetrical proportions, and endowed with great muscular strength and agility. As the portrait which accompanies this sketch well shows, his face was handsome and expressive, and yet, so constantly and quickly did it change that no picture could show it at its best.

Dr. Turney was not a member of any church, but that he was of a deeply religious nature, none who knew him thoroughly could doubt. In this connection, and as a fitting conclusion to this sketch, we reproduce the following extract from a letter of Rev. James T. Franklin, Episcopal rector of St. Stephen's church, Middlebury, Vermont, formerly of St. Phillip's, Circleville:

"Having just learned, and that with great sorrow and grief, of the death of Dr. S. D. Turney, I ask the privilege of expressing my sense of his worth and of our loss. It was with joy and pride that I called him friend, and it is with a deep sense of bereavement that I write. The fast-falling tears of many who loved him are a tribute to his worth. It was my happy lot to know him intimately, and I loved him dearly. His was not a cold, impassive nature—sparks of righteous anger and indignation were showered upon the objects of his scorn and wrath; but I can testify to an amiability, a tenderness, a sweetness, a ove of all things beautiful, rare amongst men. His wide charity many will witness to, and his marked skill and usefulness all will acknowledge.

"He talked often and freely with me of those subjects which are of the firs importance to thoughtful men, and I can declare that, whilst his mental clearness and power, and his thorough learning, forced him to abandon the superstitions imbedded in mueh that passes for Christian doctrine, nevertheless he recognized and bowed down his soul before the great Father of spirits, 'in whom we move and have our being.' He served and praised his God in acts of tenderness and love to his creatures. He did justice, loved mercy, and walked humbly with his God. Who requires more?"

CALEB ATWATER.

One of the most widely known of Circleville's residents was Caleb Atwater, minister, lawyer, educator, legislator, author, and antiquarian. He was, in fact, a man of national reputation. He won distinction by his able services in the legislature, in behalf of the causes of education and public improvements, and a wide fame through the publication of the results of his archæological studies and his history of Ohio—the first ever written.

He was born on Christmas day, 1778, at North Adams, Massachusetts, and was the son of Ebenezer and Rachel (Parks) Atwater. His mother was of Welsh extraction. She died when Caleb was but five years old. His father placed the funds left for the child's support in the hands of Esquire Jones, of North Adams, with whom the boy lived until he was eighteen year of age. About that time Williams college was founded, and the stir caused by the opening of the institution led the young man into reflections, which resulted in the formation of a strong desire for a liberal education. Although not of age, his guardian warmly seconded his plan of attending the school, and assisted him to do so. He passed through the college, and received the honorary degree of master of arts. The diploma given him is now thought to be in the museum of the Boston Antiquarian society. After leaving college, young Atwater removed to New York, where he opened a school for young ladies, and gave instruction to the daughters and sisters of a large number of personal friends. He studied for the ministry at the same time, and two or three years later was ordained to preach in the Presbyterian church. He married a Miss Diana, who lived but one year, and whose death was a very severe blow to him. His health failed, and as he was urged by his physicians to take up the study of law and practice that profession, instead of remaining in the ministry, he did so. He commenced studying with Judge Smiley, of Marcellus, New York, and in a few months was admitted to the bar. He then married Balinda, a daughter of Judge Butler. Engaging in a business which turned out disastrously, he was thrown entirely upon his own resources, and decided to seek out a field of usefulness in the great and but little known western country. He came to Circleville in 1815, and remained there until his death, March 13, 1867.

He was occupied in the practice of law until chosen to represent Pickaway county in the legislature. Here he performed the services for which the people of Ohio have greatest reason to be thankful and to hold his memory in the most sacred reverence. The cause of popular education had all along occupied his attention, and when he was invested with the power of a legislator, he exerted, constantly and strenuously, all his influence to create such laws as would forever secure to the people of the State a plan for the education of their youth. He and his associates had a long and hard struggle to secure the embodiment of their views in a legal enactment, but they finally succeeded, and the result has been one of incalculable good. They laid the corner-stone upon which the fabric of our present system of common schools has been slowly and thoroughly built. Mr. Atwater was also one of that originally small minority in the legislature which started the movement for that vast public improvement—the canals. After the close of his term in the legislature, he was appointed to represent the United States in the treaty with the Winnebago Indians, at Galena, Illinois.

His first literary production of general interest to the public was his contribution to the Archæologica Americana, upon western antiquities, the result of studies begun in Circleville, upon his arrival there, and continued for some years—in fact, for his whole lifetime. He wrote, also, "A Trip to Prairie-du-Chien," "An Essay on Education," and last, but most important (if we do not except the book on western antiquities), an able and comprehensive history of Ohio.

He was the confident and friend of the first, best men of his time in Ohio and the country at large, and numbered among his acquaintances many of the eminent scholars of Europe, who visited this country to study its antiquities, or, coming for other purposes, developed an interest in them.

Mr. Atwater was a man of somewhat eccentric characteristics, but of large and genuine worth. He combined with culture, the qualities of exceeding kindness and of the most rigid conscientiousness. He was unselfish; labored for the benefit of others—the masses and his neighbors—and exhibited but little desire for pecuniary gain or personal advancement. His character commanded the respect, and his talents and his employment of them, the admiration, of all who, personally or by reputation, had knowledge of his life and services.

Caleb Atwater's second wife lived until about ten years previous to his death, and was the mother of six sons and three daughters: Butler, Douglass, DeWitt Clinton, Henry, George, Caleb, Belinda Ann, Aurelia, and Lucy. The only one living in Circleville is Belinda Ann (Mrs. William Foster). Aurelia (Mrs. Henry Coouts) lives in Kansas, as does also the only living son, DeWitt Clinton. Lucy (Mrs. M. Brown) is in Gambier, Ohio.

THE "ZIEGER FAMILY."

Jacob Zieger, sr., emigrated from Pennsylvania (near Berlin) to this vicinity, about the year 1805, and located section nineteen—the identical tract of land now partially occupied by the city of Circleville. He was born in 1740, and married Judith, the widow of J. Sauer (or Sowers), of Brownsville, Pennsylvania. Of this marriage there were eight children, as follows: Philip Jacob, born 1767, married Mary Easter; Catharina, born 1768, married Colonel Valentine Keffer; Barbara, born 1772, married George Zimmer; Judith, born 1774, married Samuel Watt; Jacob, jr., born 1776, married Susanna Easter; Philip, born 1778; Frederick, born 1784; Margaret, born 1787, married John Valentine. These sons and daughters occupied different portions of the land, and cleared and improved it.

Jacob Zieger, sr., donated, to "the director of the town" (whose office was one of importance for many years, but has now become obsolete), a considerable portion of the land on which the city is located, for public purposes. He (Zeiger) caused the court of common pleas of Pickaway county to pass an order to the director of the town (at their session, held in the second story of his son, Jacob's, house, in Circleville), which reads as follows:

August, 1811.

"Ordered, That the director reserve all the southeast bank, or fortification—elevation of the square on the circle—for county uses, and sell no lots including the same. And, further ordered, that he reserve lots number 115 and 116, for the use of the Lutheran and Calvanistic German congregations, for a church and burial." [See court records for 1810 and '11, page 120].

These lots are the ones on which the Trinity Lutheran church now stands.

COLONEL JOHN CRADLEBAUGH.

Among the distinguished names of men now passed away, whose lives, wholly, or in part, were identified with the history of Circleville, few, if any, will be remembered longer, or with a more affectionate admiration, than that of John Cradlebaugh. His father, Andrew Cradlebaugh, about the year 1836, built the well-known "Canal Hotel," on Main street, which he kept for several years, and near which he also owned and carried on a tannery. John was born and educated in this place, and commenced here the practice of law, in which profession he immediately took a high rank. We regret that we have neither space nor time minutely to trace his remarkable career, from his entrance upon public life, as an Ohio State senator, to his death, under the shadow of a strange reverse, in 1878, at Eureka, Nevada. But we must content ourselves with the sketch of his life, character, and public services, embodied in the following eloquent funeral address delivered at his re-interment in Forest cemetery, on Decoration day, May 30, 1879, by the Rev. S. H. McMullin:

"Before us lies all that is mortal of one whose earthly life was marked by no ordinary vicissitudes. A practitioner of the bar of this county, a member of the senate of this State, a federal judge in Utah, a territorial delegate to the national congress from the territory of Nevada, a colonel of volunteers, commanding the One Hundred and Fourteenth Ohio, a teamster, hauling ore from the mines of Nevada—such were the different phases under which he prosecuted his life work. It would be presumptuous in one who was an utter stranger to the deceased, to attempt any analysis, of either his personal or religious character. Of his civic services and virtues only can I speak, taking thus my humble part in the tribute due to departed worth.

Born and bred in this city, he had the respect of all who knew him, and stood high as an advocate; meeting often, in debate, Jonathan Renick, Thomas Jones, Judge Hedges, Henry F. Page, P. C. Smith, and others. At the time of his appointment, by President Buchanan, to a federal judgeship in Utah, he was a law partner with Judge Hedges.

His judgeship, and his services in the war of the Rebellion, are the prominent periods of his life. When, as a federal judge, he commenced his administration of justice in Utah, the hands of the saints were yet moist with the innocent blood of the Mountain Meadow massacre. A powerful hierarchy, prostituting the sacred names of God and the Saviour of mankind to infamous orgies of blood and lust, stood ready by every means to shield the miserable wretches who, as their instruments, had cut the throats of women and children. Any ordinary man would have sought to make a virtue of necessity, and shield himself behind forms, and compromise with what he could not overthrow single-handed. Heedless of the Danite band, that organization of assassins like unto the destruction that walketh in darkness and wasteth at noonday; regardless of threats of violence, and even of open war, Judge Cradlebaugh opened his court and brought the murderers to his bar. When he found that the deadly power of Mormonism paralyzed the arm of justice, by silencing jury convictions, he dismissed the juries, and, as a committing magistrate, commenced the task alone. He himself examined witnesses, made arrests in every quarter, and struck terror to the scared consciences of Mormon dignitaries. But for the imbecility, and even opposition, of those on whom he had a right to rely for co-operation and support, this one man, rightly discerning the signs of the times, would have done his part, and that not a small one, toward cutting out the foul ulcer which still hangs upon the body politic, swollen with all uncleanness, and festering with horrid lust.

But the notes of another conflict were already in the air. The crisis was fast approaching which was to determine whether a government of the people should or should not perish from off the earth. When that crisis came, our friend was not found wanting. The motives of men are almost always mixed; times of excitement are not always, or generally, times of pure reflection; but when the booming of Sumter's artillery resounded through the land, delegate Cradlebaugh's heart was with the old flag. He had confidence in his country's past; he had hope for that country's future; he abhorred the ways of darkness and treason; he felt the grandeur of the call that bade him die, if need be, for God, and truth, and native land. Leaving his seat in the national congress, at a time when the northern border was full of those who secretly wished for peace at any price, he organized his regiment, and then returning to Washington, finished his term of office. He rejoined his command at Youngspoint, Louisiana, in February, 1863, and after taking part in the battles of Thompson Hills, Champion Hills and Ben River Bridge, he led his men in the first charge upon Vicksburg. Amidst a rain of bullets, he received one in the mouth, which virtually ended his military career. Soon afterward he returned to Nevada.

According to men's ordinary estimate of such things, he passed away under the shadow of reverses. But we may well believe that the spirit which did not quail before bloodshed here, or the bayonets of armed treason, carried him heroically through the duties of the comparatively humble station in which he died. It is the testimony of one who knew him well, that amidst all the exigencies of his varied career, he could not recall one mean or dishonorable act. And history has, to-day, for him its vindication, as we lay him in his final resting-place, in this beautiful city of the dead. What was said of those who died for others of old, we may also say of him; that committing indeed the uncertainty of success to hope, yet as to what was present to his view, he nobly confided in himself, and in his own exertions in action, preferring resistance, though accompanied with death, to safety, purchased by submission. For he both knew what ought to be done, and, in action, was keenly alive to shame, and even when failing in his attempts, was yet unwilling that his country should thereby lose the advantage of his valor, but contributed to it his noblest offering. It is fitting that he should lie here, where loyal hands shall keep his memory green; but for such as he, wherever their dust may mingle with the elements, the whole earth is a sepulchre."

COLONEL VALENTINE KEFFER,

a prominent business man and politician in Pickaway county for many years, emigrated from Pennsylvania in 1805, several years before the county was organized, or the first strokes of the axe had marked the rudest outlines of the ground now included in the town of Circleville. He purchased the fractional section adjoining section nineteen, and lying between it and the Scioto river; on which he resided till 1838, when he moved into town. Some years before leaving Pennsylvania he had married Catharina, the second child and eldest daughter of Jacob Zieger.

On the breaking out of the war of 1812, being identified with the militia of the county, he was appointed major, and accompanied General James Renick on an expedition to the northern part of the State. After his return to the settlement he was promoted to the rank of colonel, and, in 1813, he was elected to the State legislature, in which he served ten years -the last being in 1828. During all this time his popularity was so great that it was deemed little better than folly for any one to run against him.

When the seat of government was first established at Columbus, there was not a stage coach running in Ohio; and, as we now roll along in a palace railroad car on a smooth track, or in an easy-going spring carriage on a good turnpike, and view, on either side of us the cheerful homesteads, the wide fields of corn and wheat, and the fat cattle grazing in the green pastures, it is difficult to imagine our early representative, bestride a horse, threading his way among the brush toward the capital, armed and equipped with pistols and provender, and catching every sound with apprehension of danger.

Colonel Keffer was also twice chosen presidential elector, casting his vote, the first time, for Jackson, and afterward for Van Buren. He was one of the original proprietors of the Circleville Watchman, the Democratic organ of the county, established in 1835, and had editorial charge of it for two or three years.

He died March 9, 1852, in the seventy-fifth year of his age.

A daughter of his married Mr. G. F. Wittich, one of the old residents of Circleville, to whom we are indebted for the substance of the above sketch, as also that of the Zieger family, on another page of this work.

THE REV. JOHN DREISBACH, minister of the Evangelical Association, and for many years a resident of Pickaway county, was a descendant of Martin Dreisbach, who was born in 1717, in the earldom of Witgenstein, Germany, and came to this country in 1746, taking up his residence upon a farm in Lancaster county, Pennsylvania. The emigrant, Martin Dreisbach, and his wife (Anna Eve Hoffman), daughter of a teacher in Nausauseigen, had six children, Jacob, Henry, John, Martin, Margaret, and Catherine. The father died in 1799, at the age of eighty-two years, and the mother in 1789, at the age of sixty-five. Martin, their fourth son, and the father of the subject of this biography, was born in Berks county, Pennsylvania, in 1764, and married Sabina Fred Buchs, (pronounced, as anglicized, Books) who was born in Sussex county, New Jersey, in 1762. Martin died in 1831, in Pennsylvania, and his wife died in Fairfield county, Ohio, in 1849. They were the parents of six children. John Dreisbach, who became the prominent preacher, and of whose life we shall give the particulars, was the eldest, and was born June 5, 1789. His brothers and sisters were Anna Eve, Susannah, Leah, Elizabeth, and Martin.

John Dreisbach was the son of pious parents. Both of them were for many years—from 1816 to the close of their lives—members of the Evangelical Association. It was natural that the son should inherit a religious nature. He obtained a rudimentary education, and at an early age exhibited the tendency which constantly grew stronger as he advanced in life and knowledge, and which made him one of the great forces in the building up of the Evangelical Association, and of christianity among the Germans. That was his life-work, and he labored in it with enthusiasm and zeal. Every leaf of the history of the Evangelical Association bears tribute to his influence and ability. He entered the ministry of this association in Pennsylvania, when eighteen years of age, as is asserted by some of his descendants, but probably when but seventeen, according to the early records of the church in Pennsylvania. The first mention of his name is as one of the four local preachers of the society, in 1806. Young Dreisbach went out the following year as a traveling preacher, and thus began his career of widely extended usefulness. He was the fifth itinerant appointed, and during his first service in that capacity, was often accompanied by the famous founder of the association, the brave, zealous, conscientious, and much maligned Rev. Jacob Albright. Mr. Dreisbach wrote in his late years of Albright, as follows: "I derived great benefit from his paternal instruction and pious example, as well as from his fervent prayers, childlike confidence in God, and his humble resignation to his holy will. All this made deep impressions on my mind, and was highly useful to me afterward in my calling as a christian and minister of the gospel." Dreisbach was stationed in 1807, with another preacher, George Miller, upon the old circuit, which embraced about twenty appointments, and included parts of the counties of Dauphin, Lebanon, Lancaster, Berks, Bucks, Montgomery, Northampton, Lehigh, and Schuylkill. The next year he was transferred to the Northumberland circuit, where his duties were difficult and attended with great disadvantages and self-denial. About this time there arose a powerful storm of opposition, persecution and calumny against the association, and all of those who preached and labored in the cause. The storm was directed principally against the Methodists, who were then increasing very rapidly, but the people generally, at that time, understood by the term "Methodists," also the Evangelical Association, the United Brethren, and all who held the same or similar religious views. A very bitter feeling of prejudice was developed. Libels were uttered, and as they obtained many believers, the feeling of enmity ran so high against the new and struggling church, that violence was often threatened, and some declared their willingness to take up arms against the people of the little flock, and exterminate them, if it were not contrary to the laws.

An incident in the life of the Rev. John Dreisbach confirms what has been said of the bitterness against the preaching of the association. We obtain the facts from the Rev. W. W. Orwig's History of the Evangelical Association. In the month of August, 1808, it appears that the preacher returned from a general meeting near the Muelbach, in order to fill an appointment in the evening in Jonestown, Lebanon county, Pennsylvania; but as he had before been disturbed while preaching there, it was his intention to hold service, on this occasion, among his friends, without giving any public notice. "From fear, not of the Jews, but of heathen-like christians," the doors were locked and the window-shutters fastened on the inside, before the preaching was commenced. After singing and prayer, Mr. Dreisbach began his sermon, but as the preliminary exercises had probably been heard by some of the adversaries, he had proceeded but a brief time when a mob gathered, and forcing the doors and shutters open, entered the house, making a great noise and giving utterance to violent imprecations, putting a stop to the services. The preacher went among the crowd to restore order, but was seized by several ruffians and dragged toward the door. The lights were all extinguished and he was very roughly treated. The men who had seized upon him hallooed to their companions who were outside, "Boys, open the door, we have got him;" and they replied, "Give it to him; kill the priest!" Dreisbach was apprehensive of the worst, and concentrating his strength, by a sudden effort he freed himself from the strong hold of the men and escaped from them. But he was still in the midst of the crowd in the pitchy darkness. As his assailants were groping around for him, cursing his escape, they accidentally bestowed several blows upon each other, and while they were thus engaged he slipped out of the crowd and the mob got out doors. Alarmed for the minister, some of his friends hastened out also, but were seized and much abused. The ringleaders in this mob were arrested.

Rev. Mr. Dreisbach continued preaching in the Lancaster, Northumberland and Lebanon circuit, for many years. He received a tempting offer from Bishop Asbury, of the Methodist church, to join that denomination, but declined it on account of his affection for the Association. His allegiance to this organization was unwavering, although he could have many times bettered himself, in a pecuniary way at least, by joining a church of similar faith. The pay was small for a number of years—thirty dollars, then fifty dollars—sums insufficient to keep an itinerant in clothes, much less to meet other needs of self or family.

In 1812 Mr. Dreisbach was placed in charge of the mission of New York, during which year he passed through many trials; among them, physical ailment, which rendered him incapable of attending to his ministerial duties, as he had formerly done. For a time he was threatened with entire prostration, but he passed through this trying period safely, and was, perhaps, only strengthened for the enlarged responsibility he was to bear. Almost the entire duty of managing the affairs of ten associations devolved upon him after 1812, and, instead of laboring in the older-established circuits, from that time forward he was engaged in laying out new circuits, farther west.

In 1814 the conference elected the first presiding elder—the subject of this sketch. During 1815 he preached several times in Philadelphia, and in the following year he traveled westward as far as Buffalo and Niagara Falls, preaching at those places and in Canada with good effect. From this time onward the preacher's sphere constantly enlarged. He had compiled a catechism, which came into general use, and now, in conjunction with a brother minister, he arranged the German hymn book, and re-arranged and improved the "Articles of Faith and Discipline."

In 1816 he was the leader in the movement to effect a union of the United Brethren and the Evangelical Association. In 1817 he preached (March 2d) the dedicatory sermon of the first church erected by the society at New Berlin, Union county, Pennsylvania.

John Dreisbach constantly increased in popularity, both as preacher and man. In 1828 and 1829 he was a member of the legislature of Pennsylvania, and, at a later period, was talked of as a candidate for governor of that State. He had no ambition for distinction, however, and no enthusiasm for any labor except that which would advance the interests of his church and the cause of christianity.

He removed to Ohio in 1831, and bought a farm in Pickaway township. He paid but little attention to this, however, but continued his labors as a minister, beginning among his neighbors, and afterward having charge of the circuit which included Pickaway county. He was also stationed, for a time, at Dayton, and also at Chillicothe, and for several years was editor of the Evangelical Messenger, the organ of the association at Cleveland, Ohio.

His life was one of unintermittent activity. His pen was constantly employed after he had, in his old age, ceased preaching, and he wrote a vast deal of matter, chiefly religious. Much of the material for the history of the association was gathered by him. With scarcely any thought for himself, but seeking constantly the advancement of the church and the spiritual good of his neighbors and of humanity in general, he labored on day after day, and year after year, until the close of his life.

He died in Circleville, where the last years of his life were spent, August 20, 1871, loved, respected, regretted and mourned by all.

The domestic life of the preacher began in 1811, when he married Catharine Eyer, who died a little more than two years later, leaving two daughters—Salome, born January 13, 1812 (who married Henry Buchwalter, of Ross county, and is now deceased), and Elizabeth, born July 12, 1813 (now Mrs. Benjamin Steeley, of Pickaway township.)

Mr. Dreisbach married his second wife, Fanny Eyer, a sister of the first, in 1817. The offspring of this union were five sons and four daughters, all of whom are living but three. Abraham E., born February 21, 1818, was a minister, and for many years a worker in the church. He died February 27, 1864. Isaac E., born March 28, 1819; married Lydia Hittel, and resides in Pickaway township. Catharine E., born August 17, 1820; married Rev. Louis Einsel, and lives near Lafayette, Indiana. Sophia E., born November 27, 1821, is the wife of Eli Loos, of Monroe county, Michigan. Jacob E., born March 17, 1823, became a minister, and is now president of an orphan institute at Flat Rock, Seneca county, Ohio. He married Catharine Wagner. Leah E., born October 28, 1824, married D. B. Wagner, and resides in Circleville. Martin E. was born September 8, 1826. He is a farmer, and has his home in Circleville. He married Elizabeth Reedy. Susannah E., born March 4, 1828, is the wife of George L. Kamp, of Woodford county, Illinois. John E. was born April 28, 1830, and died February 27, 1864. Fannie E. (now Mrs. L. C. Spickler, of Pickaway township), was born November 26, 1832. Martha E. was born November 7, 1834, and died November 25, 1876. She was the wife of Dr. W. C. Gildersleeve, of Hallsville, Ross county, Ohio.

The owner of the old Dreisbach homestead in Pickaway township is Clifton R., a son of John Dreisbach, deceased. He is a farmer by occupation, and one of the best in his part of the county. He married Lina, daughter of Abraham Hitler.

WILLIAM RENICK.

The genealogy of the Renick family is only traditional. We learn from it that the progenitors emigrated from Germany, with many other families, to Scotland, to escape the religious persecution that then prevailed in the former country, and after a time, a part of them at least, removed to Colevain county, Ireland. In the meantime, the name had undergone a change from Rienwich to Renwich, probably to suit the dialect of the country. In the process of time, one of them was created a peer, and he purchasing all the property of his two brothers, they, with their father, emigrated to America. But the peer not being able to pay the purchase money at the time, engaged to send it to them within a specified period, which proved a fortunate arrangement for the brothers, as the vessel in which they embarked was robbed by the pirate, "Black Beard," but the money came safe to hand at the stated time.

We here narrate an incident, said to have occurred on the passage. When the pirates boarded the vessel the old man Renick was asleep. The noise awakening him, he started to find out the cause of the confusion. He encountered the robbers in the act of opening a box of candles, and he exclaimed "Hoot toot; what is all this fuss about." The pirates said they would stop his mouth, so they thrust a candle down his throat.

The brothers, with their father, first settled in eastern Pennsylvania—at least, until their money came. Afterwards they removed to Hardy county, Virginia, on the south branch of the Potomac river, and from that point their descendants scattered in various directions—some south to the James river, others to Gambier county, Virginia, and others still to the States of Kentucky, Missouri and Ohio. In the meantime the name had undergone two more changes: from Renwich to Rennick; and then later, one of the ns was dropped, making the name spell, as at present, Renick.

There are traits of character in this large family which, with propriety, may be termed characteristic. Although the family has been in the country more than two hundred years, and scattered over many different and widely distant localities, in all of which, it is believed, could be found men of wealth and large influence, yet there appears to have existed among them from the first a singular unanimity of sentiment in eschewing a political life. It is apparent that they have uniformly been well nigh devoid of political aspirations, but seemed rather to have preferred a more retired, unpresuming and independent life, whilst of many of them it can be said with more assurance, that they have been, for the past two or three generations at least, very active, enterprising and highly public-spirited citizens, taking an active, if not a leading, part in every scheme or enterprise that presented a fair promise of resulting beneficially, either to their respective localities or communities in which they resided, or to the country at large.

William Renick, who was a direct descendant of the emigrants, was born and raised in Hardy county, Virginia, and was for a time deputy surveyor under Lord Fairfax, in surveying the southeastern counties of Virginia. By some accident he had his compass broken, and had to cease work until another compass could be ordered from London, England, which consumed some five or six months. His grandson, William Renick, of Circleville, Ohio, now has the latter compass in his possession. It is probably one hundred and twenty-five years old. William Renick had four sons and four daughters. The sons, Felix, George, Thomas, and William, came to the Scioto valley, from 1797 to 1803. All of them, previous to their final settlement, secured large and valuable tracts of land. The daughters all married, but remained in Virginia.

Thomas Renick and his wife both died the same day, in August, 1804. William died in 1845, aged sixty-four years; Felix died in 1848, aged seventy-eight; and George died in 1863, aged eighty-seven years. George had three sons and three daughters. The sons, William, Josiah, and Harness, finally settled in Pickaway county, respectively, in 1826, 1828, and 1832; but all had done business in the county for years before, and have all been residents of the city of Circleville for many years. Mrs. N. J. Turney, one of the daughters, has also been a resident of the county and city for over thirty years. The other two daughters, Mrs. J. M. Terry, of Philadelphia, and Mrs. Hugh Bell, of Chillicothe, were at one time also residents of the county. All the above mentioned sons and daughters of George Renick are still living.

William Renick, the oldest son of George Renick, and subject of this sketch, was born in Chillicothe, Ohio, November 12, 1804. He commenced doing an extensive business at the early age of fifteen and a half years, on account of his father's delicate health at the time, imperatively requiring the assistance of his son. This circumstance necessitated an abrupt relinquishment of the son's further attendance at school, before his education, as had been originally designed by his father, had been completed, which was to have been a full classical education. At his majority he entered into active business life on his own account. His occupation was that of a farmer, including that of raising, grazing, and feeding of cattle on rather an extensive scale for those days. feeding some seasons as high as three hundred head of cattle in one year, on corn grown on his own land. Besides this he has driven and shipped to an eastern market a very large number of fat cattle in his time, and is now the oldest living drover west of the mountains, if not in the United States, having begun that occupation as early as the year 1820.

He purchased and brought from Texas twelve hundred head of cattle, in 1854, the first lot of Texas cattle ever brought north, at least, in large numbers, and was considered the pioneer drover in that trade, that has now grown to such enormous proportions.

He was also the inventor of the present mode of constructing turnpike roads. For nearly three years he constantly importuned the directors of the Columbus and Portsmouth company, and finally succeeded in inducing them to adopt his plan, which from its cheapness and usefulness, has long since been the only plan of construction of all turnpikes now built in the west. Hitherto they had been too costly for private enterprise. This was the first road built of the kind, and it was only because the means could not be raised to build any other kind of graveled road, that the plan was adopted, not that the directors approved the plan.

William Renick is a staunch Republican, and his articles to the press on the "Currency of the Country," "The Dollar of the Daddies," "Revenue Tariff," "Free Trade," Banks and Banking System," etc., have done much to mold popular opinion. He is a ready writer, and his communications on "Blue Grass," "Shorthorns," "Thoroughbred Cattle in Ohio,'" "Early Cattle Trade in Ohio," etc., have been widely circulated and read throughout the country.

Altogether, his life has been a very active, enterprising and highly public spirited one, although he has labored all the time from early age under the dire misfortune of a partial, and for the last twenty-five years, a total want of hearing. Mr. Renick has been three times married, but has no living children. His only son died in 1855, at the age of twenty-eight years, but unmarried.

JACOB LUDWIG.

Daniel Ludwig, the father of Jacob, was born in Berks county, Pennsylvania, June 4, 1748. His parents, Daniel and Mary Ludwig, were natives of Germany. He was associated with Governor Joseph Heister in a store at Reading, Pennsylvania, for a number of years. In the fall of 1806 he emigrated to Ohio, with two-horse teams bringing his family, consisting of his wife and nine children, and a small stock of goods, with which he intended to open a store here. With this object in view, he erected the large brick house which is now the residence of Jacob Ludwig, in one portion of which the store was to be kept. But three of his sons, on whose aid he depended, died, and the store was never established, the goods being disposed of to the neighbors. The house alluded to—a view of which is elsewhere given—was built in 1809, and is, without doubt, the oldest brick house in Pickaway county. Mr. Ludwig, on his arrival here, purchased a half section of land, a portion of which is now owned by Jacob Ludwig, and subsequently entered lands in this and adjoining counties, until he became the owner of about three thousand acres. He was the original owner of the land on which the town of Logan, Hocking county, now stands.

He was married three times: first, in 1778, to Appelona, daughter of Michael and Susannah Miller, who was born March 14, 1760. By this marriage were born the following-named children: John, born January 29, 1779; Christena, born November 27, 1781; Daniel, born October 11, 1783—died January 28, 1790; George, born September 3, 1785—died February 8, 1810. The mother died May 14, 1787. March 11, 1788, Mr. Ludwig married Eve, daughter of Casper and Rebecca Grissmer, who was born November 12, 1766. By her he had two children: Thomas, born January 15, 1789—died February 15, 1810; and Joseph, born October 1, 1790—died September 10, 1807. Mrs. Eve Ludwig died October 21, 1800. His third wife was Elizabeth, daughter of John and Elizabeth Shupert, whom he married in 1802. She was born March 3, 1776. To them were born the following children: Catharine, born July 7, 1803; Mary born November 30, 1804; Jacob, born April 17, 1806; Elizabeth, born March 13, 1808; Rachel, born November 25, 1810; Susannah, born August 9, 1812. Daniel Ludwig died June 9, 1825; and his wife, Elizabeth, May 3, 1816.

Jacob Ludwig, the subject of this sketch, was the third child and only son by the third marriage, and was six months of age at the time of the removal of his parents to Ohio. His education was obtained at the schools of the neighborhood in which he resided, with the exception of two years' attendance at a school in Circleville, of which Dr. Brown, now president of the First National bank, was the teacher.

November 18, 1830, he was united in marriage to Evelina Morris, daughter of Henry and Charity Morris, who was born July 12, 1812. She died February 23, 1848. Seven sons and one daughter were born to them, as follows: Daniel, born November 23, 1831—married Julia Steeley, and has three children; Henry O., born December 16, 1832—married Amelia Galler; Isaac, born September 21, 1834, is unmarried; George, born January 14, 1836, married Eliza Young, and has two children; John, born December 17, 1837—died April 7, 1848, from the result of an accident; Mary Elizabeth, born April 28, 1839—married John P. Steeley, and has seven children; David S., born June 16, 1842—married Rosalie H., daughter of Isaac E. Dreisbach, December 26, 1872—they have three children; Jacob, jr., born January 27, 1848—died July 10, of the same year.

Mr. Ludwig has resided in the house which he now occupies ever since it was built, in 1809—a period of seventy years. He enjoys a hale and hearty old age, and possesses the respect and esteem of all who know him.

WILLIAM MARTIN.

The subject of this sketch was born in Cumberland county, Pennsylvania, May 6, 1800. When quite small, his parents emigrated to Ohio and settled near Hillsborough. Before many years elapsed, his father died, and before he was twelve years of age came the added misfortune of his mother's death. He was thus thrown upon his own resources at a very early period of his life, with a mind uninformed, and with his own way to work out a living in a new country. Perhaps this fact sharpened his mental capacity and taught him early to depend on his own efforts more than would have otherwise been the case, making him an exceptionally successful business man in after life.

Soon after becoming twenty-one years of age he invested his savings in a trading venture to New Orleans by means of a flat-boat, which, at that early date, was the only manner of carrying the produce of the new country to a market. His venture proved successful, and he went forward in business from this small beginning until, in a few years, while still a young man, he took a leading place among the great produce dealers and pork packers of Ohio. He made Circleville his headquarters, and was an extensive shipper of pork and grain to New Orleans and the South. He was well and favorably known on every steamboat and at every business point on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, between Portsmouth and New Orleans.

About 1830 he formed a partnership with Samuel Rogers in the dry goods, grocery, and produce business at Circleville, with whom he was connected until 1846. In 1845 they engaged in the commission business in New Orleans, and at the end of that year Mr. Rogers retired from the business. Mr. Martin then associated with himself Dr. Stockwell, formerly of Lafayette, Indiana, and continued the commission business at New Orleans, Cincinnati, and New York. In 1850 he removed to Decatur, Illinois, where he died in April, 1879, aged nearly seventy-nine years.

He was married, about 1825, to Miss Comfort Hopkins, of Pickaway county, from whom he derived some property, which assisted him in his early business enterprises. They had six or seven children, nearly all of whom died in infancy.

Mr. Martin was a shrewd, careful, methodical business man, and was very successful in his business ventures. Besides this, he found time to store his mind with history, poetry, science, and politics. He was well informed on the current events of the day, and had a vigorous mind, and a memory that retained what he read, so that he was able to converse intelligently upon any subject. His convictions were strong, and he had a reason ready for the faith that was in him. He was always ready to aid and assist the needy and unfortunate, and especially so when he saw a person making energetic efforts to help himself. He has assisted many poor and deserving men to obtain a start in business life, sometimes losing money in the effort to advance the interests of others; but though this frequently happened, he did not lose faith in mankind, and ever stood ready to assist, with his means, a worthy man.

Mr. Martin was of a class that is rapidly becoming extinct. He was truly an "old fashioned gentleman," and was the personification of politeness. He retained the old-time ideas of business integrity and honesty, which are now-a-days too frequently laid aside in the haste men make in the effort to become rich. His obligations were always promptly paid, and his creditors satisfied in full of all their demands. It would be well if the lessons taught by the lives of such men in everyday life were more fully heeded and patterned after by the men of the present day.

JOHN GROCE.

John Groce was born in Frederick county, Maryland, and emigrated, when a young man, to the west, settling in Jefferson, of this county, before Circleville was laid out or was known as a town. In the year 1811, he returned to his native county, and on April 25, was united in marriage to Miss Elizabeth Jacobs, of Louden county, Virginia, and immediately thereafter again came west with his wife, and settled in Circleville, where he lived until his death.

There were born to them seven children, as follows: Charles (who died in his twenty-second year), Lydia, Bentley, Caroline (who died in infancy), John, Mahlon (who died at the age of twenty-two years), and Elizabeth Ann.

His wife died August 8, 1824, leaving him with a family of young children to care for. In 1827 he married Mrs. Margaret Wolfley. He died March 18, 1834, in his fifty-fifth year.

John, the third son, and subject of this sketch, was born January 18, 1818, at Circleville, this county. At the time of his father's death he was in his seventeenth year. Thus left dependent upon his own resources, it became necessary for him to do for himself. He sought, as council, his father's most intimate friend, the late Matthew McCrea, and the advice was given as follows:

"John, go to a trade. It will learn you habits of industry, and if you don't want to follow it when you become a man, you need not."

Taking this sound advice, he immediately went to learn the saddling business with the late John A. Wolfley, commencing the same year, in April. He continued at his trade, as apprentice and journeyman, until the spring of 1839, when, on the thirteenth day of June, he commenced the business for himself, at Kingston, Ross county, Ohio, on a capital of eighty-five dollars. The same year, December 19th, he was united in marriage to Miss Elizabeth Ellen Graham, who was born September 25, 1820. There have been born to them five children: infant daughter, born March 31, 1841; Mary Elizabeth, born July 26, 1842; Ellen Gillett, April 24, 1845; Jennie, September 27, 1847; Charles Erastus, born July 26, 1851.

Mary Elizabeth married Bennett Foresman, October 20, 1864. They have had two children: John Philip, born October 3, 1866, and William Bennett, born August 3, 1873. Ellen Gillett married Frank M. Shulse, October 22, 1868. They have two children: Charles Groce, born July 22, 1869, and Emanuel Edgar, January 13, 1879. Jennie married Lemuel Boggs, October 20, 1870. They have two children: Nellie Groce, born January 12, 1872, and Margaret Cook, April 5, 1876.

Mr. Groce continued in his business at Kingston for nine years, meeting with fair success. But having become strongly impressed with the idea that he could do better at other business, and feeling that Kingston was not the place to make the venture, he, with his little family, moved to Circleville, in August, 1848, immediately going into the grain and pork business in connection with the late R. D. Atwater. In July, 1852, he also took an interest with Mr. Atwater in the dry goods business. In the fall of that year he went to Milton, Indiana, to pack pork, while Mr. Atwater attended to the business in Circleville, the interests at both points being the same.

Mr. Atwater dying in December, of the same year, and the business proving largely losing, it left him without capital. But being energetic and hopeful, with nothing to lose and all to gain, he proposed to Mr. Atwater's executor to take the stock of goods on five years' time, which was readily assented to, and taking Mr. Jacob Helman, also without capital, as a partner, went vigorously to work to retrieve losses.

In the fall and winter of 1853–54 he again went into the pork trade alone, and, profiting by his past experience, he was fortunate in the venture, so that he was enabled to protect his dry goods notes as they matured from year to year. He continued in the dry goods and pork business until the year 1860, when he exchanged his dry goods to the late E. B. Olds for a block of buildings, and has since carried on the pork trade with great success. November 12, 1872, he associated with himself his only son, Charles E., and the firm has since been known as John Groce & Son. One who has been his companion from boyhood, and is well qualified to judge of his many virtues and sterling qualities, says of him:

"Mr. Groce is eminently a self-made man. Left at an early age without the example and counsel of a father, and possessed of but an ordinary common-school education, he started out in the battle of life. But whilst he lacked these advantages, which are generally so necessary to success, he did possess qualities of mind which were gradually developed and made the groundwork of a successful business life, and that was a determination to study out and become master of any business he might undertake to prosecute. That has been fully demonstrated in the almost national reputation he has attained for his manner of curing meats, and particularly hams. Mr. Groce is a man of very positive convictions, and when once an opinion is formed, it is held with firmness, and yet not without being willing always to give a reason for his opinion. He has always been identified with every public enterprise, and has contributed as much as any citizen to build up our city, as his large and well-appointed pork house and fine residence demonstrate. He took an active part in securing subscriptions for the purchase of the grounds of our beautiful Forest cemetery, and has been one of its directors from the beginning until the present time. He was a member of the national convention that nominated R. B. Hayes for president of the United States, and is now chairman of the Republican central committee of this county."

CAPTAIN JOHN H. GROCE

was one of the worthiest of the many young men of Pickaway county, who gave their lives for their country, and a man whom, had he lived to mature years, would doubtless have won, through his superior talents, high distinction. He was the son of Bently and Matilda Y. Groce, and was born in Circleville, April 13, 1840. His education was partially obtained under the teaching of Hon. James A. Garfield, and was very thorough and complete. He was a young man of intellectual tastes, a successful teacher, and intended to practice the profession of law.

He had intense patriotism, and so it came about that when the war of the Rebellion began, he was one of the very first to answer the call for volunteers. He went out as a member of company G, Second regiment, Ohio volunteer infantry, for three months, and was appointed orderly sergeant. After the elapse of a short time, he, in connection with Jacob W. Taylor, enlisted a company of men to serve three years, or during the war. Their company was assigned to the Thirtieth regiment, and Mr. Groce was elected its first lieutenant, his commission bearing date of August 22, 1861. Immediately after being mustered into service, the regiment was ordered into West Virginia. Lieutenant Groce did not go, however, but returned home upon a furlough, with orders to recruit for the service. He joined the force in a few days after, and soon received the appointment of adjutant of the regiment. On the nineteenth of November, 1861, he was promoted to the captaincy of the company he had enlisted. He served in that capacity until June, 1864, when he was appointed assistant inspector-general of the Second brigade and Second division, under General Lightburn, in which position he remained up to the time of his death. He was engaged in numerous skirmishes, in the early part of the war, and at Vicksburg commanded a fleet of boats, under the eye of General Sherman, and was eminently useful in protecting the crews compelled to run the gauntlet of the rebel shore batteries. In this capacity he first attracted the attention of General Sherman, whose confidence he ever after held. After taking an active part in various expeditions, he was selected, in 1863, to lead the "forlorn hope," on the second of May, in the storming of one of the rebel forts of Vicksburg. He commanded one hundred and fifty men, whose duty it was to make the assault and lay a bridge over a ravine in the interior of the works. His command was assailed with a terrible fire, but neither he nor his followers quailed in the performance of their stern task. All of his men were killed, except twenty-three, and he himself was painfully and dangerously wounded. He lay in the trenches until night, when, faint from the loss of blood, he made his escape to the Union lines, amid a perfect shower of bullets. He was generously complimented for his bravery by General Blair and other officers. Being unfitted for duty, he came home on a furlough, where he remained until his wound was partially healed. It was during that furlough that he was presented with a sword, in token of his friends' appreciation of his gallantry in the memorable siege of Vicksburg. He returned to the army the following winter, joining the force at Larkinsville, Alabama. His active spirit led him into numerous encounters with the enemy, in one of which he severely injured his wounded arm. With his regiment he returned home on a furlough, but went back to the south, just after the battle of Resaca. From this time he was attached to McPherson's corps, and participated in all of the principal battles up to the fall of Atlanta and the battle of Jonesboro. He participated in Sherman's march to the sea, and was, with others, especially detailed to storm Fort McAllister. Whenever there was a deed to be done which required especial courage and daring, he was certain to be employed. It was at the storming of Fort McAllister that he lost his life. He fell by the shot of a sharpshooter, while in advance of his division, reconnoitring the enemy's works, December 13, 1864. He was buried near the spot where he was shot down, and after the army obtained possession of Savannah, his remains were sent to his home and friends by his friend, Captain Earnest.

Captain Groce was emphatically a military man, and well deserved the name, "bravest of the brave." He went to the front fearlessly, though with premonition of death, and no persuasion of friends could deter him from remaining in the service as long as there was need for men to bear arms in their country's defence.

He was popular among the people of Circleville, and the same qualities that made him generally liked and respected by them, caused him to obtain and hold the love of his men in the army. His death was a severe blow to his parents, whose solace he was, and was deeply deplored by the whole people of the town which had been his home. He died in his twenty-fourth year.

T. C. SMITH.

Talmer Cone Smith was born in Whitestown, Oneida county, New York, July 31, 1823. His parents, Joseph Otis Smith and Harriet, nee Cone, Smith, were descended from the best New England stock—his father being named for his grandfather, Joseph Otis, who was a brother of the celebrated James Otis, of Boston. Joseph Otis was descended from John Otis, who, with his family, came from Hingham, in Norfolk, England, in June, 1635, and Edward Doten, who came over in the Mayflower. His great-grandfather, Ignatius Smith, emigrated from Wales to Massachusetts early in the eighteenth century. His mother's family was of English descent, leaving England and settling in Connecticut, in the latter part of the seventeenth century.

The subject of this sketch received a good academic education, working on the farm during the summer, where his father was born, and on which his brother, Mark H. Smith, now lives and owns, until he arrived at majority, when he emigrated to Ohio.

He studied law with the Hon. Henry W. Smith, of London; was admitted to the bar in December, 1846, by the old supreme court of Ohio. He opened a law office in Circleville, Ohio, in April, 1847, where he has practiced ever since. From 1849 to 1856 he was in partnership with Judge Thomas C. Jones, now of Delaware, Ohio.

He was elected city solicitor in the spring of 1855, and re-elected in the spring of 1857, holding the office four years. He was elected prosecuting attorney in the fall of 1855, and held the office one term. He never sought for office, but his great desire and aim was to wholly devote his time and energy to the labors of his profession. He practiced in all the courts of Ohio and in the circuit and supreme court of the United States, meeting successfully the best lawyers in the State. He has one of the largest and best-selected law libraries in Ohio.

In December, 1858, he married Miss Sarah Osborn, a daughter of Ralph Osborn, who was auditor of State from 1815 to 1823, and of Jeannett, the eldest daughter of General James Denny, a gallant officer of the war of 1812. Miss Denny's first husband was Dr. Daniel Turney. The fruits of this union are three daughters—Jeannett S., Mary O., and Harriet O.

During the war of the Rebellion T. C. Smith was a member of the military committee of Pickaway county, giving freely of his time and money to sustain the government in its time of need.

EDWARD SMITH.

The beneficent tendency of our free American institutions finds no more striking exemplification than in the successful career of Mr. Edward Smith and his younger brother, Joseph P., with whom he has been in partnership almost ever since he attained his majority.

He was born in county Down, Ireland, September, 1826; his parents, Patrick and Rose Anna (Quinn) Smith, belonging to the honest and hardy yeomanry of that prolific isle. While he was yet in infancy, his father emigrated with his family to Toronto, Canada, where the father died in the latter part of 1832. For six years the heroic mother supported the family by her own exertions, thus, by her example, as well as by her careful training, cherishing in her boys those habits of industry and self-reliance which became the basis of their good fortune in after life. In 1836 she married Bernard Riley, who was also from Ireland. He seems not only to have been a good husband to her but also a true father to his step-sons, since they remained with him until his death, which occurred in 1850—nearly three years after Edward became of age.

In 1837, about a year after the mother's second marriage, they removed to Lockport, New York, where they remained a little over two years; and from that place, in June, 1840, they came to Circleville, which was to be the scene of their future labors and successes.

Mr. Riley was a farmer, and accumulated considerable personal property by laboring for others, renting land or working it on shares, but never purchasing. Previous to his death the two Smiths—Edward and Joseph—had become familiar with the broom-corn business (in which they have since acquired both wealth and fame) by working for the Eaton brothers, the pioneers in this branch of businesss in Pickaway county. [For the details of this business the reader is referred to what is said of it under the head of "Manufacturing Interests," in another place.]

Immediately after their step-father's death, the two brothers purchased all his personal property at public sale, on a credit of nine months, John Boyer being the administrator. They then rented land of Thomas Huston, which they cultivated one season on shares. In November, of the same year (1850), Edward went with the Eaton brothers—who had left the broom-corn business and gone into iron mining in northern Michigan—to assist them in their operations, taking with him four horses and harness. There he stayed till February 1, 1851, when, having become satisfied that mining was not his "best hold," he sold out his horses and harness to the Eatons, and took their note in payment. Then he and two other young men started, on snow-shoes, for the lower part of Green bay, over eighty miles, camping out every night for a week, the snow being some five feet deep on an average. From there he walked on the ice to Green Bay city, which occupied another week; thence by coach to Milwaukee, where he stayed over night, and the next morning started on foot for Chicago, where he arrived in about three days. There he stayed over night, and then took stage to Michigan City, which, at that time, was the farthest point west reached by rail. There he took the cars to Columbus, and thence to Circleville by coach, arriving the latter part of February, having been three weeks making the trip.

He immediately made arrangements to go to farming with his brother, working land one season for Mr. Huston—partly on shares, and partly by the acre for three dollars per acre. In the fall of that year (1851) Mr. George Chrysler, of Lockport, New York, came west to engage parties, well acquainted with the business, to raise broom-corn for him. He was referred to the Smith brothers, who entered into a contract to supply him with the corn from two hundred acres of ground. In the following spring they rented this amount of land of Mr. Huston, which they cultivated in broom-corn that season, according to their contract. The crop amounted to over seventy tons, which they baled and shipped to Mr. Chrysler, at Lockport, New York.

This may be considered as the beginning of their remarkable career in the broom business, which has not only swept wealth into their own coffers, but has also swept want from the door of many poor and industrious families.

An enumeration of the parcels of ground purchased by Mr. Smith at different times, and constituting his present landed estate, will not be uninteresting: the nine acres, in the center of which stands his fine suburban villa, was purchased of John Cradlebaugh, March 17, 1860, for one thousand six hundred dollars; December 9, 1859, he bought of Governor Morgan, of New York, one hundred and ninety-seven acres, for thirteen thousand dollars; five acres, lying contiguous, in the corporation of Circleville, being added in 1862—bought of John Fleming, for five hundred and fifty dollars; June 2, 1862, he purchrsed of William Hughes thirty-eight acres, for two thousand five hundred and nineteen dollars; May 24, 1867, of the C. & M. V. R. R., eleven acres, for nine hundred and fifteen dollars and sixty cents; November 14, 1867, of Dr. A. W. Thompson, fifty-six acres, for seven thousand eight hundred and forty dollars. The land owned by the two brothers, in partnership, consists of one farm of five hundred and twenty acres, lying in Jackson and Wayne townships; the other, of three hundred and thirty-three and one-half acres, known as "the Robert Foresman farm," bought October 9, 1869, belongs to E. Smith.

Mr. Smith received his education in private schools in Canada and New York; also, for two winters, in the old public school of Circleville, and finished with one month's tuition under old Mr. Brittan, who, in 1847, had a private school over Samuel Rogers' store.

He has never had any political aspirations, but he has been, for many years, a member of the Circleville city council, and is now, for the second term, president of the corporation.

He was married in February, 1855, to Sarah A. Lynch, daughter of Andrew and Elizabeth (Sharkey) Lynch, who came to this part of Ohio about the year 1841. Her father was a native of Ireland, and her mother of Pennsylvania. Mr. and Mrs. Smith have had seven children, named) in the order of their birth) as follows: Elizabeth and Rosa (twins), Mary, Joseph S., Anna, Edward E., and James I. Of these, Rosa, Mary and Anna died in infancy. The rest are still living.

Mr. Smith is an active member and a most liberal supporter of the Roman Catholic church, as may be seen in the history of St. Joseph's church, Circleville, related on another page of this volume.

JOSEPH P. SMITH.

The reflections made in regard to the business character and career of Edward Smith, apply with equal force to his younger brother and partner, named above. Though quite unlike, personally (Joseph having considerable the advantage of his brother in physical proportions), the brothers, nevertheless, strongly resemble each other in their sterling qualities of mind and heart.

J. P. Smith was born in Toronto, Canada, in the month of March, 1831. He followed the fortunes of his family, which have been briefly related in the biography of his brother Edward; and, at the age of nine years, found himself in Circleville, which was to be his home for nearly the whole of his subsequent life. There he lived and labored with his step-father (attending school part of the time, during the winters) till the latter died, in 1850, and afterwards in partnership with his brother, till the early part of 1856—when he removed to Berne township, Fairfield county, where he had rented "the old Thomas Ewing farm" for three years. Here he devoted himself mainly to the raising of broom-corn, to which business it would almost seem he was predestinated by a sort of fatality which he could not escape. But his devotion to his business, assiduous as it was, did not prevent him from giving due attention to another still more important—the one, in fact, to which every business avocation in life should be held as merely subsidiary—viz.: the formation of a home and the support of a wife and children.

It was during these three memorable years on "the old Ewing place," that is to say, in the month of November, 1856, that he was married to Miss Susan P. Bish, in Lancaster, her native town. Her parents, Martin and Magdelene Bish, were of the good old Teutonic stock, having emigrated from Germany and settled in this part of Ohio, at an early day.

The results of this marriage are shown by the following goodly list of children: 1, Edward S., born August 31, 1857; 2, Mary M., born August 16, 1859—died September 24, 1860; 3, Francis C., born January 27, 1862; 4, Cecelia C., born February 13, 1864; 5, Charles, born March 14, 1866; 6, William, born March 27, 1868; 7, Susan, born August 17, 1870; 8, Anna E., born November 11, 1872; 9, Joseph, born March 2, 1875; 10, Rose, born July 3, 1877.

After his three years on "the Ewing farm," Mr. Smith came back to Pickaway county and carried on the same business, by himself, for one year, in Harrison township; after which, in 1860, he returned to Circleville and renewed, with his brother, the partnership which has continued ever since.

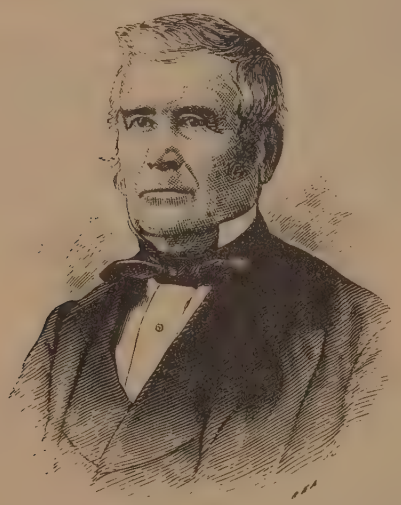
It was in the spring of this year [1860] that he met with an exciting and tragic adventure, which is well worthy of being put on record, and which shows that the ordinarily uneventful life of a farmer may sometimes become as perilous as that of those "who go down to the sea in ships, and occupy their business in great waters."

Those who have seen the Scioto only in its placid moods, can have but a faint conception of what it is capable of becoming when swollen with rage by the torrents of rain which sometimes deluge the whole length and breadth of its fertile valley. The freshet of April, 1860, will long be remembered by many of our readers who lost valuable property, or still more valuable friends, in its angry flood. The land owned or cultivated by the Smiths, west of the river, was nearly all inundated, and the whole country around had the appearance of a vast lake. At a distance from the river the water had surrounded some barns and other out-buildings where was stored a large quantity of farm implements and property of various kinds. Mr. Smith and three other men—Joseph Levering, Wm. Monahan, and Daniel Carrol—set out to see what they could do to prevent this property from being carried away. They started from the aqueduct in a skiff. Near this point the river had broken through the levee built along its western side to protect the low lands from inundation, but affording no protection against a flood like this, and the water, rushing through the crevasse made a stiff current away from the river for a long distance. The boat, in getting out of the river into the lake beyond, fell into this rushing current, struck against the bank, was swamped, filled with water, and sunk. Mr. Smith, who, one might think, would have, like Falstaff, "a sort of alacrity in sinking," struck out boldly for a box-elder tree which stood some distance off, reached it, clambered up into it, and was saved. Levering, trying to follow him, was swept away by the current and drowned. Monahan first tried to save himself by climbing upon the levee, but the water washed him off and carried him past the tree in which Mr. Smith had saved himself, to the neighborhood of one a little farther down. This he made a desperate effort to reach, but failed, and he, too, was drowned. Carrol managed to cling to the boat, which had not sunk beyond his depth, and there maintained himself till help arrived and rescued both the survivors from their perilous situation.

The estimation in which Mr. Smith is held by his fellow-citizens is seen in the fact that he has been elected several terms member of the city council. He has also been township trustee, and is at present a member of the board of trustees of the State asylum for the insane at Columbus. Like his brother, he is a devoted and liberal member of the Roman Catholic church; is president of the St. Joseph's total abstinence society, and also of St. Joseph's benevolent society, in said church.

Besides the property held in partnership with his brother, Mr. Smith owns the beautiful private residence in Circleville, of which a fine lithographic view is given on another page of this volume.

We should consider this family history incomplete if we neglected to state, in conclusion, that the excellent mother of these two remarkable men survived to a good old age to witness and enjoy their prosperity, being tenderly cherished in her declining years by her two grateful sons, who inherited largely from her those rare endowments which have made them not only successful business men, but also honored and useful citizens. She died October 13, 1877, aged about seventy-five years. Her loss was not only deeply lamented by her sons, but by a large circle of friends.



DR. KINGSLEY RAY.

The subject of this sketch was born in Munroe county, New York, October 20, 1797. He was the first of the children of Dr. John Ray, who settled in western New York about the year 1795, having emigrated from Massachusetts, when the country was an almost unbroken wilderness from Albany to Buffalo. The first wife of Dr. John Ray was Betsey Kingsley. In Ontario county he acquired a very good reputation as a physician, and died at Pittsford, New York, at the age of forty-seven years.

Kingsley Ray received his medical education at Dartmouth college, New Hampshire. He was a pupil of Prof. R. D. Mussey, and graduated in August, 1821. After spending two years in his native county, in the practice of his profession, he removed to Franklin county, Ohio, where he had a very successful practice for fifteen years. From this county he went to Delaware, in the same State, remaining eight years, and thence, in the year 1845, to Circleville, where he now resides.

For several years after he came to Ohio, there was not a bridge across a stream in Delaware and Franklin counties. The roads were in such a condition as to make it necessary to travel on horseback eight months in the year. The month of September was known as the "sickly month." The summer of 1823 was attended with an unusual amount of sickness throughout the state. Violent remittent and intermittent fevers prevailed. On the first day of September, 1823, which was one of the hottest of the season, he got on and off his horse twenty-three times—several of his patients living miles apart. But though the fevers, during that year were prevalent and so severe, yet the proportion of fatal cases was, by no means, as great as in the following year.

In the early part of the doctor's practice, intermittent fevers were treated with various remedies, the crude Peruvian bark, which had then long been in use, being one of them. But in April, 1824, there was brought to Columbus an ounce of quinine, of which Dr. Ray was so fortunate as to procure one-eighth part, for trial. The introduction of this alkaloid, which contains, in its most condensed form, the medicinal principle of Peruvian bark, soon revolutionized the practice, not only of Dr. Ray, but of the entire medical fraternity.

In the spring of 1826, having become thoroughly established in his professional practice at Worthington, Franklin county, our young practitioner returned to western New York, for the sake of bringing back a bride to his home in the then "far west." This "chosen one" was Miss Mary Mason Lathrop, to whom he was married on the twelfth of March, at Lima, in Livingston county. An account of the ancestry of this beautiful and accomplished woman may be found in her biography, recorded in another place. At present we must confine ourselves to a history of the Ray family.

The married life of Dr. and Mrs. Ray has been identified with the State of Ohio (that part of it which constitutes the Scioto valley) for more than fifty years; twelve years having been spent at Worthington, Franklin county; eight years at Delaware, and thirty-three years at Circleville. While they have had their part in the hardships and discomforts incident to a professional life in a half-settled country, they have both seen, and participated in, the development and steady growth of the State, in the building up of churches, schools, libraries, and whatever else tends to the promotion and diffusion of truth.

They have had eight children, only three of whom survive. We give a necessarily brief notice of each:

1, Elizabeth L., born in April, 1828. She was a young lady of unusual talent, especially in music. She married Mr. Handy; died July 20, 1861, at Oshkosh, Wisconsin. 2, Frances Jane, born in June, 1830—died in early childhood. 3, Janette Miller, born in March, 1832; married Mr. Long in 1852. She was of a sweet, domestic, christian character. She died in New York city, February 1, 1854. 4, John Eleazer, born February 16, 1834. He was possessed of fine qualities of mind and heart. Having a natural aptitude for finance, he was placed, at sixteen years of age, with General Hoel Lawrence to learn the business of banking. But, on the breaking out of the rebellion, he could not remain deaf to the call of his country, and entered the army in 1861. He was made captain in the Thirteenth Ohio infantry; was wounded and taken prisoner at Stone River; fought through those terrible days at Chickamauga. After the battle of Chickamauga, he resigned his commission as captain in the Thirteenth Ohio volunteer infantry at Jonesboro, Georgia, and returned to his chosen profession, in which he had no superior. He had a finely cultivated mind, and a kind and sympathetic heart. He was a churchman from principle, and at Winona, Minnesota, where he last lived, he contributed much, both in time and money, toward the completion of the beautiful Episcopal church in that city, of which he was elected junior warden. He died in New York city, March 8, 1876. 5, David Brainard, born March 25, 1836. He was graduated with fair scholarship from Kenyon college, when nineteen years old. Then, with boyish enthusiasm he went west, where he had a rather trying experience in locating land as a "squatter." Concluding that that was not his fort, he taught for a while at Galena, Illinois, doing church work with and for Dr. Benedict, rector of the Episcopal church in that city. Then he accepted a professorship in the military institute at Frankfort, Kentucky, but resigned on account of the civil troubles in 1861. He then settled down to the study of divinity in the "Divinity School" at Phiadelphia, and for ten years has been the devoted and successful rector of Grace (Episcopal) church, at Harlem, New York city. 6, Leigh Richmond, born in October, 1839. He is a man of integrity and christian principle, leading an unmarked but useful life, at Zanesville, Ohio. 7, Louisa, born in January, 1842. She married the Rev. J. F. Ohl, in 1862, who is now rector of the Episcopal church, in Zanesville. 8, Edward Mason, the youngest, born in January, 1846; a lovely child who died at the age of seven years.

Mr. and Mrs. Ohl have five children, named, in the order of their birth, as follows: Josiah K., Frank McK., Louisa R., Frederick Robertson, and an infant, to be named Mary, after her maternal grandmother. At the late commencement at Gambier his alma mater conferred upon Mr. Ohl the honorary degree of doctor in divinity. Mrs. Ohl is an energetic woman and a good and prudent mother. Possessing, as she does, large executive ability, there will be no lack, in her life-work, of a comprehensive activity. She will be known most in the rearing of a christian family, in planning for the relief of the poor, and in the various benevolent works of the present day.

Dr. Ray, the patriarch of the goodly family so hastily sketched above, is still, though in the eighty-second year of his age, in good health, and in the full possession of all his mental and physical faculties. Since the close of the war he has not practiced in his profession; but the pleasant competence by which his old age is surrounded, and the grateful affection with which his many patients continue to speak of him (some of them alive to-day, humanly speaking, through the exercise of his care and skill), bear ample testimony to the success of his professional career. In his deportment toward his patients he was attentive and sympathetic. From principle he always responded to the calls of all classes alike, and he was never known to oppress those who were in straitened circumstances. The money on his uncollected bills would have made him a richer man in this world, but he is quite content that it should be added to the treasures laid up for him in the world to come.

During the last thirty years he has been a member (active, consistent, and liberal) of the Episcopal church, and he is looking forward, with the calm assurance of a christian hope, to the time, now in the course of nature not far distant, when he and the loved companion of his youth shall rejoin their children and their pious ancestors and friends, who have preceeded them to the blissful repose of paradise.

MRS. MARY M. RAY.

Mrs. Mary Mason (Lathrop) Ray is descended from a long line of Puritanic ancestry, reaching back seven generations, on the maternal side, to Major John Mason (1630) who, besides holding many public offices of trust, successfully subdued the Pequot Indians, and secured peace to the colony of Connecticut. Succeeding generations of the Mason family have furnished honorable names to New England history—such as the late Hon. Jeremiah Mason, of Boston; the late Hon. Theodore Sedgwick, also of Massachusetts; the late Mrs. Elijah Boardman, of Milford, Connecticut; the Hon. George P. Marsh, of Vermont, author, and resident minister to Florence, besides many others.

On the paternal side, the first ancestor known was (five generations back) named Hopestill Lathrop (or Lothrop), who, with his wife, Elizabeth, lived in Tolland, Connecticut, during the first years of the last century. Their son Melatiah, and his wife, Mary Hatch, with a family numbering nine sons and seven daughters, moved to Duchess county, New York. The unique, and almost ludicrous adherence of those old Puritans, with large families, to the practice of giving Scripture names to their children, is seen in this family—the nine sons alluded to being named as follows: Simon, Walter, Meletiah, Ezra, Ichahod, Josiah, Ebenezer, John and Eleazer. Of these, Simon was the grandfather of the subject of this sketch. They all, as well as their seven sisters, lived to old age, and of their posterity it may truly be said, "their name is legion." Successful men, as tillers of the soil, this hardy brotherhood has left a rich legacy to the succeeding generations now spread over all the land. Strong christian principle, intellectual strength, patriotism, temperance, and more than ordinary domestic virtues are the distinguishing characteristics of this race. Among them have been many scholars, and literary men, college professors, etc., for whose names, even, we can not find space.

Philander Lathrop, one of the fourth generation from Hopestill Lathrop, and father of "our heroine," was born in New Canaan; State of New York, in 1776. He emigrated, when a youth, to Hartford, Washington county, where he was employed as merchant's clerk by his brother-in-law, Daniel Mason, esq., and afterward became a partner with him in business. In 1798 he married Elizabeth Mason, of Franklin, Connecticut, the venerable Samuel Nott, D.D., officiating. They had four children, of whom only the youngest, now Mrs. Dr. Ray, survives. We have room for no more than a very brief sketch of this family, as follows:

1, Horace, born in January, 1800; he is well remembered in Columbus, the scene of his busines life, as Dr. Horace Lathrop, a man learned in his profession, endowed with rare mental gifts, especially with that of an engaging and graceful conversation. He died of cholera in 1849, leaving a daughter, Mrs. J. D. Osborn, of Columbus, and a son, Martin D. Lathrop, of Chicago. 2, Eliza Maria, born April 16, 1801. In early womanhood she married the Rev. Eleazer Lathrop, a distant cousin, of the same original stock. She was a woman of rich endowments of mind, and the associations of her married life were favorable to a large christian development. She and her husband both died in 1834, leaving an only son, Henry D., five years of age, who (being a natural scholar), by dint of hard labor, in teaching others, and hard study in teaching himself, secured his baccalaureate degree at Gambier, about the year 1848. Some years later he studied theology in that same well-known "school of the prophets," which also, subsequently made him a doctor of divinity. After filling various important and useful situations (for the enumeration of which we have neither time nor space) he accepted a call to the rectorship of the Church of the Advent, San Francisco, where he spent eleven successful years as a faithful laborer in the sacred ministry. Now, his fifty-first year finds him at the head of a flourishing school for girls at Eureka, Humboldt county, California, where he is also rector of the parish. 3, John Mason, born in September, 1804, a promising youth, who died at the age of twenty-one years, leaving no other record than that of an amiable and good life. 4, Mary Mason (now Mrs. Ray), born in Hartford, Washington county, New York, in 1806. In 1815, her father moved to Lima, Livingston county, where they continued to live until she married Dr. Kingsley Ray, in 1826, and emigrated to Ohio.

The early years of Mrs. Ray were spent in a country home, where her time was divided between attendance at the common district school, and the duties of home-life on a farm. This part of her history serves to show that the intellectual and social graces flourish as well when grafted upon the native stock of a country training, as when reared exclusively in a city atmosphere, which has been thought to be best adapted, if not, indeed, absolutely essential to their germination and growth. At the age of fourteen she was sent to a select school in the town of Lima, where the advantages previously enjoyed were enlarged by the addition of history, rhetoric, chemistry, etc. At seventeen she went to Geneva, New York, to attend a classical school (which has since grown into Hobart college), under the very able management of the Rev. Dr. McDonald, the Rev. John Alonzo Clark (author of "Walks about Zion"), and others." Being always inclined both to study and observe, these opportunities were not misimproved—one and a half years closing the period of her school life.

At the age of fifteen Mrs. Ray connected herself with the Presbyterian church; but, in later life, she found, along with her husband, what has proved to them a more congenial home, in the church known as Protestant Episcopal.

In May, 1872, she visisted Washington city, Baltimore, and various localities in Virginia; and in December, of the same year, she left the Altlantic seaboard for a trip across the continent, and a visit to San Francisco, in company with her nephew, the Rev. Dr. H. D. Lathrop. The novel scenes, incidents, and experiences of that trip, and of her seven months' residence on the Pacific slope, were to her a source of almost youthful enjoyment, and added largely to the intellectual treasures which render her conversation so charming and instructive. For, like her gifted brother, the late Dr. Horace Lathrop, she excels in that enviable talent, which makes her society a source of perennial delight to her friends. During her residence in California she became deeply interested in the "Chinese problem," taking active part in a mission Sunday-school, organized for the benefit of young Chinamen. She takes a more hopeful view of their future in this country, than is usually entertained.

Mrs. Ray devotes herself, with active zeal, to every benevolent enterprise which commends itself to her judgment and conscience; and even those who disagree with her as to questions of policy, cannot but express their admiration for the heroic courage which often characterizes her zeal.

We close this imperfect sketch with the following tribute to Mrs. Ray, by one of her devoted friends:

"A good and useful woman, with most remarkable endowments of mind and character, improved by high christian culture, producing those graces that adorn society, the church, and the world—such is our friend to those who know her well. We who thus know her feel the power of her single, earnest faith—the calm might which it inspires—the beauty and reward of a life 'hid with Christ in God.'

"She is a tower of strength to the friendless and sorrowing; wise and prudent in counsel, ready for every good word and work. We might speak of her noble ancestry—their noble deeds—the chivalry and valor of the men nurtured by mothers fit to inspire sons with the spirit of a noble life—a life that makes 'the actions of the just smell sweet and blossom in the dust.'

"We might tell how, at life's sunset, in the shadow of the day's decline, she stands looking back at the graves of her household, where the little children were put away tenderly, with white hands folded—how the older ones followed, the friends we best loved, cut down in the prime of life, while standing on the brow of the hill, with bright eyes looking to a happy future. But for all this, silence is the most expressive language.

"We feel more than the words can express, while drawing this brief sketch of one who has made us welcome at her ingleside, and infused into her hospitality so much sweetness and christian courtesy.

"May she live long to bless her husband, children and friends. And when the last Saturday night comes, that brings her in from life's week of toil and care, may it usher in for her the eternal Sabbath of rest, in those celestial gardens where angels walk and seraphs are the wardens."

was born July 5, 1797, at Colebrook, Litchfield county, Connecticut. His parents were Frederick and Catharine (Case) Brown, both of English extraction. His father was of the fifth generation in descent from Peter Brown, one of the Pilgrim Fathers who, on the twenty-first of December, 1620, landed on the "stern and rock-bound coast" of New England. His grandfather, John Brown, was a captain in the revolutionary war, and died of camp fever in hospital, in New York city, a little before its evacuation by the patriot forces, in 1776. His ancestors, like most of the good old New England stock, were tillers of the soil.

Dr. Brown came west with his father in 1816, settling in Wadsworth, Medina county, in this State; his mother having died at Colebrook in his early infancy, about the year 1801. The father purchased a farm in Wadsworth, upon which he lived some twenty-nine years, and then moved to Circleville to live with his son, where he died in 1848.

The son continued with his father at Wadsworth three years, then went to Somerset, in Perry county, where he entered upon the business of teaching, having fitted himself for this profession in the common schools of his native State. He taught but one year in Somerset; then one year in Salem, Ross county; and then one year in Bainbridge, same county, after which he established himself in Circleville, where he continued four years. He was one of the pioneer teachers of private schools in this place, and is now remembered only by a few of the oldest inhabitants, as a faithful, conscientious, and thoroughly successful teacher. He taught only the common branches, and his school averaged, in attendance, about forty pupils, during the four years of its continuance. While thus faithfully performing the duties of a teacher, he was gradually preparing himself for the medical profession, studying Latin under Joseph Olds, and pursuing his medical studies with Dr. Erastus Webb, one of the earliest, most skillful, and most successful physicians in Circleville. Having been admitted to practice, he entered upon his new profession in 1825, at Williamsport, in the western part of Pickaway county. After practicing very successfully for five years, he decided, in order to keep pace with the constant progress and improvements in medical science, to attend a course of lectures in the Ohio medical college. This lasted for about four months, when, taking a diploma from that institution, he returned to Williamsport, where he continued six years longer, with a practice and a popularity constantly increasing. His "ride," performed exclusively on horseback, extended over twelve miles. In sickly seasons he found it necessary to keep a relay of three horses, and almost always had two.

In 1836 he returned to Circleville, where he continued the practice of his profession till the fore part of the year 1850, when he retired formally, and, as he supposed, permanently, from practice. But the Asiatic cholera breaking out in July, of that year, he resumed practice, and continued during the prevalence of that disease, which was very severe, as the people of Circleville well remember. After the death of Dr. Webb, which occurred in the year 1848, he was the leading practitioner in Circleville, and his permanent retirement, in the latter part of 1850, was a source of great regret to a large circle of friends.

After retiring from the practice of medicine, Dr. Brown commenced the business of banking, in connection with what was known as the Pickaway county savings institute. He became president, and O. Ballard cashier—offices which they have respectively held in the same institution, under different names, till the present time. It is worthy of note that the present assistant cashier, William M. Drum, has been in the employ of the same institution since 1851, and the present teller, E. P. Garaghty, since 1854. Of this bank, which is now known as the First National bank of Circleville, the reader will find an account under the head of "Banks," in the history of Circleville.

About the same time that Dr. Brown went into the business of banking, he purchased a farm on the Royalton turnpike, which he carried on for five or six years. During that time, in 1851, he attended the World's fair in London, and brought back the first and the finest Norman horse ever imported to this part of Ohio. During a second trip to Europe, made in 1867, he, in company with T. C. Bigelow, purchased and imported five horses of the same stock; and the following year the same parties imported four others, all of which have much improved the breed of draught horses in this and other western States.

On his second European tour, in 1867, he was accompanied by his niece, Miss Kate Brown. They spent three weeks in Paris, during the French exposition, when the gay capital was in all its glory; visited Brussels, Cologne, Mayence, Weisbaden, and Frankfort. They spent some time in Switzerland and Italy, dropped anchor in the Golden Horn, at Constantinople, and passed up the Bosphorus to Sebastopol. Returning, they visited the principal points of interest in Asia Minor and the Holy Land. From Joppa they took steamer to Alexandria and Cairo; passed Algiers and Gibraltar, Madeira, and the Bermudas, and thence to New York, where they arrived on the ninth of November.

The doctor gave up his farm in 1854, and formed a partnership in the drug business with Mr. George H. Fickardt, which continued till 1877. This arrangement, however, was merely for the profitable investment of surplus capital, as he never gave any personal attention to the concern.

It will be seen, from this brief sketch, that uninterrupted prosperity has attended Dr. Brown's business career. But the same Providence, through whose ordering such unusual success has marked his financial history, has seen fit to order that his domestic life should be overshadowed by an equally unusual degree of adversity.

While teaching at Salem, in Ross county, he was married, November 30, 1820, to Miss Sarah Close, who was born in the same county, June 27, 1800. They had three children—two daughters and a son: The former both died in infancy; the latter, named Marcus Aurelius, was born August 13, 1824. Being a boy of unusual promise, his father destined him for the medical profession, and spared no pains or expense in his education. He was graduated, with high rank as a scholar, at the Miami university. Three years later he took his degree in medicine at the Jefferson medical college, in Philadelphia, and immediately entered upon the practice of his not only destined but chosen profession, with his father, in Circleville. But this pleasant partnership continued but a little over one year. The son was already taking high rank as a physician, and the father, with natural and justifiable pride, was enjoying, by anticipation, his long career of usefulness and distinction, when all these fond hopes were rudely shattered by the hand of death. His son died in 1848, at the early age of twenty-four years. Thus, in one year, he was made fatherless and childless. His wife dying in 1859, the desolation of his household seemed complete. But "God tempers the wind to the shorn lamb." His domestic calamities, remediless as they seemed, were not without alleviation; for over the home so sadly bereaved his favorite and accomplished niece now gracefully presides. But his friends say that it was chiefly his disappointment in the death of his son which made him weary of the practice of medicine, and led him to abandon it at the early age of fifty-three years.

Although it may unquestionably be said of Dr. Brown, as truly as of any other successful business man, that his success is due to his financial ability, yet one incident in his career will serve to show that good fortune in investment is as necessary to success as skill in management. In 1836, after eleven years' practice as a physician, finding himself with a surplus accumulation, amounting to fifteen hundred dollars in gold, he went west to invest it in real estate. He visited Chicago, then a village of less than two thousand inhabitants. Although there were some, even then, who had great hopes of the infant "queen of the lakes," yet its low, marshy and unhealthy situation was much against it, capital was still shy of it, and city lots and adjacent lands were, consequently, cheap. The doctor could have bought with his money what, before this time, might have made him a millionaire, but the prospect seemed too unpromising. He therefore went to Hennepin, in the same State, invested the whole of his fifteen hundred dollars in two town lots, kept them over twenty years, paying taxes on them every year, and finally sold them for less than five hundred dollars! This by no means impeaches his prudence and foresight, but it shows conclusively that what we call luck enters largely into what we call success.

Dr. Brown has never sought or held any political office, and says that he has always been too much occupied with what seemed to him more important business.

He is a firm believer in christianity, and has been for many years a member and an office-bearer in the Presbyterian church. Those who know him most intimately speak in the warmest terms of his benevolence and kindness of heart. Of no one was it ever more characteristic to "do good by stealth," and no one would more certainly "blush to find it fame."

CAPTAIN SAMUEL W. McCULLOCH.

One of the bravest, most gallant and promising of that great army of young men who fell in defense of their country in the war of the rebellion, was born in Circleville, Ohio, February 17, 1835. He entered the service as a private in Captain Sage's company, Forty-third regiment Ohio volunteer infantry, in October, 1861, and joined the encampment at Mount Vernon. He was subsequently transferred, and promoted to a second lieutenantcy in Company D, Thirteenth Ohio volunteer infantry and followed that gallant regiment through all of its fortunes and misfortunes, participating in the great battles of Shiloh, Stone River, Chickamauga, Mission Ridge and, under Sherman, in all the engagements up to the time of his death. While leading a charge, on the twenty-seventh day of May, 1864, Captain McCulloch was struck by a ball, which shattered both of his jaws and lodged in his right shoulder, causing his death the following day.

William J. Tenney

Captain McCulloch was regarded by his superiors in rank as an officer of great courage and skill, and the most important movements were entrusted to his execution. His courage never failed him at the critical point, and had he lived till the close of the war, would have attained high rank and distinction as a military man. He possessed great decision and energy of character; was intelligent and social, and his moral qualities were above reproach.

NELSON J. TURNEY, of Circleville, was born in Circleville, November 7, 1820. Mr. Turney is a direct lineal descendant of a French Huguenot family, who were driven from France in the latter part of the fifteenth century by papal persecution, a short time prior to the revocation of the edict of Nantes by Louis XIV. Three brothers—Daniel, Peter, and Adam Turney—leaving a considerable property behind them, fled their native country, and landed in Philadelphia in 1668. Nelson J. is a great grandson of Daniel Turney, the French refugee.

Henry Turney, son of Daniel and grandfather of Nelson, removed to Shepherdstown, Jefferson county, Virginia, where he married a lady named Endley, of German descent. The fruit of this marriage —six children— all died young, excepting Daniel, the father of Nelson, who was born at Shepherdstown, August 16, 1786. Henry removed from Shepherdstown to Chillicothe, Ohio, about the year 1800, where he followed the occupation of potter, and died in 1812.

Daniel Turney, the father of Nelson, studied medicine at Philadelphia, and graduated there, and began the practice of his profession in the village of Jefferson, Pickaway county, in 1806. Dr. Daniel Turney was married to Miss Janet Stirling Denny, a daughter of Major-General James Denny, November 5, 1816. The fruit of this marriage was four children—Henry, Nelson, Isabella, and Samuel—but two of whom, Nelson and Isabella (now Mrs. McCrea), are living.

Nelson's maternal grandfather, General Denny, was one of the most prominent of the pioneers of the northwestern territory and of Ohio, and served with distinction in the war of 1812 with Great Britain. He was of Scotch or Scotch-Irish descent, and was born in Chester county, Pennsylvania, September 11, 1767. He was married to Miss Isabella Barr, of Wheeling, Virginia, in May, 1797, and removed thence to Marietta, in a keelboat on the Ohio river, long before the era of steam navigation. Mr. Turney's mother was born at Marietta, April 11, 1798. General Denny removed to Chillicothe in 1799, and to Pickaway county in 1807. General Denny was a government surveyor and locator of government lands. He owned the Fredonia newspaper, the first paper published in Pickaway county, in 1811 and 1812, the paper being edited by a Mr. Richardson. In 1813 he was clerk of the courts in Pickaway county. He entered the United States service in the war with Great Britain as a major, and rose, by promotion, through the several grades to the rank of major-general. He was present, and was surrendered by Hull, at Detroit. He died in Philadelphia, November 23, 1815. Few men of his time filled a larger or more honorable position in the history of the new State than did General Denny.

The Huguenot emigrants to America contributed as much, if not more, in proportion to their number, to the culture and prosperity of their adopted country, as any other nationality. They gave an impetus to the cause of independence during the long struggle of the infant colonies, and no less than three of the seven presidents of the Ppiladelphia convention during the revolutionary war were of Huguenot parentage; to wit, Henry Laurens, John Jay, and Elias Bondinot. Wherever they settled, they and their descendants speedily became men of mark in some way in their respective occupations and professions. In this respect Dr. Daniel Turney, the father of Nelson, fully vindicated the purity of his descent, and the superiority of the race, in the skill, intelligence, and energy with which he practiced his profession. He was a surgeon in the United States army in 1812, and he rapidly attained eminence, both as a physician and surgeon, in the army and in his subsequent civil practice, where he was an arduous and successful practitioner. His distinguishing characteristics were firmness and courage —qualifications indispensable to the successful surgeon. To these qualities he added remarkable energy and zeal, and he followed his profession, as all successful men must—from an intense love of, and devotion to it. A firm believer in the almost unlimited resources of medical science, he never relinquished his efforts to save while life remained.

His thorough educational training and his steady pursuit of the study of the diseases peculiar to the climate of southeastern Ohio, gave him a mastery over them, which was shown by his unusually successful practice; while his promptness and energy in alarming cases gave him a prestige in his profession which rendered his untimely death, which occurred in 1827, an almost irreparable loss, no less to the community than to his family.

In manner Dr. Turney was unaffected, earnest and generous, having in his nature no taint of selfishness. But on the contrary, he was liberal and considerate to all, ever regarding himself as the minister of the afflicted, whom he served often without the slightest prospect of compensation. At the time of his death he left a widow and four children, the oldest but ten years of age.

Nelson's brother, the late Dr. Samuel D. Turney, who died in 1878, was an eminent man in his profession, having served with distinction during the war of the rebellion as surgeon of volunteers, and as medical director. He was brevetted for meritorious and distinguished services. He was also surgeon general of Ohio, under Governors Hayes and Noyes, and was also a prominent and popular member of the faculty of the Starling medical college, at Columbus, Ohio.

Nelson was educated at the public schools and at the academy of Dr. Washburn, in Blendon, Franklin county. By the death of his father, Nelson was thrown upon his own resources, and when fifteen years of age he was employed as a clerk in the Columbus post office, under Belah Latham, an intimate friend of his father, and the father of Hon. Milton S. Latham, one of the California millionaires of the present day. In 1837 he entered the long established house of Fay, Kilbourne & Co., of Columbus, of which firm the late Dr. Lincoln Goodale was a member, and the original founder. Here he remained until 1840, when with his mother and her family he returned to his native town and entered the establishment of H. & W. Bell, where he remained until appointed by the board of public works as collector of tolls for the Ohio and Erie canal at Circleville, and in that position he remained until a change of political management resulted in his being rotated out of office. In 1843 he entered the employ of the celebrated firm of Neil, Moore & Co., the extensive and widely known stage coach proprietors. In those days that firm wielded a power in the State and nation scarcely inferior to that now exercised by the larger lines of railway, as all the mails and passengers were transported from the seacoast to the Mississippi valley by these and similar lines of coaches; and, at the time of which we write, there were but two unimportant lines of railway in the State. The reader, whose memory extends back to the days of stage coaches, cannot have yet forgotten the thrill of awe with which he gazed upon the huge swinging vehicle with its living load, drawn by four shining, prancing steeds, as it whirled through the village streets, nor the stirring tones of the driver's bugle, which was wont to waken the echoes of the quiet night, with its note of warning to the drowsy hostler, or the still drowsier postmaster, warning them to be quick about changing horses and mails, under pain of the driver's severest displeasure, expressed in language more forcible than polished. The drivers of those days, the only heroes of that time who remain bright in memory, have long been stranded in quiet church-yards, or forced to the far west by the overflowing tide of emigration and railway travel, where they may be occasionally found scaling the giddy grades of the Rockys and the Sierras, or dashing through the teeming California valleys. Here, in Ohio, they exist only in the memory of the middle-aged citizen, whose boyish heart was wont to swell with pride if he were in the enjoyment of a nod from the royal knight of the whip, and who would give a thousand miles of travel in a palace car to have one more swing at the tail of a flying coach, hanging to the streaming straps of the loaded "boot."

While Mr. Turney was in the employ of the stage company a difficulty occurred with a Missouri company, and he was forthwith dispatched to Missouri with a full equipment of coaches and horses, to run an opposition line in that State, and bring the western company to a realizing sense of their temerity in assuming to run counter to the will of the more powerful Ohio corporation. This prompt action of the Ohio company brought the Missouri company to terms when Mr. Turney had only reached Indianapolis, and he was at once ordered north with his outfit, and distributed the horses and coaches along the lake shore, between Sandusky and Detroit, where he established a line, with headquarters at Toledo, where he remained in charge of the business until the spring of 1844. He then returned to Columbus, remaining in the employ of the stage company until the following year, when he removed to Philadelphia and entered the wholesale dry-goods house of Messrs. Miller, Cooper & Co., where he continued until the following year, when he returned to Ohio. He was then married to Miss Dorothea Renick, daughter of George Renick, esq., of Chillicothe, and engaged in the mercantile business on his own account at Circleville, where he remained until he sold out his business and removed to Chillicothe. In 1850 he returned to Pickaway county, where he engaged in farming on an extensive scale, giving his attention more particularly to stock-feeding. Twenty years after, with the intention of retiring from all active business, he sold his farm and removed to Circleville, where he built the beautiful and commodious house in which he now resides.

Mr. Turney still owns a farm of five hundred and twenty-five acres, lying a short distance west of Circleville, which is one of the model farms of central Ohio. He has taken a deep interest in agriculture for many years, and has striven, by all proper means, to encourage a higher standard of excellence in farm management. He was an active member of the county agricultural society from its first organization, and for many years its president. He was also one of the most active and energetic members of the State board of agriculture from 1862 to 1870, and was president of the board during the years 1863 and 1864.

Mr. Turney was largely instrumental in developing the turnpike system of Pickaway county, and built the Circleville, Darbyville and London turnpike. He also superintended the building of the beautiful Masonic temple at Circleville, and was chairman of the committee of arrangements, June 2, 1879, on the occasion of its dedication, an event long to be remembered by the thousands of citizens of central Ohio who witnessed the imposing ceremonies and partook of the bountiful hospitalities of the Circleville Free Masons.

Few of the citizens of Ohio enjoy in a higher degree the respect, esteem and confidence of the people of Ohio than does Mr. Turney, and few are more deserving of confidence. His life has been well filled with positions of honor and trust, the duties of all of which he has discharged with remarkable fidelity and rare good judgment; and, singularly, all of his more important positions have been without compensation.

By appointment of Governor Brough, in 1864, he was a member of the military committee of his county during the most trying period of the war, when treason reared its horrid form at home to threaten and alarm. In that position he was most devoted and self-sacrificing. Whitelaw Reid, in his "Ohio in the War," fully realized the importance of that valuable adjunct to the State military force when he said:

"The services of the military committees throughout the war were most valuable, as during all the years of the war there were enemies at home as well as at the front, who had to be met and overcome.

As a member of his county commttee, Mr. Turney was actively engaged in providing for the raising and equipment of the various contingents of troops which Pickaway county was called upon to supply, and otherwise aiding and sustaining the State executive in the darkest days of the civil war; and all this without other compensation than the consciousness of a patriotic duty faithfully performed. He was ever ready to respond to the calls of the governor to go to the front, where our stricken soldiers were languishing in hospitals, no matter at what sacrifice of time, or comfort, or pleasure. He was also actively engaged in the field during the memorable "Morgan raid."

In 1859 Mr. Turney declined the nomination to the Ohio house of representatives, and, in 1868, he was the Republican candidate for congress, but his district being overwhelmingly Democratic, he was defeated by a strict party vote. In his early youth and manhood he was a Whig in politics, and connected himself with the Republican party on its organization. In 1872 he was a delegate to the Republican national convention which met in Philadelphia and nominated Grant the second time.

In 1871 Mr. Turney was selected by Hon. Columbus Delano, secretary of the interior, to go as a special commissioner to investigate the business of the Indian agencies of the upper Missouri river, including the Yankton, Santee, Cheyenne, and Grand River Sioux, and subsequently the agency at Green Bay, Wisconsin, and the so-called "pine contracts" with the Menomonee Indians of Michigan. In the fall of the same year, in company with Hon. B. R. Cowen, assistant secretary of the interior, and Colonel J. J. Woods, of Kansas, he appraised the Cherokee lands in the Indian Territory west of 96° west longitude. In 1872, with Assistant Secretary Cowen and Major J. W. Wham, of Illinois, under appointment of the secretary of the interior, he visited the Teton Sioux, then under the leadership of the notorious Sitting Bull, and after spending three months near the upper Missouri river in Montana, with the wildest of the wild tribes, three hundred miles from any military force or station, and without escort or protection of any kind, led away three thousand of Sitting Bull's forces, and brought thirty of his most influential chiefs to Washington. In 1873, he served as chairman of the special commission appointed by Secretary Delano to investigate the lumber contracts made between Hon. E. P. Smith, commissioner of Indian affairs (then agent of the Leech Lake Indians), and A. H. Wilder, esq., of St. Paul, Minnesota.

In 1871 Mr. Turney was appointed, by President Grant, a member of the celebrated board of Indian commissioners. This board was provided for by an act of congress, and was to be filled only by men eminent for their philanthropy, who were to serve without compensation. They exercised a great influence in the conduct of the business of the Indian office, and ably seconded the efforts of the president and Secretary Delano to introduce reforms in the Indian service. The following named gentlemen constituted the commission: Felix R. Brunot, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, chairman; Robert Campbell, St. Louis; William E. Dodge, Nathan Bishop, New York; John V. Farwell, Chicago; George H. Stuart, Philadelphia; E. S. Tobey, Boston; John D. Lang, Maine; Nelson J. Turney, Ohio, and Vincent Collyer, of New York, secretary. Mr. Turney served on this board until failing health compelled him to retire, in 1875.

He was appointed by Governor Hayes as trustee of the Central Ohio asylum for the insane, and served until the Democratic legislature of 1874 legislated the board out of existence.

On account of his well recognized business capacity and integrity, Mr. Turney was chosen assignee in bankruptcy of the estate of Mr. Lemuel Steeley, one of the largest estates in the Scioto valley. His management of the large interests thus committed to his charge in the very midst of the severest financial depression the country ever experienced, is one among the many evidences of his ability. To the satisfactory settlement of that estate his friends can always point with commendable pride.

Mr. Turney is unassuming in his manner, and somewhat undemonstrative in the expression of his opinions, but he is none the less firm in his convictions and unswerving in their support and advocacy. He is brave and generous to a fault, and neither danger, threats, nor ridicule can swerve him from what he thinks the path of right; but he is, at the same time, considerate of the opinions and feelings of others. In him the deserving young man, struggling for a foothold in the crowded occupations of life, has always found a friend, and while he has ever been liberal in his gifts and charities, few of his most intimate friends are aware of his charitable efforts. Neither bigoted nor puritanic in his creed or in his life, he has yet so demeaned himself as that his work will be able to stand the test of the Grand Overseer's square when it is presented for inspection. In all the positions he has filled, no one has, even for a single moment, had reason to doubt his integrity, and the sobriquet, "Old Honesty," which was, years ago, conferred upon him by his associate members of the Ohio State board of agriculture, is the very best evidence of his character in that respect.

The writer has seen him placed in positions where men of ordinary courage and integrity would have hesitated as to their duty, but his clear sense of right and justice was never clouded by fear, nor in the slightest degree disturbed by threats. Regardless of mere personal danger, he always goes straight forward in the line of duty. In short, he fully demonstrates, in his own clearly defined and positive character, the purity of his descent from those sturdy French Calvinists who could leave home, and country, and fortune, under the bloody persecution of papal despotism, but could not surrender their freedom of conscience and the liberty to worship God in their own way.

SAMUEL ROGERS.

During the closing quarter of the last century, a considerable body of Germans, from Pennsylvania, attracted by the beautiful and fertile lands on the tributaries of the Shenandoah river, settled near Winchester, in Frederick county, Virginia. In that settlement, about the year 1798, Samuel Rogers, the subject of this sketch, was born. He was of German ancestry on his mother's side, and the prominent traits of his character were an inheritance from his mother's stock.

Although occupying a region highly favored by nature, and rich in agricultural resources, a number of these settlers, early in the present century, imbued with the restlessness so characteristic of the pioneers of this country, resolved to seek new homes in the young State o Ohio, and accordingly emigrated thither about the year 1806, locating in the neighborhood of the town, then in Fairfield, but now in Franklin county, known as Canal Winchester; the word "canal" being added to the name of this place many years subsequent to its foundation, to distinguish it from another Winchester in Guernsey county, Ohio.

The father of Samuel Rogers had died, and he accompanied his mother, who had married again, and his step-father, among the Virginia emigrants, to Ohio, and, although then but eight years of age, endured his full share of the severe trials of pioneer life. The energy, intelligence, and skill with which he performed the duties of his first employment—a hired hand upon a farm—secured for him, a few years later, the friendly interest of William and Christian King, then leading merchants of Lancaster, Ohio.

His father, not needing his services himself, hired him to a neighboring farmer when he was, probably, about ten years of age, by whom he was set to hauling logs for firewood, from the forest, with a team; having no assistance in the work, but required, by his own skill, to load the logs upon a sled, upon which they were drawn to the wood-pile. While engaged in this occupation, one of the Kings, in passing along the road, was attracted by the success with which a task so difficult and unusual for so young a lad, was performed; and, stopping to speak to him, was so much pleased with his intelligent deportment, that he became at once very much interested in him, and during this or some subsequent interview, asked him if he would not like to be a store-keeper—a question which he promptly answered in the affirmative.

In 1810, when about twelve years of age, he entered the store of a Mr. Crockett, of Lancaster. How long he remained there is not definitely known, or what agency, if any, Mr. King had in securing him the situation. Within a few years afterward, however, and while he was still a mere lad, he was taken into the employment of the firm of King & Bro. Here he devoted himself closely and faithfully to the discharge of his duties, gaining the entire confidence of his employers immediately.

The following incident will show the extent of responsibility, remarkable for one so young, with which he was unhesitatingly trusted, and will also illustrate the sagacity, and the energy and decision of character he already evinced:

In the early history of Ohio, commerce yet retained a great deal of its primitive character. Merchants were, to a considerable extent, compelled to barter their goods for the products of the country, instead of selling them for ready money. In the usual course of business the wheat received in exchange for goods was ground into flour at the country mills, and then shipped on flat-boats to New Orleans to be marketed. In the spring of 1817, the firm of King & Bro. had accumulated a quantity of flour which they proposed to send to market in this way, transporting it on wagons from Lancaster to Circleville, where flat-boats were constructed to carry it to New Orleans. Before the preparations for shipping the flour were completed, the supercargo was disabled, by an accident, and it became necessary to select one to take his place. The Kings offered the responsible position to their young clerk, who, with promptness, accepted the trust. He made the long voyage successfully, arriving at New Orleans to find the yellow fever raging there. The panic-stricken population had almost entirely abandoned the city; business was utterly prostrated, and there was no market for the flour. No magnetic telegraph or railroads then existed, and communication by mail was slow and uncertain. It was impossible to delay action until the owners of the flour could be heard from. Some of the hands who had accompanied Mr. Rogers were attacked by the fever, and others deserted him. The emergency was one which called for prompt and decisive action, in order to prevent a ruinous, if not a complete loss; and having learned, through a commission house in New Orleans, that flour commanded a good price in England, he at once resolved to ship his cargo to Liverpool, and to make the voyage himself, keeping charge of the property committed to his personal care. He chartered a vessel, accordingly, and ordered the flour to be put on board, but was stricken down by the prevailing disease, while superintending the work. He did not, however, abandon the voyage, but notified the captain that he would come on board as soon as the vessel was ready to sail. The captain was not willing to permit him to do so, and sent him word to that effect. Upon receipt of this reply, learning that the vessel was loaded, although greatly prostrated by the fever, Mr. Rogers hired some colored men to carry him on board the vessel, on a blanket, which they did, and dropped him on the upper deck. He then said to the captain, in his characteristic quiet, but determined way, "Sir, I want you to sail at once for Liverpool, in accordance with the terms of the charter-party which I hold. If you do not comply I will discharge you, and hire a captain and crew who will do so; for the purpose of this voyage I own this vessel." The captain, overawed by the firm bearing and decided language of the young supercargo, hastened to obey his orders, expecting nothing else, however, than that he would shortly have to throw his dead body overboard.

The captain and crew kept aloff while the vessel was passing down the Mississippi to the gulf, rendering him no assistance, except to hand him, every morning, on the end of a knife, a dose of calomel, and push a pitcher of lemonade within his reach. Upon entering the gulf, finding him still alive, the captain subjected him to the following heroic treatment: Passing a rope from a yard-arm of the ship under his arms, he caused him to be drawn up until his body was erect, and then had the seamen pour buckets of water over his head until he fainted. He was then laid down on the deck of the vessel, where he slept long and soundly, and when he awoke the fever had left him. He now rapidly recovered his health, and in due time arrived at Liverpool, with his cargo of flour, which he disposed of at a price which made a handsome profit for his principals.

The fact that an American merchant was in Liverpool, from the distant wilderness of Ohio, at a time when less was known of the geography of our western frontier, by even the most intelligent Europeans, than is now known of the interior of Africa, or the jungles of India, excited great interest in that city, and the mayor paid him the high compliment of inviting him to dine with the leading merchants of Liverpool, a circumstance which speaks well for the impression which he must have made by his personal bearing and intelligence, upon the business men of that great emporium. It will be remembered that he was then only nineteen years of age. Unfortunately, the sale of his cargo upon profitable terms did not end the difficulties which attended his venture. Upon applying to his consignees for the money due upon the balance of account, he was informed, to his astonishment, that the entire proceeds had been drawn for, by his commission merchant, at New Orleans, his signature having been obtained, under some pretence, during his illness, leaving him without even the means for returning home. He determined at once to return to New Orleans to recover the money, if possible; and the merchants to whom he had sold the flour, had formed so favorable an opinion of him that they voluntarily loaned him three hundred dollars for his traveling expenses. Fortunately, the captain of the vessel, in which he had gone to England, was just ready to sail for New Orleans, and Mr. Rogers embarked with him. The captain had formed a warm friendship for him, which was destined to be of great service to him in this emergency. He received, upon arrival in New Orleans, nothing but evasive replies from the commission merchant, whose shameless dishonesty had given so unexpected a turn to his venture; and it seemed probable that a settlement could be effected only by a protracted litigation. His friend, Captain McGregor, a bluff and resolute Scotchman, took a very earnest interest in the result, and determined to render all the assistance in his power in bringing the matter to an immediate close, by some satisfactory adjustment. He was an older man, and although, perhaps, of no more bold and decided character or capacity to meet difficulties than his young friend, was a man of wider experience in life. He accompanied Mr. Rogers to the hotel where the commission merchant was living, and finding him in his room, locked the door, putting the key in his pocket, and pointing a loaded pistol at the scoundrel, said to him, "Sir, you understand what we are here for." Refusal to comply was evidently dangerous, and payment of the amount of the claim was promptly offered, by a draft on New York. The draft was, conditionally, accepted, and learning by enquiry of bankers in New Orleans that the draft was considered good by them, Mr. Rogers sailed for New York to collect it. Upon his arrival the draft was duly honored, and he set out upon the journey homeward, having purchased a horse to carry him back to Ohio.

Meanwhile, the Kings had heard nothing of his bold undertaking. Owing to the fact that he was prostrated by yellow fever, while preparing to embark for Liverpool, he had been unable to write before leaving New Orleans. Persons who had been with him at New Orleans, reported that he had been attacked by the fever, and that both he and the flour had disappeared, and, receiving this report, the Kings did not doubt but that he was dead and the flour lost. It happened that about the time Mr. Rogers was leaving the east for Ohio, Christian King set out from Lancaster for Philadelphia, also on horseback, to purchase a stock of goods for his store. Although a very intelligent man, Christian King had been reared in the prevailing superstition of the Pennsylvania Germans in those days—a belief in ghosts. When, therefore, one day, as he was riding along the lonely road across the Alleghenies, late in the evening, he met his young clerk, riding towards him on horseback, he did not for a moment doubt that he saw an apparition.

His further astonishment, when he heard the familiar voice in which he was addressed, can be imagined. Convinced of his mistake, and becoming satisfied that the man he saw was actually in the flesh, he dismounted, embraced him with wild delight, covering him with kisses, in the good old German fashion, and almost crushing him in his brawny arms, being a man of large frame and great physical strength. The story of the shipment of the flour to Liverpool, its sale, the attempted swindle at New Orleans, and the ultimate and fortunate outcome of the operation, the proceeds of which Mr. Rogers had with him, was soon told, and he accompanied his grateful employer back to Philadelphia, where the latter introduced him to his mercantile acquaintances, recounting, with great satisfaction, his adventure, and where, with this unexpected increase of means (some four thousand dollars—a sum of much more importance at that day than at the present time), a large stock of goods was purchased.

The first exclamation of Christian King, as he listened to the narration of this adventure, was: "Sammy, by the heavenly God, I will set you up in business!" He was as good as his word, and, upon their return to Lancaster, Samuel Rogers, though not yet of age, was admitted as a member of the firm he had served so faithfully.

He remained for some years at Lancaster, a partner of the Kings, when he resolved to enter into business on his own account, elsewhere. For the purpose of obtaining information which would enable him to select a desirable business location, he made an extensive tour through the west, proceeding to Cincinnati, by way of Circleville and Wilmington, and thence to St. Louis, by way of Lawrenceburg, Evansville, and other towns. During his trip which was made throughout the entire distance on horseback, he saw much of what was then our extreme western frontier, and made many observations which were of great value to him in his subsequent business career.

Upon his return, he determined to locate at Circleville, regarding the place as one of the most desirable business points he had seen. This choice was influenced by the fact that the Ohio canal was about to be constructed, a circumstance which he saw would give him a profitable trade at this point, with those employed in the construction of the work, and foreseeing that after that great internal improvement was completed, Circleville would continue to be an excellent point for mercantile business. The fact of its proximity to Lancaster, where his business standing and credit, the friendship of the Kings, and other acquaintances, would be a continued support, was also an important consideration. The permanent prosperity of the place, its present wealth, and the fact that he was there able to accumulate a large fortune, by straightforward application and industry, is sufficient proof of the sagacity displayed in this selection of a business location.

Having removed to Circleville, he was, on the fourth of April, 1826, united in marriage to Miss Juliet M. Hollister, of Chillicothe, Ohio, by the Rev. Mr. Claybaugh, of that place. His wife was a lady of unusual intelligence, and possessed of many amiable traits of character and womanly virtues. Her christian character is spoken of as having been one of singular beauty and consistency, and the proofs abound that the sincerity of her profession was practically and thoroughly manifested in her life by deeds of charity and a tender sympathy for all in her neighborhood who were suffering from sickness, sorrow, or any other adversity. Her comparatively early death was sincerely mourned by the entire community, and her memory is warmly cherished by all who knew her.

The subsequent incidents in Mr. Rogers' life are chiefly those common to the careers of enterprising and prosperous merchants in western towns. He soon became, and was, for many years, one of the wealthiest citizens of Circleville, and, incidentally and directly, did much to promote the prosperity of the town and county in which he resided. At an early day he engaged in the business of shipping grain and packing pork. The firm of Rogers & Gregg was established, at Circleville, immediately upon his removal from Lancaster, Mr. Noah H. Gregg, his partner, having also resided at Lancaster. The partnership lasted four years, when Mr. Gregg sold out to Mr. Rogers. William Martin was subsequently, and for many years, until his removal to Decatur, Illinois, in partnership with Mr. Rogers at Circleville, and in New Orleans, where he established a commission and forwarding house, which did a very extensive business with shippers in the valleys of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers and their tributaries. James H. Finley, now of Chicago, Samuel H. Ruggles, R. D. Atwater, and others, were also, at later periods of his life, connected with him in business.

Mr. Rogers was one of the first stockholders and directors of the old Circleville bank, and subsequently sustained the same relations to the Pickaway County and Exchange banks and the First and Second National banks, peforming his duties as a bank director with the same fidelity and diligence with which he discharged every trust imposed upon him. He constantly kept in mind the fiduciary character of the position, and always remembered that he was the guardian, not only of his own interests, but of those of all the stockholders of the institution.

He was not exempt from misfortune. After a long and prosperous business career, in consequence of endorsements in transactions for the benefit of others, he was overtaken by reverses, such as, unfortunately, befall the great majority of all who engage in mercantile pursuits. In these trying emergencies, his conduct was worthy of his character, and of his honorable name. He at once surrendered, for the benefit of his creditors, all of his accumulated fortune, the result of so many years of laborious enterprise, without any reservation whatever, beyond the small exemption allowed by the strictest construction of the law, and his great misfortune was sustained with fortitude and a remarkable cheerfulness, such as could only result from conscious integrity.

A marked trait in the character of Samuel Rogers, which is deserving of special notice, is that kindness of heart, which induced him to adopt the practice, early in his business career, of assisting young men, with whom he became acquainted, to begin business, by means of money and such recommendations as secured them the credit needed in making a start in business. He adhered to this custom until the financial embarrassments, which came upon him near the close of his life, put it out of his power any longer to do good in that way. There are still living many of those who experienced the benefit of his unselfish and generous aid, in beginning business for themselves.

One of the first obstacles with which persons are apt to meet in making inquiries into the family history of the self-made men who have been, and are still, so numerous in America, is the difficulty of obtaining genealogical information. It is not an infrequent occurrence for men who have attained eminence as business men or statesmen, to be unable to tell the precise time of their birth. In such cases, too, knowledge of ancestry is also generally wanting. These considerations must account for the absence of such facts from this sketch.

Thrown upon the world when a mere child, the first lesson which Samuel Rogers learned, was that of self-reliance. In those days, industrious habits were highly valued, and at a very early age children were called upon to share in the labors of their elders, to an extent now rarely known. Owing to this condition of the society in which he was reared, the subject of this sketch had, in his youthful days, but few educational advantages; yet he, nevertheless, through his own exertions, became a man of very thorough mental culture.

When a mere boy, Samuel Rogers attended a country school, in Virginia, for three months, during which time he learned to read. Small as was his stock of school learning, it served as a key to unlock for him very extensive stores of knowledge. When he was only twelve years of age, he took his place behind a counter; his circumstances being such that he was obliged to educate himself during the leisure moments he could snatch from the strict demands of his daily business. He acquired a handwriting of that fine old style known as record hand. Specimens of his writing, in books of account, and in letters, seen by the writer of this sketch, have almost the accuracy and beauty of engraving. At an early age, he became, also, a thorough arithmetician, and an accomplished and scientific book-keeper. He did not, however, limit himself to the acquisition of such knowledge, merely, as his occupation as a merchant demanded. He had a taste for books, and, in the course of time, made himself familiar with many of the best classical writers in English and German. He studied the history of our mother country in the pages of Hume, and upon the shelves of his quite extensive private library, he accumulated a valuable collection of standard authors, as the result of his longing to gratify a cultivated taste for literature. He was a systematic reader of the best periodicals and public journals of the country; was a subscriber for De Bow's Southern Review, and Hunt's Merchant's Magazine, from the beginning of these publications, and also, for many years, of the Eclectic Magazine, and thus, by means of a memory unusually retentive, he acquired a stock of knowledge in regard to topics of financial, commercial, and general interest, which rendered him a very interesting and instructive companion for such persons of culture as his extensive business transactions brought him in contact with, and it was only his singular modesty which kept his acquirements in this respect from being more widely known.

Only his most intimate friends were privileged to know the full wealth of his mind. His conversational powers were of a high order. He was always listened to with interest, and what he said instructed as well as pleased.

In his youth, he was carefully instructed in the principles of christianity, as taught in the Lutheran church, and was confirmed in that church in boyhood. Upon removing to Circleville, he became a member of the congregation of St. Philip's church. He was, from time to time, a member of the vestry, and frequently took an active part in the management of the parish. The very modesty and purity of his character seem to have caused him to be reserved in the matter of participating actively in the spiritual work of the church, although he was always a regular attendant upon the services, and devoutly engaged in the worship of the congregation. He often expressed his admiration of the beautiful liturgy of the Episcopal church, and of its wise and thorough adaptation to all the requirements of religious worship.

In the spring of 1868 he removed to Chicago, to make his home with his son, William K. Rogers. He suffered, however, a sudden attack of sickness, in the summer following, and died on the thirtieth of July, of that year.

In his domestic life, Samuel Rogers displayed the best qualities of a husband, and a father. His affectionate, devoted and noble traits of character in these relations were conspicuous. The remembrance of his tender devotion to the members of his family, often inexpressibly touching to those who witnessed it, deserves to be cherished in the hearts of his friends, but properly forms no part of this public memorial.

He was, by nature, a gentleman in the best sense of the word. The grace and dignity of his manners resulted from an inborn grace of character, and the earnest desire, by which he was always animated, to deal justly, honestly, generously, and kindly, with his fellow-men.

The memory of such a life should not quickly perish from among men, and this brief record is made by one who knew him well during the latter portion of his life, with the hope of perpetuating some of its well-known incidents. It is a story which belongs to the early history of our country; one which the altered circumstances of later times, changed as our social condition is in every material respect, will render less and less familiar—the story of the persevering toil and sterling merit by which one born to no advantages; without the aid and benefit of education at school; self-taught with respect to even the simplest rudiments of learning; with no resources, save his own innate force of character; no assistance, beyond that which his native worth secured, and for which he rendered always a full equivalent, advanced steadily and surely, step by step, through a long, honorable and useful career, to all the substantial attainments that are of essential value in human life; leaving to his children the priceless heritage of his good name, and for all, to whom the memory of his life is, for any reason, of interest, an example worthy of regard.

SAMUEL H. RUGGLES, of Circleville, Ohio, was born at Brownville, Jefferson county, New York, June 8, 1821. His father, Samuel, and his mother, Anna H. Ruggles, were natives of Boston, Massachusetts. In early and middle life, his father was largely engaged in foreign commerce, but in the war of 1812 he suffered severe losses by the capture of his vessels by the public enemy; and, soon after the close of that war, he removed to the northern part of the State of New York, where he engaged, in a reduced manner, in agricultural and mercantile pursuits, and died at Lowville, New York, in 1834, leaving his widow with a family of five children to support and educate, with very limited means. Mrs. Ruggles was, however, a woman of much force of character, and displayed her good judgment by maintaining her son, our subject, at the Lowville academy until he had obtained a good English education. Then, and after her husband's death, she resolved to have that son seek, in this then comparatively new State, his fortune. In 1835, with his uncle, General H. Lawrence, she therefore sent him to Circleville, Ohio, where he was engaged as a junior clerk in the mercantile house of Rogers & Martin, with no promise of compensation beyond his living. Having, as the time went by, the natural longing of a lad who never before had been away from it, to return to his mother's home, he asked her consent to his doing so; but this she resolutely refused, and it is to this refusal ("the greatest trial of her life," as she subsequently characterized it on her death-bed), that our subject attributes the beginning of his success in life; for, at the end of two years' faithful service in his business, his employers placed one hundred dollars to his credit, promised him promotion, as he deserved it, and one hundred and fifty dollars for the third year, with his board, lodging, etc. Then it was that his ambition to excel was stirred, and he resolved to accumulate, by saving at least two-thirds of his salary, and by investment, carefully directed, have his little surplus fund afford him some revenue. The result exceeded his expectations. The firm noticed his attention to business, and earnest effort to accumulate by the saving of his salary, and the means he took to increase it; and, after serving them eight years in all, they took him into partnership, with one-fourth interest in their wholesale grocery, grain, and pork-packing establishment, and in 1845, following the engagement of the firm in the commission business in New Orleans, with an increased interest in it, he was placed at the head of the house in Circleville, and in a few years afterwards, purchased the entire interest of his partners there. After 1852, retiring from the grocery and grain branches of his business, he devoted his attention almost exclusively to pork-packing until 1863, when, in the interest of his children, he began investing in farms and farm land lying in the vicinity, but remaining engaged in the pork trade, and so continuing during the subsequent fifteen years. While not refusing minor civil and local office, Mr. Ruggles has invariably declined that which would interfere with his regular business. Having shunned all speculative operations, indorsing the ventures of others, investments in fancy stocks, and joint stock companies, as, to use his own expression in speaking of these things, he would have shunned rattlesnakes, he has never sustained any of those losses which usually result from such engagements.

When Fort Sumter became the initial target for the guns of rebellion against constituted authority, he was among the first to assist in the fitting out of a company; and before the Federal armies had gained a single victory, he invested largely in government bonds. Subsequently he assisted in the organization of the First and Second National banks of Circleville, in 1863, and was at once elected a director, and subsequently continued to be re-elected annually to such office.

In 1859 Mr. Ruggles married Miss Catharine, daughter of the late Ralph Osborn, of Columbus, Ohio, a pioneer of distinction, and four children, Samuel Turney, Lizzie J., Nelson J., and Fannie M. Ruggles, have been the issue of this union.

Though not a member of any church organization, Mr. Ruggles habitually contributes to religious and charitable objects, and also earestly interests himself in every public enterprise that promises to benefit the community in which he resides.

A. C. BELL.

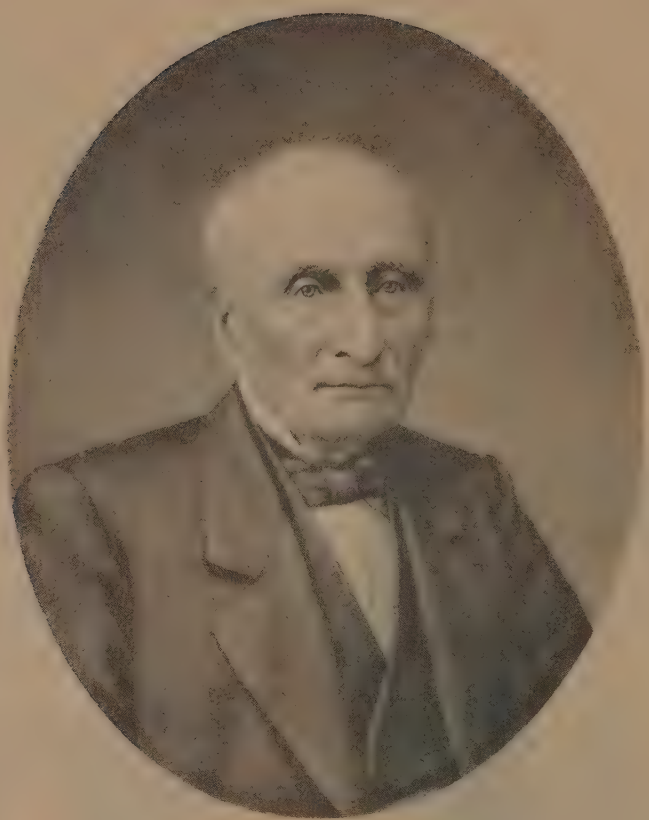
MRS. MINERVA R. BELL.

THE BELL FAMILY.

The founder of this family, James Bell, with his wife and children, emigrated from Ireland to Pennsylvania, about 1807, where they remained until 1818 or '19, when they moved to Circleville, Ohio, where both James Bell and his wife died, a few years after their arrival. Their children were: William, Nancy, Jane, Margaret, Thomas, Mary Ann, James, and Elizabeth.

William Bell was born in Ireland, August 13, 1802, and when about five years of age came with his father and mother to this country. He was married November 29, 1825, to Catharine Caldwell, daughter of Alexander Caldwell, who settled in Pickaway county, about 1800.

Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Bell had eight children, seven of whom lived to maturity. They were: James, Jane, Alexander, Ruth, Thomas, Margaret, and Carolina Samantha. They lived one year on a farm now owned by Mr. Groce, in Walnut township, where their eldest child was born. They then moved to the Columbus pike, in the south part of Walnut township, where the remainder of their children were born, and where Mr. Bell died, April 30, 1851. Mrs. Bell remained in her own home until 1875, when she went to live with her son, A. C. Bell, in the north part of Circleville township. She is now seventy-seven years of age.



S. Lutz

A. C. Bell was born in Walnut township, Pickaway county, August 22, 1830. He was married, October 25, 1855, to Minerva Reber, daughter of Thomas N. Reber, of Wyandot county, Ohio. She was born in Fairfield county, March 5, 1834. They commenced housekeeping on what is now known as the James Corder farm, where they lived until the fall of 1861, when they moved to his present residence, on the north line of Circleville township. Mrs. Minerva Bell died October 15, 1875. Mr. and Mrs. Bell had nine children, as follows: Thomas R., Lucy K., Clara J., Charles, Flora, Rachel, Lyman A., Meta Minerva and Amasa, all of whom are living, and all but the two eldest remain at home. The two eldest live on a farm known as the Isaac W. Stage property.

After the death of his wife, Mrs. Minerva Bell, his came to live with him, where she still remains. She was mother born in 1802, in Jackson township, and was early taught to use the loom and weave the cloth used for clothing in those early days. Always fearless, she has often forded the Scioto river on horseback, and in a light boat. Her father lived on the bank of the river, near a ford called by his name, and where he kept a flat-boat for use in ferrying passengers across the river. She has often assisted in this duty. She now recalls the time, when, mounted on her horse, with her child in her arms, she swam the Scioto in flood time. Now, in the seventy-seventh year of her age, she has as distinct a recollection of the events of her early life, as she does of those that occurred at a recent date.

A representation of the home of A. C. Bell, with portraits of himself and wife, appear in connection with this sketch.

SALT CREEK.[1]

Town number eleven, in range number twenty (Salt Creek), lies east of the township of Pickaway, and is bounded on the north by Fairfield county, on the east by Hocking county, and on the south by Ross county. It is one of the best improved townships in Pickaway county, and its appearance evinces the industry, thrift and increasing wealth of the inhabitants.

PHYSICAL FEATURES.

The surface of the township is generally quite rolling, and presents a picturesque appearance. In the eastern part it is somewhat broken and hilly, while in the southern, where there is more or less prairie, the surface is comparatively level.

The soil is fertile and is well adapted to the growth of wheat, corn, oats, clover and grass. Along Salt creek, and in the prairie portions of the township, are excellent corn lands, while the higher soil, which is underlaid with clay and slate, is more adapted to the growth of the small grains and grass.

The principal native varieties of timber were the oak, of several kinds, hickory, walnut, mulberry, cherry, buckeye, paw-paw and elm. In this connection we may mention that on the farm of John F. Mowery, in front of his house, is an elm, which, for size and beauty, is not to be surpassed by any other tree in the county. The trunk measures, above the swell of the roots, sixteen feet in circumference, and the branches, from one side to the other, one hundred and twenty-five feet.

In the extreme northeast corner of section twenty-one, on the farm of John Karschner, is a stately elm which marks almost the exact center of the township, and which Mr. Lutz says he has often used as a starting point in his surveying operations. It was but a mere sapling when he first saw it.

The principal stream is Salt creek, which runs through, and gives name to, the township. It rises in Fairfield county, enters the township in section three, and, flowing southeasterly, leaves the township in the southeast corner, gathering up several tributaries in its course, the largest of which is Laurel creek, which is mostly in Hocking county. Moccason creek heads in Fairfield county, flows south near the east line of the township until reaching section twenty-four, where it runs into Hocking county, and finally empties into the Laurel. Plum run and Pike Hale run are the most important western branches of Salt creek, and have a southeasterly course. Scippo creek, a branch of the Scioto river, flows through the west part of section six and a part of seven, in the northwest part of the township.

GAME.

Deer, wild turkeys and smaller game were very numerous in the early settlement of the township. The killing of a deer was an ordinary occurrence with any man who could handle a gun at all; and as for turkeys, several of them would often be bagged by a single shot. Wolves were plenty, troublesome and annoying, killing the sheep of the pioneers who were fortunate enough to have any, and rendering night hideous with their almost constant howls around their lonely dwellings. The township was not much inhabited by bear, although they frequently came in from the hills east of it, and several were killed by the hunters of Salt Creek. The last bear killed in Pickaway county was discovered by William Drum and George Morgan, on the farm of Drum's father, and followed by them into Washington township. Pursued closely by men and dogs, the animal ran up a white-oak tree, on the farm now owned by George W. Stout. Among those who joined in the chase were Jonathan Dreisbach and John Reichelderfer, who had their guns with them, and who were both pretty good shots. Both were ambitious of the honor of killing the animal, and, in order to gratify them, it was decided by Drum and Morgan, masters of ceremonies, to let them shoot simultaneously. The bear was killed instantly. He lodged in the fork of the tree, which had to be cut down in order to get him. The animal was a very large specimen, and his hide was sold for the sum of eighteen dollars. This was in June, 1840.

[1] For the facts of the early history of this township the writer is mainly indebted to Samuel Lutz.

SETTLEMENT.

Prior to the actual settlement of the township, most of the sections along Salt creek were occupied by "squatters," who began to come in about the year 1797 or 1798. Some of them had made extensive clearings, and a few, after the land came into market, purchased farms and settled upon them. One of these was Alexander Berry, who bought one hundred and twenty-seven acres in section number twenty. Afterwards he entered the southwest quarter of section fifteen, where he remained until 1820, when he sold to Jacob Markel and removed to Marion county.

Another squatter was John May, who lived on land in section twenty-six.

Conrad Kline was one of the earliest squatters, first locating on Plum run. He afterward entered a quarter section on Moccason creek, in section one, and lived there until his death. He was a soldier of the Revolution.

Matthias Hedges moved in at a very early date, probably before 1800. He located in section twenty-five, where he lived until 1803, moving then to Fairfield county, where he died.

An early squatter on the place now owned by Samuel Strous was Andrew Bussard. He died at the home of his son-in-law, Henry Reichelderfer, at the advanced age of ninety-nine years and nine months.

Christopher (or Christian) Myers and family moved in from Pennsylvania as early as 1800. His log cabin stood on the brow of the hill just west of Mr. Ballard's residence, in Tarlton, and was the first building in that portion of the township. Myers subsequently moved about a mile southwest of Tarlton, where he resided until his death.

Jacob Saylor, sr., about the same time, settled on Scippo creek, in section six, and George Pontious, a son-in-law of Myers, on section four, a mile west of the present village of Tarlton. He was twice married and had three children.

The first man who entered land in Salt Creek township was John Shoemaker. He came from Berks county, Pennsylvania, in the spring of 1801, and at the sale of government land in May, of that year, made an entry of land, after which he returned to Pennsylvania. The first patent was issued to him. The old document is now in the possession of Samuel Lutz, who owns a part of the land for which the patent was given. It bears date April 20, 1802, and is signed by Thomas Jefferson, president of the United States, and James Madison, secretary of State. Shoemaker subsequently entered a large amount of land in Pickaway and Fairfield counties. He did not visit Ohio again, after his return to Pennsylvania, until 1806, when he moved out with his family.

The brothers, Jacob and John Lutz, with their families and their mother, Elizabeth, came from Northumberland (now Union) county, Pennsylvania, in 1802. They made the journey in two canvas-covered wagons, each drawn by a four-horse team, and arrived in Salt Creek on the fifteenth day of October. Jacob Lutz purchased of John Shoemaker, in section twenty-six, four hundred and sixteen acres, paying therefor six dollars per acre. From sixty to seventy acres had been cleared in different portions of the purchase, and there were upon it two cabins, occupied by the squatters, Berry and May. Mr. Lutz and family took possession of the Berry cabin, where they spent the following winter. Subsequently he located on the site of the present residence of John Karschner, building a one and a half story hewed-log house. In 1811 he erected, in the same place, a frame house, which he occupied until his death, in 1824.

Jacob Lutz was born in 1762, and married Elizabeth Demuth in 1788, who survived him many years. They had five sons—Samuel, Jacob D., John D., Joseph, and Peter—all now dead but Samuel, who, at the age of nearly ninety-one years, is as clear-headed and almost as smart, physically, as ever. The son Joseph was drowned in Salt creek, about the first of March, 1805, falling into the stream while crossing on a log on his return from school, just above the present cattle bridge, near Mr. Dunkel's. His brothers, Jacob and John, were present, but were unable to render any assistance, the water being so turbulent.

John Lutz settled on Moccason creek, in section thirteen, moving into a cabin which had been previously occupied by Stephen Julian. He afterwards built a large frame dwelling on the same site, and also a large frame barn, but nothing of them now remains. He erected here, in 1804, the first saw-mill in the township. His death took place in 1833.

In 1803 Abraham Monett came in and entered section number thirty-four, on which he resided until his death.

William Stumpf came from Berks county, Pennsylvania, in the fall of 1801, and entered section number twenty-four. He returned to Pennsylvania, and remained until 1803, when he came out and made a settlement. He married Elizabeth Reichelderfer, in 1819, and located in the northwest part of section twenty-five, a portion of which he purchased of George Dunkel. He was largely engaged in the business of buying and selling cattle; driving stock cattle over the mountains. Several of his children now reside in the township. The family of his son, Charles, occupies the old homestead.

In the summer of 1803, George Dunkel and wife arrived from Berks county, Pennsylvania, and settled on section twenty-five, near the Hocking county line. In 1806, he sold a part of the section to William Stumpf. He and Stumpf afterwards built a saw-mill on Salt creek, a few rods above the bridge near Adelphi, and Dunkel moved there. He afterwards resided in Laurelville, and operated the mills there, which had been erected by Jacob Strous and Adam Defenbaugh, but finally returned to Salt creek, and occupied, until his death, the farm now occupied by his son, John. He was the father of ten children, six of whom are living. Kelson lives near Kingston, Ross county; Mary, wife of Solomon Riegel, of this township; Hannah, widow of J. Schlotman, also in this township; John, on the homestead; Susan, wife of John Horn, in Findlay, Ohio, and Abigail, wife of Conrad Ett, in Walnut township. The son, George Dunkel, deceased, was for many years one of the enterprising and prominent men of the township.

Jacob Shoemaker, in 1803, settled on section eighteen, the whole of which he owned. After the death of his first wife, he again married, and, subsequently, moved to Circleville. He was associate judge of Pickaway county for a number of years. The old homestead was the permanent residence of his son, Charles Shoemaker, who died in 1878.

Conrad Braucher entered section thirty-five, and settled upon it in 1805. He built a grist-mill in the west part of the section, the necessary power for which he obtained by digging a ditch from Bull run to Pike Hole run. Brancher died in 1822, and left, at his death, a large family surviving him.

Christopher Holderman came from Chester county, Pennsylvania, with his family of wife and three daughters, in June, 1805. He bought and settled upon a farm of two hundred and four acres, in the north part, section thirty-four, called the "Monnett section." In 1823, he moved to the place now occupied by his son, George Holderman. He died, February 22, 1838, aged nearly sixty-four, and his wife in 1856, aged seventy-six. They raised fourteen children—seven boys and seven girls—and eight are now living. George Holderman, who occupies the homestead, was born December 20, 1812, and married Mary Jones, November 12, 1835. She is a daughter of Aaron Jones, and was born January 25, 1817. Mr. and Mrs. Holderman have five children living and one deceased.

John Shoemaker, previously mentioned, after his return to Berks county, married Elizabeth Huy, from near Reading, Pennsylvania, and moved out in 1806. He made his location in section three, half a mile south of Tarlton, his son, Joseph Shoemaker, now occupying a part of the farm. Afterwards, he bought the land on which Tarlton now stands, of Newell, after which he lived where Wiley's hotel now stands. He was out for a brief period in the war of 1812, during which he was taken sick, and came home and died soon after. Mrs. Shoemaker subsequently became the wife of Dr. Otis Ballard, by whom she had two children. There were two sons and a daughter by the first marriage. The daughter married Dr. William B. Hawks, and resides in Columbus, and the sons, Joseph and Isaac, live at Tarlton.

Samuel Lybrand moved in with his family soon after Mr. Shoemaker, and settled at Newellstown (now Tarlton). Two daughters of the family are now living in Tarlton.

John Burns and family came from Kentucky to Ohio in 1797, and settled in Colerain township, Ross county. His son, Joseph Burns, and step-son, Samuel Fowler, had come out a year or so before. John Burns soon removed to Salt Creek township, Pickaway county, locating where Abram Heffner now lives, and died there in 1823. He had a family of ten children, of whom John Burns, now living in Salt Creek, at the age of eighty-seven or eighty-eight, is the sole survivor. The house of the family was once destroyed by fire, burning up the family record, and his exact age cannot be known. He married Sarah Queen, who died in 1865. They had but one child—Margaret, wife of Jacob Heffner. Mr. Burns was a soldier in the war of 1812.

Joseph Schoots, one of the earliest of the pioneers, settled on the northwest quarter of section thirty-three. He emigrated from Virginia and died on his original location, at an advanced age. He was a substantial and worthy citizen.

Benjamin Kepner and Henry Mathias were among the earliest of the settlers on Scippo creek. They settled in section six.

John Judy and family, of Berks county, Pennsylvania, settled in section twenty-eight, on what is known as the Rhodes farm, in the fall of 1805. While residing there three of the family died—the mother and two sons—and the remnant of the family moved to the southeast quarter of section twelve. The father died here, and his son, Peter, bought the place and occupied it until a few years since, when he sold the most of it to his son, J. B. Judy, retaining about thirty acres on the east end of the farm, where he recently died, aged eighty-four. He was the father of ten children, as follows, mentioned in the order of their birth: Caroline (widow of Jacob Wolf), lives in Fairfield county; Diana (Mrs. William H. Hart), lives in Hocking county; Elizabeth (Mrs. John Wann), in Salt Creek; Mary (afterwards Mrs. Cyrus W. Houston), is dead; John B. married Margaret Ann Gougar, and resides on the homestead; Henry and Catharine (Mrs. Henry Gearhart), in Fairfield county; Sarah (unmarried), lives with her mother; Barbara (Mrs. Cornelius More), lives in Franklin county; and William, on the old homestead.

John Reichelderfer and family, and his son John and family, came to Salt Creek from Berks county, Pennsylvania, in 1806. The two families moved into a cabin which stood where the brick residence of George S. Hosler stands. John, jr., and family shortly afterwards moved on to the farm now owned by Augustus Rose.

The two oldest daughters of John Reichelderfer, sr., (Catharine and Barbara) were the wives respectively of Conrad Brancher and Jacob Spangler. The former came to Salt Creek with her husband in 1805, as before mentioned, and the latter a year or two after the rest of the family, and settled with her husband on section number nine. The other daughters, who married after they came here, were: Mary, wife of Jacob Strous; Elizabeth, wife of William Stumpf, and Susan, wife of Samuel Fetcrolph.

Henry Reichelderfer married Nancy Bussard, and settled just north of his father's location. Samuel G. Lutz married his daughter for his first wife. Christian Reichelderfer married Rebecca Boucher and settled east of it. Jacob returned to Pennsylvania, a few years after his arrival here, and married Rebecca Leonard, when he came out with his wife to Salt Creek, and settled on the northeast quarter of section twenty-three. He resided there until his death, June 25, 1875. His wife died in 1856. They had five children, as follows: Sarah, now the widow of Samuel Reichelderfer; Elizabeth, wife of Jeremiah Strasser, of Berks county, Pennsylvania; Venus, who married Leannah Mowery, died September 19, 1856. His widow married again, and now lives in Allen county, this State. Henry died in 1854.

Samuel Noble was an early settler, half a mile south of Tarlton. He was from Franklin county, Pennsylvania. He was an excellent citizen, and was an elder in the Presbyterian church of Tarlton.

John Harmon and wife, from Northumberland county, Pennsylvania, settled two miles west of Tarlton, where Ira Moody now lives, in the year 1806. Mrs. Harmon died many years ago, but he lived until within a few days of ninety years of age, dying in December, 1875. They had seven children, all of whom were born in this township. They were: David, John, Elizabeth, Susan, Leah, Samuel and Rachel. John, now nearly seventy-one years of age, is a resident of this township, as is also a sister, Mrs. Karshner. He married Rosanna Christy, and has two children. John Harmon, sr., was a blacksmith, and was a hard-working, industrious man.

Henry Wissler* came from Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, with his family, consisting of his wife and ten children, in August, 1806. He had purchased, previously, over eleven hundred acres of land of John Shoemaker, in the southwest part of the township, for which he paid five dollars per acre. He moved into a cabin which stood just across the road from where the residence of Samuel Wissler now stands, and which was occupied by a squatter family by the name of Sweigert. In a few months Mr. Wissler built a two-story log house on the location of the former shanty, and resided there until his death, about the year 1830. His wife died in 1811. One child was born to them after their settlement. To each of his eleven children he gave one hundred and five acres of land. There are eight surviving children. Henry lives in Iowa; George lives in Illinois; Barbara (now Mrs. Weldy) in Indiana; Samuel resides in this township, in section thirty-two—he married Margaret Bunn, and has five children, one being deceased; Jacob also lives in Salt Creek; Magdalene (now Mrs. Biechler) in Iowa; Mary (Mrs. Wolf) in Marion county; Michael, who is deceased, married Rebecca Vangundy, and, after living in several places, settled where his son, Amos, now lives, and resided there until his death, June 30, 1865, aged seventy-five years. His wife preceded him a few years. They had a family of ten children, seven of whom are living.

The same year Abram Dreisbach and family joined the settlement. He first located where Allen Drum now lives, then moved to Tarlton, or near it, where he resided five years, when they settled in Fairfield county. He finally returned to this township, however, and died here at the house of his son-in-law, Joseph Foust, about the year 1840. Two sons and two daughters are living.

Henry Drum and family of wife and six children, from Berks county, Pennsylvania, settled in Salt Creek in 1806. He bought one hundred acres in section five, on which he erected his cabin. He subsequently entered the entire half of the section, and also lands in Fairfield county. He died in 1808, and was buried on his farm. His was among the earliest deaths in this portion of the township. His wife survived him a few years. Their son Henry, the eldest of the family, married Susannah Loughsbaugh, and settled in the same section where William Drum, his son, now lives. Near the place is a spring, which used to be a favorite resort of the Indians. A walnut tree, which stood there until a few years since, plainly showed that it had been used as a target by the Indians in their tomahawk and shooting practice. Henry Drum was the father of four children, one of whom is deceased. William, the youngest, when married, bought the farm of his father, who then moved into Fairfield county. He died at the residence of his son William, in the spring of 1861. He served in the war of 1812, being one of the forty-days men. His wife died in 1872. William Drum has a family of wife and four children, two boys and two girls: Josephus lives in Upper Sandusky; Mary Ann, wife of Captain Henry Hinson, of Circleville; Allen lives in this township; and Emma (Mrs. Walter Gray) resides in Washington township.

Abraham Heffner moved into the township from Pennsylvania, in the spring of 1807. The family lived during the ensuing summer in their covered wagon-box, a short distance north of the present residence of George Halderman. In this curious habitation the son, David, was born, November 3d, of the same year. Shortly after this event the family moved to that part of the township called Prairie View, where they settled on forty acres of land. The father died some twelve years since, in his ninetieth year, and the mother nearly four years before. They had eleven children. David Heffner, now residing in Washington township, married Lydia Bear, whose father, Peter Bear, was an early pioneer of Salt Creek.

Nicholas Whitesel and family came to Ohio from Virginia, in the year 1807, and after a short residence in Deer Creek, Fairfield county, located in the northeast corner of Salt Creek. He had a distillery on the Moccason in an early day. Considerable sickness prevailing in the family in this location, another was subsequently selected on higher ground. There were five children in the family, four of whom grew up—three sons and a daughter. The sons, George, Phillip and Jacob were in the war of 1812. Jacob married, June 12, 1821, Elizabeth Thomas, whose father, George Thomas, emigrated to Ohio from Pennsylvania, in the fall of 1817, settling in Salt Creek.

Jacob Whitesel settled on the place now occupied by his son, Archibald, and continued to live there until his death, July 25, 1871. His widow still survives, and resides in Tarlton, aged about seventy-nine. Of their seven children, four are yet living, to wit: Mrs. William Dreisbach; Elizabeth, unmarried; Archibald, on the old homestead; and Mrs. Israel Dunn, in Fairfield county.

Abraham Heffner moved in about 1807 or 1808, and settled on the northeast quarter of section thirty-two.

In 1808 David Foust settled where Adelphi now stands, and a few years after moved to Circleville. He built the old court house there. He finally returned to Salt Creek, and died here. He was the father of ten children. His son, Joseph, now nearly eighty years of age, lives in this township.

Jacob Foust came to Ohio in a very early day, as early as 1800, and lived in Salt Creek for a number of years, on section twenty-five, when he moved to Delaware county, seven miles above the village of Delaware. He finally settled near Cardington, Morrow (then Marion) county, where he died in 1842, his wife surviving him some three years.

Andrew Foust, now living at Tarlton, was the youngest of eleven children. He came to Pickaway county and learned the carpenter's trade, after which he married, in May, 1831, and settled on the line in Fairfield county, near where John H. Zaring now lives, west of Tarlton. About twenty years ago he removed to this township, locating in Tarlton, where he has since resided. He was elected to the State legislature in 1844, as a Democratic representative from Fairfield county, and re-elected in 1845. In 1850 he was elected State senator, serving one term. During his residence in Fairfield he served as justice of the peace twenty-one years, and in this township two terms. He is now seventy years of age.

In 1811, Martin, John, George, Samuel, Benjamin, Henry, Jonathan, and Jonas Dreisbach, brothers, came from Union county, Pennsylvania. The first three were married, and brought their families. Martin settled in Ross county, John in Pickaway township, and George in Salt Creek, on the banks of the Scippo. The other brothers married, and two—Samuel and Henry—settled in this county. George Dreisbach died on his original location in 1863. His son, William, occupies the old homestead, and is the only member of the family living in the State.

Peter Spyker and family, a brother-in-law of the Dreisbachs, came out with them in 1811. He settled on Salt creek, on the farm now owned by D. K. Wilson. Mrs. Darius Pierce, of Circleville, is the only member of the family now living.

Jacob Sayler, son of Jacob Sayler previously mentioned, came from Somerset county, Pennsylvania, during the war of 1812. He settled at Tarlton, on the same lot on which Christopher Myers had settled, and was one of the pioneer merchants of Tarlton. He was twice married, and became the father of sixteen children, of whom eight are yet living. Adam, the oldest son by the first wife, lives at Tarlton, and is the only member of the family living in the township. Jacob Sayler died in Vinton county, at the residence of his son Orlando, aged about ninety years.

Godfrey Creamer and family emigrated from Wittemberg, Germany, to the United States, in 1817. After living for three years on the High Banks, twelve miles below Chillicothe, Ohio, they came to Salt Creek. He changed his location several times, but finally purchased twenty acres and settled on Moccason creek, section eleven, having lived for nine years previous in Clear Creek township, Fairfield county. He resided on the Moccason thirteen years, when he sold out to his son, with whom he lived until his death, which occurred in May, 1860, in his eighty-third year.

Godfrey Creamer was a soldier under Napoleon Bonaparte for seven years, and participated in twenty-seven battles. The family suffered many hardships after their arrival in this country, their goods being sold for their passage on their arrival. There were eleven children, five of whom grew up and were married. Four are living—Joshua, the youngest, in this township. He married Amanda Whisler, June 4, 1844, and settled on Moccason creek, section eleven, where he lived for twenty years, when he moved to where he now lives, in section five.

Andrew Delong came from Schuylkill county, Pennsylvania, and arrived in Colerain township, Ross county, July 4, 1830, where his brother, Jacob Delong, then lived. The same fall he moved to Salt Creek and settled in section thirty-five, where his son, Isaac Delong, now lives. He died there in 1841, but his widow is still living in Colerain, having reached the age of ninety-five years on July 12, 1879. They had eleven children, six now living, namely, Mrs. Rebecca Roose (widow), in Tarlton; Isaac, who married, December 17, 1841, Catharine Haynes, of Salt Creek township, Hocking county, and has four children living and two dead; Mrs. Catharine Wiggins, in Colerain; Caroline, wife of Conrad Ready, in Lawrence, Kansas; Sarah, wife of Samuel Betzer, in Colerain; and Amelia, widow of Erastus Reynolds, in Hallsville, Colerain township. Mrs. Delong has in her possession a flint-lock double-barreled rifle, made in Berks county, Pennsylvania, in 1812.

George Riegel, with his family, consisting of his wife and seven children, emigrated to Ohio from Berks county, Pennsylvania, in 1832. He remained in this township for about eight months, and then bought land and settled in Fairfield county. Solomon, the third son, and now among the older residents of the township, married Mary M. Dunkel, in October, 1834, and for a few years lived on a part of his father's farm in Fairfield. He subsequently purchased a farm in Hancock county, and was engaged in farming, milling, and dealing in stock for nine or ten years. In 1859 he moved to Salt Creek, and located where his son, Solomon D., now lives. He resided there about fifteen years, when, after a few months' residence in Circleville, he took up his abode where he now lives. Mr. Riegel has done much for the material improvement of the township, having built a large number of excellent dwellings and other buildings, and been instrumental in the construction of the pikes in this portion of the county.

Peter Frederick, now living with his son William, in this township, was born August 6, 1801. His father, Jacob Frederick, was a pioneer of Greene township, Ross county, where he settled in 1804, removing from Buffalo Alley, Pennsylvania. Peter Frederick married, April 11, 1825, Catharine Zimmerman, who died September 1, 1867. He has two children living and two dead.

EARLY SCHOOLS.

In regard to the early schools of Salt Creek, the writer has been unable to obtain exact information. A school-house, probably the first in the township, was built in 1803 or 1804, on the southwest quarter of section twenty-four. About the same time, in Tarlton, a rude log structure was erected near the site of the present Methodist Episcopal church. The first term of school in this house was kept by a man by the name of Mitchell.

The first school in the southwest part of the township was kept in a log school-house, on the farm of Joseph Schoots, in section thirty-three. One of the early teachers there was Timothy Beach.

CHURCH HISTORY.

The first religious society organized in the township was probably the Baptist church, in the southwest part, formed as early as 1805. It was called Salt Creek Baptist church until 1812, when, the Lemuel church uniting with it, the name of Union was substituted. The meetings of the society were at first held at the dwellings of the members, but a meeting-house was soon after built on section twenty-eight. It was constructed of hickory logs, and is now generally referred to as the "old hickory church."

The brick church at "prairie view" was erected in 1841 or 1842, at a cost of about two thousand dollars. Rev. Benjamin Case was the first pastor of the society, and is supposed to have organized it.

A German Reformed church was organized at Tarlton about the year 1807, by the Rev. George Wise, of Lancaster, Ohio. About the same time a German Lutheran society was formed, and the two societies shortly afterwards united in the erection of a log meeting-house, which stood on the lot now occupied by the dwelling of Mrs. Whitesel. About 1830 they put up a log-and-frame building where the frame church of the German Lutherans now stands, which was built by the latter society about 1860, the German Reformed society having previously erected the brick church now owned by the Cumberland Presbyterians. The German Reformed society continued to prosper until sundry innovations upon established usage were introduced into the church by the pastor, Rev. Samuel Jacobs, who finally joined the Cumberland Presbyterians, taking most of his church with him. Litigation followed over the question of ownership of the church property, which resulted in favor of the new organization, and the remnant of the original society built a frame house in the southeast part of the village. The building was recently sold at sheriff's sale, to satisfy a claim which was contracted at the time of its erection, and the society has disbanded.

The Cumberland Presbyterians maintain an organization, but have no service at the present time.

The Old School Presbyterians had an organization at Tarlton at an early period of the settlement, which existed for a number of years.

Rev. Jacob Leist, a Lutheran clergyman, was one of the earliest of the pioneer preachers of this region. He came to Salt Creek in the early settlement of the township, being then a young man. He began preaching soon after his arrival, and continued in the ministry for a great many years. He preached his first sermon here in the old log meeting-house at Tarlton. The occasion brought out quite a large congregation, all anxious to see and hear the new preacher. When he entered the house his youthful appearance excited a good deal of surprise and some unfavorable comment among the audience. He proved, however, a valuable accession to the settlement, and, during the long period of his ministry, was highly esteemed for his moral worth. He married Elizabeth, daughter of Judge Shoemaker, and fixed his residence where the little hamlet of Leistville now stands, residing there until his death.

JERUSALEM CHURCH,

a German Reformed Lutheran society, was organized by Revs. Messrs. Wise and Leist, about the year 1820. A school-house then stood where the burying ground now is, in the northeast corner of section twenty-six, and in it the church held their services until 1831, when a brick house of worship was built. The present neat brick church was erected in 1877, and cost three thousand dollars. Rev. Henry King and Rev. Jacob Leist—the former a Reformed minister and the latter a Lutheran—preached for the church for upwards of twenty-five years. The present preachers are Austin Henry and David Wiseman.

The Sabbath-school of this church is in a flourishing condition, having about one hundred scholars. William Markle is the superintendent.

In 1819 or 1820, members of the German Reformed and Lutheran denominations residing in the western part of the township, built a log meeting-house, and held meetings there for a number of years, although no organization was ever effected. A United Brethren society was subsequently formed there, and occupied the house for some years, when it disbanded, and the meeting-house finally burned down.

THE DREISBACH UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH was organized at the house of George Dreisbach (where his son, William Dreisbach, now lives), about the year 1820. The members were George Dreisbach and wife, Henry Dreisbach and wife, John Dreisbach, Elizabeth Whetsel, and a few others, whose names are now forgotten. This appointment was, and is still, on the Pickaway circuit, which originally embraced some thirty appointments, but now has only four. The regular services of the class were held at the dwelling of George Dreisbach, every other Sabbath, until 1835, when the present brick church was erected, which is locacated on the north line of the township. Revs. Louis Kramer, Jacob Antrim, John Russell, Joseph Hoffman, Jacob Daup, —— Benedum, and Henry Kumler, were among the early preachers on this circuit. The membership of the church is now about twenty, George W. Devers, of Tarlton, being the pastor.

THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH AT TARLTON.

The first meetings of the Methodists in Salt Creek were held at a very early date, at the house of Abraham Monett. They kept up their meetings a number of years, and probably formed a class.

The date of the organization of the class at Tarlton cannot be stated, but it was in existence as early as 1825. The circuit was then Adelphi circuit, Chillicothe district. It embraced twenty appointments, in Pickaway, Vinton, Ross, Fairfield, and Hocking counties. In 1841 Tarlton circuit was formed, from Adelphi, with seven appointments—Tarlton and Haller's chapels being the only two in this county. In 1870 South Perry circuit was taken off from Tarlton, leaving the latter with the following appointments: Tarlton, Hopewell, Amanda, and Oakland—the last three in Fairfield county.

The church at Tarlton first held their meetings in a log school-house, which stood just south of where the present church building stands. It was built soon after the class was formed, and was used until 1840, when the present house was erected.

The following is a list of the circuit preachers who have officiated at this point, in the order named, namely: On the Adelphi circuit—E. H. Field, George C. Crum, William Westlake, Philip Nation, John Stuart, John W. White, John Stuart, Wesley Roe, Benjamin Ellis, David Lewis, Benjamin Ellis, J. B. Austin, Charles C. Lybrand, Richard Daughty, James Parsons, and Richard Daughty.

The first preacher, after the formation of the Tarlton circuit, was Daniel Poe. There are several curious circumstances in his life worthy of mention. He was, in early life, a missionary among the Indians on the western frontier, and while there met the young lady (also engaged in mission work) who subsequently became his wife. Poe was a man of stalwart frame, standing six feet and two inches in his stockings, and his wife was nearly his equal in stature. He was a twin child, and so was she, and, lastly, they died within fifteen minutes of each other, and both are buried in one grave. Poe was on the circuit one year, when he went to Texas as a missionary, and died there two years afterwards. Mr. Poe was followed by Messrs. James Laws, Alexander Morrow, Joseph Morris, David H. Sargent, John M. Clark, Andrew Carrol, E. T. Webster, John W. Steele, McCutcheon, Gortner, Fink, Howard, Bennett, Anderson, Kirkman, G. G. West, L. Whitehead, John T. Miller, Isaac F. King, Benjamin Ellis, John T. Miller, Andrew Carrol, Benjamin Ellis, Thomas R. Taylor, W. C. Filler, B. Wolfe, Ross, Sibley, Weir, Ebright, Hall, Hanawalt, Thomas Hall, Pickets, McClintock, T. S. Thurston, Isaac Mackey, and Mr. Berry, the present minister.

The presiding elders have been John Collins, Augustus Eddy, John Ferree, Joseph M. Trimble, David Whitcomb, Robert O. Spencer, John M. Clark, —— Jamison, Z. Connell, D. Mather, John W. White, B. Spahr, W. T. Harvey, and Thomas Hall.

The church has, at present, a membership of about one hundred and twenty, and a Sunday-school of about one hundred and thirty, including officers and teachers.

ENGLISH EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH,

at Tarlton, was formed by Rev. Nathan B. Little, in the year 1835, with about thirty members. The society occupied the Old School Presbyterian church building as a place of worship until 1841, when they erected a house of their own, at Tarlton, which they have since used. Rev. Mr. Little was the first pastor of the church, and has been succeeded, respectively, by Revs. Messrs. Bishop, Weddell, Kleim, Reck, Imhoff, Myers, Hill, Sprecher, Miller, Hower, and Hershiser, whose term of service has not at this writing expired. The church has a membership of about sixty, and a Sabbath-school with an attendance of about fifty. The officers are: William N. Julian and Joseph Hedges, trustees; Joseph Boyer and Joseph Hedges, elders; James Ballard and James H. Hedges, deacons; James H. Hedges, treasurer.

THE UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH,

at Tarlton, was organized in 1840, or about that time, by Revs. Lewis Ambrows and Joshua Montgomery, and consisted of eight members, as follows: John Boysel and wife, Jacob Larick and wife, Israel Zimmerman, Mahala Kinser, and two others, whose names cannot now be remembered. The building was erected two or three years after, and stands just north of the county line. Before the erection of the church, the society held its services at the house of Mr. Larick. The church was formerly quite prosperous, the membership numbering at one time seventy-three. There are now only about half a dozen members. Rev. George Devers is the pastor, and John Boysel is leader.

THE OAK GROVE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH

came into being in the year 1858, by a union of the Warren school-house class and that at Haller's chapel. The church building was put up that summer, and dedicated the same fall by Rev. Mr. Felton. The church is, at present, without a regular pastor, but is supplied with preaching by the Methodist clergyman from Adelphi. Mrs. Nancy Steele is superintendent of the Sunday-school, which numbers fifty scholars.

THE CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH,

at Prairie View, was organized by Rev. Archibald Brice, at the Oak Grove Methodist Episcopal church, in February, 1859, and consisted of ten or eleven members. Until the completion of their house of worship, in the fall of 1860, the services of the society were held in the frame school-house, which stood where the brick one now does, west of the Oak Grove church. The present pastor, Rev. Michael Dent, has officiated in that capacity since the church building was erected, though Mr. Brice has preached occasionally in the meantime.

In 1877 a similar society was formed at Laurelville, in Hocking county, by the members of this church, resident in that vicinity, which diminished the church to about one-half its previous membership. The officers of the church are: William Frederick and Ovid Lutz, elders; Lewis Lecher and Emory Anderson, deacons. A Sabbath-school has existed since the organization of the church, and the first few years was very flourishing. Thomas Harmon is the present superintendent.

THE EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION,

at Pleasant View, was formed by Rev. S. E. Rife, in January, 1875, and consisted of about twenty members. The building was erected the following summer. Rev. Mr. Rife was the first pastor, since whom Revs. Messrs. Hankey, Wingard, Ellenberger, Munn, Rineholt, and Evans have officiated. The leaders are W. B. Miesse and James Wilkins; steward, Moses Imler; trustees, Imler, Wilkins, Friese, Heffner, and Meisse. There has been a Sabbath-school since the organization of the church, with the exception of the last winter. William White is the present superintendent.

Tarlton lodge No. 218, I. O. O. F., was organized March 16, 1853. The first officers were: J. W. Steele, N. G.; J. Metzler, V. G.; Sylvester V. Tiror, secretary; Archibald Lybrand, treasurer. The present officers are: Allen Dreisbach, N. G.; J. B. Judy, V. G.; S. Defenbach, secretary: John H. Zaring, treasurer.

The first person buried in the Stumpf burying-ground was Jane Defenbaugh, who died in October, 1804. She and her mother came out from Pennsylvania soon after Adam Defenbaugh, a brother of Jane, settled at Laurelville. She sickened and died soon after her arrival. Her brother and Jacob Strouse cut down a cherry tree, and sawed out a few boards, with which Samuel Spangler made a rude coffin for the deceased girl. The ground for her burial was donated by George Dunkel.

FIRST FRAME BUILDING.

The first frame building erected in the township was the dwelling of John Shoemaker, in Tarlton, now standing in the southwest part of the village, but originally near the location of the present residence of Mr. Ballard. The raising of the frame of the building was an event of such importance as to call out all the men for miles around.

MILLS.

The first saw-mill in Salt Creek township was built by John Lutz, on Moccason creek, in section thirteen. The earliest on Salt creek were those of Dunkel and Stumpf, near Adelphi, and the Reichelderfers' (John and Christian), near the present residence of Mr. Hosler.

The early settlers obtained their grinding at Crouse's mill, in the vicinity of Chillicothe. The mill was a small affair, and considerable time would be consumed in making a trip to mill. At a later date the settlers got their grist ground at Van Gundy's mill, on the Kinnickkinnick.

A grist-mill, in this township, was built by Jacob Strous, on Salt creek, in 1820, where the mill of David H. Strous now stands. The original building now stands a few rods west of its former location, and is used by Mr. Strous as a general workshop. The present grist-mill was erected by Jacob Strous, in 1831. The saw-mill was built in 1825, and the carding machine in 1844. These works are all run by water power.

The following is contributed by William W. Julian, of Tarlton:

In the year 1810 or 1811 Abraham Barnet erected a saw-mill on Salt creek, at Tarlton. This saw-mill was of simple design, being driven by the common flutter wheel, and was thus run until about the year 1815. The property was then purchased by George Wolf, who improved the mill by the addition of a tread-wheel, and the introduction of a shingle machine, capable of manufacturing five hundred shingles per hour. Mr. Wolf being a man of considerable enterprise, and having had some success, concluded to build a flouring mill, in addition to the saw-mill, and, in due time, the flouring mill was built, and in running order. But now the enterprising pioneer discovered that the new addition necessitated additional propelling power, as the tread-wheel and water power, combined, was insufficient to run the works at all seasons of the year; and, to obviate this difficulty, resort was had to a very novel and hazardous experiment with steam power, which, in the end, proved disastrous. To carry out this new design, Wolf associated with him, in business, Timothy and Benjamin Beach, who were the principal designers of the steam works to be added. The preliminaries being settled, the steam works were at once built, but were soon to decay. An accurate description of the steam works cannot now be given, there being no person now living whose recollection is clear enough to give the requisite facts concerning them; nevertheless, from the best information now attainable, the steam design must have been about as follows: there being an over-shot wheel attached to the flouring mill, the design was to return the water from below the wheel to the forebay, in times of low water, by means of steam power; and, to accomplish this object, a stout box, or water receptacle, was placed low under the water-wheel. This box was divided into three parts or divisions; two of these separate parts had pistons working into them. Into the third division of the box was inserted the conductor, to convey the water to the forebay, above. This conductor was of peculiar construction, and made in the following manner: a sycamore log, of some twenty inches in diameter, and of proper length, was secured; a hole was bored through the center, the log then set on end, and fire set to burning, until the hole was enlarged to about eight inches diameter. This hollow log was then fitted into the third division of the water box (as above stated), which contained suitable valves for receiving and holding the water. Steam was conducted from the boiler into the first two divisions of the box having the piston heads. Arrangements had been made to shift the steam, so that, when one piston was forced down, the other would rise and fill with water from below—the downward piston forcing the water up the hollow log, and so on. All things being now ready, steam was turned on, but, to the surprise of the projectors, no water appeared above. The disappointment did not discourage these enterprising spirits, who persevered until the temperature of the steam receptacles was raised so as not to condense the steam suddenly; after which they had the gratification of seeing a small amount of water flow into the forebay from the hollow log. The proprietors now, for the first time, clearly discovered their mistake, and the steam enterprise was abandoned. These attempts at steam power, in all probability, were made during the year 1830–31. From this date to 1865, this property passed through several hands, in the following order: George Wilbern, Jacob Laric, William Brown, Samuel Bitler, Kilion H. Dunkel, and Albert Wolf, who, in the year 1865, placed the engine which is now in the mill, and is still in good running order. Wolf conveyed the property to John Boysel, Boysel to William Dreisbach & Co., Dreisbach to present owners, Buechler & Kramer.

The Tarlton steam saw-mill was built in the year 1849, by a joint-stock company. The original design was what is known as a muley mill. This mill has passed through many hands, and many changes have been made. The mill is now what is known as a stationary circular mill. The original engine, which was built by Gilbert Deval, of Lancaster, Ohio, is still in the mill, and in good order.

POST-OFFICE.

The first post-office in the township was established at Tarlton, some time prior to the war of 1812. The postmaster was Samuel Lybrand, who kept the office in his dwelling, the house now occupied by Adam Kramer. The post-office route was from Chillicothe to Zanesville, and Israel Wheeler was the earliest carrier of the mail from Chillicothe to Tarlton whose name can now be remembered. Wheeler was drowned while fording Salt creek, on horseback, in the performance of his duties.

Adam Nye succeeded Lybrand, according to the best recollection of the oldest residents, and held the position until Jackson was elected, when the new departure in civil service, based upon the "to-the-victors-belong-the-spoils'" system was inaugurated. Nye had the office in his tavern.

Squire George W. Magee was the next postmaster, keeping the office in the house now occupied by widow Bond. After serving five or six years, he was succeeded by his son, James, who continued in the position for a couple of years. Since the younger Magee, the following named individuals have successively officiated as postmaster of the Tarlton office, viz.: Henry S. Creal, Otis Ballard, F. W. Nye, Joel Todd, Samuel Karshner, N. A. Davison, E. D. Norton, James C. Creager, and William C. Roberts, the present incumbent.

There are now also post-offices at Leistville and Stringtown, of which G. W. Corn and William Crites are the respective postmasters.

In the apportionment of justices of the peace, April 6, 1810, Salt Creek had two, viz.: Jacob Lutz and William Drury. By act of the legislature, passed March 7, 1843, that part of Adelphi in Salt Creek township was attached to Ross county. The early records of the township have been lost, and we are unable to give the names of the first township officers. The present township officers are as follows: Allen S. Mowery, clerk; William H. Mowery, Willison B. Miesse, Joseph Boyer, trustees; John F. Mowery, treasurer; Henry North, assessor; S. G. Morgan and A. C. Thomas, constables.

PHYSICIANS.

The earliest doctors who practiced in the township came from Chillicothe and Lancaster. The first doctor who resided within the township was a Dr. Waldo, of whom we can learn nothing further than his name.

In 1817, Dr. Otis Ballard settled at Tarlton, arriving from Massachusetts. He soon after began the practice of his profession, and continued with success until about 1842, when he was compelled, on account of poor health, to discontinue it. He married the widow of John Shoemaker, and lived where Wiley's tavern now stands. A biographical sketch of Dr. Ballard is given elsewhere.

The present physicians are Dr. J. J. Baker and Dr. J. R. Kelch. The former derived his medical education at Ohio college, Cincinnati; practiced ten years in Muskingum county, and then came to Tarlton, where he is now engaged in the practice of his profession.

Dr. Kelch graduated at Starling medical college, Columbus, in the session of 1863–4, having practiced nine years previously. He was first assistant surgeon in the One Hundred and Fifty-first Ohio volunteer infantry during a part of the rebellion, and for a few months of the war was at Camp Chase, acting as assistant surgeon United States army. In August, 1865, he located in Tarlton, where he has since continued in practice.

TARLTON.

is situated on Salt creek, on the north line of the township, and contains about five hundred inhabitants. It was laid out about the year 1801, by Benjamin Newell, and was first called Newellstown. The log cabin of Christopher Myers, which stood on the brow of the hill, just west of Mr. Ballard's, was the first building erected in the place. The first store was opened by a man by the name of McLane, whose location was on the lot now occupied by Kimes Brothers. Jacob Sayler kept the next store on the same lot on which the cabin of Myers stood. Samuel Lybrand, William and Stephen Julian, and Singleton & Carr, were also early traders here.

The first tavern was kept by John Shoemaker, in his log dwelling, where Wiley's hotel now stands. A man by the name of Markwood kept an early tavern in the east end of the village. Adam J. Nye settled at Tarlton soon after the close of the war of 1812, and for many years kept the tavern now conducted by Hedges. He was also in trade here, for many years. The road through Tarlton was once the principal route from Kentucky to the east, and General Jackson and Henry Clay used to stop there on their way to the seat of government.

There are, at the present time, in Tarlton, six churches, one union school, three general stores, four groceries, one drug store, one tin shop, two shoemakers, two tanneries, one grist-mill and saw-mill, four blacksmith shops, two taverns, three millinery shops, one undertaker's shop, one harness shop and one meat market. The large number of churches in the place sufficiently attests its moral character.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

OTIS BALLARD, M. D.

Tarlton received a valuable acquisition to its list of substantial, useful men, in the person of Dr. Otis Ballard. For whatever benefit his residence in their midst conferred upon the people of the village, and of Salt Creek township, they were indebted to one of those so-called accidents of fate, which, at the time of their occurrence, are regarded as unimportant vexations.

Dr. Ballard was born at Charlemont, Massachusetts, October 10, 1792, and there passed the years of his boyhood and early manhood. He studied medicine with Dr. Bryant, the father of the famous poet, William Cullen Bryant, and when twenty-one years of age, started for the great unknown west to find a place where he could establish himself in his profession. He left home in March, 1817, and upon the fourth of July, arrived at the place which he afterwards made his home. It had not been his intention to go so far west, but destiny had so decreed, or chance decided. He was unable to find his brother, whom he had expected to meet in New York

State, and so pushed on into Ohio, then almost a wilderness. He intended to locate then in Zanesville, but, again, circumstances interfered. There was no opening there for a young physician. The only thing that remained for him to do, was to journey on until he found a place where his professional services were needed. Such a place was Tarlton. He immediately began there the practice of medicine. It was in a small way, to be sure; but it was a beginning, and as such, was welcomed. The professional services of the young pioneer physician were for sometime only called into requisition in a few families in the neighborhood, but as he became better acquainted, and favorable reports of his understanding and skill went forth, his ride became constantly larger, and his practice finally became as extensive as he could wish for; it fully occupied his time. This practice was continued unbroken by any extended absences until as late as 1842, when the doctor experienced a slight decline of health, which became gradually more severe, until he had violent hemorrhage of the lungs, which threatened to destroy his life. He recovered complete health, however, and retained it almost unimpaired until within a short time preceding his death.

Other occupations than the practice of medicine claimed Dr. Ballard's attention. He had a farm of two hundred and fifty acres in Tarlton, and a larger one in Fairfield, for grazing purposes, and engaged in various business projects of mercantile and other nature, having active partners, who attended to the details. He raised much fine stock, and carried on an extensive business in buying and selling. In his later years he was one of the directors of the Hocking Valley bank of Lancaster. Beside his professional duties and the attention given to farming and business interests he—being a man of large public spirit—devoted much time and effort to the furtherance of such measures as were proposed from time to time for the moral or material advancement of the community. When any project of improvement was advanced, he gave it warm support. He was one of the most zealous of those who endeavored to effect some means of railroad communication between Tarlton and neighboring centers of trade, that the farmers might have an advantageous outlet for the products of the soil, always so well tilled.

Dr. Ballard was a devotedly religious man, and was one of the founders of the English Lutheran church, in Tarlton, of which he was, during the remainder of his life, a prominent member and liberal supporter.

Politically, he was a Whig, and then a Republican, and strong union man during the war. Although not a politician, he was a close observer of political action, and very positive in his convictions.

Dr. Ballard's strong characteristics were energy, the habit of doing with his might, and to his best ability, whatever he undertook, good judgment, strong common sense, strict integrity of purpose, and a generous disposition. He was not an educated man, in the commonly accepted meaning of that term, but he was a close observer, was well-read, and had a good knowledge of men and affairs.

Dr. Ballard died November 11, 1878, at the age of eighty-six years, one month and one day, and his death caused a general and wide-spread feeling of sorrow, and bereavement. His sickness was brief, and not excessively painful, and the end was approached in perfect peace, and n a manner fitting the character of the life that was closed.

In 1823, the doctor took as his wife Elizabeth, widow of John Shoemaker, formerly Miss Huy, of Berks county, Pennsylvania, and born in 1789. She died February 14, 1863, fifteen years before her husband. The only children of this pair were James and William H., both now living, and residing in Tarlton, upon the site of their father's home. James Ballard was born June 12, 1826. His boyhood was passed at home, and when he arrived at the age at which he needed more advanced instruction than could be there had, his father sent him to Hudson to college. He remained there one year, and then went to Williams' college, at Williamstown, Massachusetts, where he graduated with the class of '50. His subsequent life has been passed in Tarlton, where he has heen engaged in farming and other avocations. He married, August 28, 1860, Helen F. Dwinell, of Brattleboro, Vermont, by whom he has four children, viz.: Mary E., Helen E., James Otis and Edward S. Mr. Ballard's present residence was built in the Centennial year. His brother, William H. Ballard, was born June 25, 1829. He is a farmer by occupation.

SAMUEL LUTZ.

To live ninety years on earth is the lot of very few human beings. To find one's self, at ninety, with all one's physical senses and mental faculties unimpaired, and with an almost youthful vigor, both of body and mind, is an occurrence so rare and exceptional as properly to be considered a phenomenon. Yet this, without exaggeration, is the lot of Samuel Lutz. And the ninety years which he has lived, and for seventy-five of which he has been an interested student and observer of human affairs, have been among the most eventful the world has ever seen. It is doubtful if, even in the civil and political history of the world, any previous era of equal length has been marked by so many important changes as those which have characterized the past ninety years. And, certain it is, that the discoveries and inventions in science and the useful arts, which have been made during the same period, exceed in number and magnitude those of any previous century. A bare enumeration of the great historical events and scientific discoveries which have passed under Mr. Lutz's careful, intelligent and studious observation, would occupy more space in these pages than that which the limits of our space necessarily prescribe for his biography.

Samuel Lutz was born March 13, 1789, in Upper Saucon township, Northumberland county, Pennsylvania. His parents were Jacob and Elizabeth (Demuth) Lutz, his mother being a native of Bucks county, and his father of Newton. They were married about the year 1787. His grandfather, Ulrich Lutz (also a native of Pennsylvania), died about 1790; his great-grandfather (and first-known ancestor) emigrated from Germany to the same German-American State, near the year 1730. Notwithstanding their remote connection with the Father-land, the family have persevered in the use of the German language, down to the present generation.

At a family re-union held at the residence of Samuel Lutz, in Salt Creek township, October 15, 1877, to commemorate the seventy-fifth anniversary of the settlement of the family in that locality, John A. Lutz, one of the sons of Samuel Lutz, the only lawyer and professional writer thus far produced by the family, thus spoke of the family name and first-known progenitor:

"The name seems to be purely arbitrary, without any known significance, and, possibly, may have been obtained from the place of nativity, as there is a town in Germany called Lutzen [Luetzen, in German], noted in history as the place where the great battle was fought during the thirty years' war, in which the brave Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, was killed. The name being quite common, both in Germany and in this country, is doubtless of remote antiquity, dating back, perhaps, to the days of Herman, or even Julius Cæsar."

We would remind our friend Lutz, that there is a German provincial word, luetzel, meaning the same as the English adjective, "little," and doubtless only another form of that and the common German, leitel. Luetzel might easily have been contracted into luetz, and that transformed (by a slight change of spelling, frequently met with in German) into lutz—thus furnishing the family name. This etymology derives a singular plausibility from the diminutive size which is said to be a striking characteristic of the Lutzes.

He proceeds in the following pleasant vein:

Baron Von Lutz, the minister of education of Austria, may be a descendant of the same ancestor, and simply had the title of nobility cast upon him or his immediate ancestors, by some play of fortune, during some of the revolutions and political upheavals, which have taken place in Germany, in the last few centuries; for the venerable dame is somewhat capricious in the bestowment of her favors, and has been known to make noblemen out of plowmen. But if he is of the same ancestry, his lineage is so remote that, like a distant planet, the light reflected by him does not affect us in the least, either for good or evil.

Tradition has it, and we have accepted it as true history, that about the year 1730, a little old bachelor, by the name of Michael Lutz, came from Germany and settled in Northampton county, Pennsylvania. It is not known what part of Germany he came from, and it has been suggested that, herhaps, he was a natural son, and was silent as to his ancestry, or had not sense enough to tell where he came from.

He soon found that a different state of things obtained in this country. In the densely populated States of Germany, he might have been permitted to remain an old bachelor, and to waste his sweetness on the desert air; but here, where immense forests were to be cleared and the land brought into cultivation, towns and cities to be built, the increase of population was a very important item in political economy; and the policy of the colonies was not unlike that of Brigham Young—to utilize all propagating elements. He was admonished that no such moral and social delinquincy as bachelorhood could be tolerated. For some reason, he seemed to be unsuccessful in his efforts to obtain a wife, and therefore the elders of the church to which he belonged came to his relief, either from motives of brotherly kindness, or of public policy, and soon procured for him a wife. The issue of this union was two sons, and perhaps one or two daughters.

He purchased a small tract of land in Northampton county, on the south side of the Lehigh river, and not far from its mouth, upon which he lived the remainder of his days, and which is said to be still owned by one of his descendants. Of his history, only these few fragments have escaped oblivion. What became of his daughters, if they, or either of them, lived to years of maturity, and left any children, we do not know. His elder son was named Benedict, and the younger Ulrich. Upon the death of the father, Benedict inherited, by laws which obtained in Pennsylvania, twice as much of his father's estate as Ulrich; and although the estate was small, there seems to have been enough to create a coldness between the brothers; and in consequence of this, the families separated, and but little intercourse passed between them.

Benedict Lutz lived to a great age, and died about the year 1818, in Pennsylvania. Some of his descendants are still living in Pennsylvania, but further than this we have no knowledge of them.

Ulrich Lutz married Elizabeth Dice, about the year 1760. Her parents came from Dupont, Germany, and she possessed considerable native intellect, with a liberal endowment of common sense, and the improvement in intellect which the family exhibited subsequent to this, was doubtless inherited from her. Though herself of medium stature, she was descended from a family noted for their size. Two of her uncles, about seven feet in height, served in Frederick William of Prussia's celebrated regiment of giants. Though most of us are mere pigmies in stature, it would seem we have some of the blood of the giants in our veins. They lived in Springfield township, Bucks county, Pennsylvania, till about the year 1790, when they, with their sons and families, moved to Shamokin Valley, Northumberland county, where Ulrich Lutz died, the same year.

In 1794 Jacob Lutz, the father of Samuel Lutz, moved from Shamokin valley, Northumberland county, Pennsylvania, to Buffalo valley, a beautiful and fertile portion of the same county. Here he resided until September, 1802, when, with his wife, five sons and his mother, he emigrated to Ohio, and, on the fifteenth day of the same month, settled on the premises where his son, Samuel Lutz, now resides.

His sons were Samuel, Jacob D., John D., Joseph, and Peter. The last two died in their boyhood; the other three grew up to manhood, and, being trained to the occupation of farming, became leading farmers of this county. There were then no public schools in this State, but their father, appreciating the importance of an education, provided his sons with books, and encouraged them to study at home; and, in this way, they acquired a good practical education.

Samuel Lutz married Elizabeth Fetherolf on the fifteenth day of October, 1811. His father set off to him one hundred and eighty-five acres of land, from the west side of his home tract, as a part of his patrimony. Upon this he erected a cabin to live in, near the site of his present fine residence, and commenced the work of felling the native forest and bringing the land under cultivation. This was no easy task at that day, for there was very little money in circulation, and hired labor was scarce; and the following year our country became involved in a war with Great Britain, and many of the able-bodied men of the new settlement were called to the defence of the frontier, which made it still more difficult to obtain hired labor. He served, himself, a short campaign, under the general call, and he was once drafted for a thirty-days' term, for which he furnished a substitute. The financial depression, which followed the war, produced stringent times and seriously checked every form of improvement in the new States. But, notwithstanding these obstacles, he toiled on, and, after ten years or more of hard labor and self-denial, he had the pleasure of seeing himself the owner of a well-improved farm, with fair prospects of enjoying some of its comforts. He became the owner, in the meantime, of other lands, and united with farming the business of raising and dealing in live stock, which subsequently became a prominent part of his business. He was one of the pioneers in driving live stock from the Scioto valley to the eastern cities, having driven cattle to Baltimore as early as the year 1822. The business in which he was engaged was well adapted to his habits and taste, and he took considerable interest in live stock, being never in better spirits than when he had his farms well stocked with cattle. Though his principal business was as just stated, yet he managed to devote considerable time to surveying, which was rather a favorite pursuit with him, and one in which he acquired quite a reputation for accuracy and skill. In most of the litigated cases of disputed lines or overlapping of surveys in the Virginia military district in this county, he was employed to make surveys, and his opinions had great weight with the court and jury in deciding them.

He has always been a man of decided political convictions, and the exercise of the right of suffrage, with him, has been a sacred duty; and it is doubtful whether he ever failed to vote at a political election. His first vote for president was cast for James Madison, and the last for General Hayes. In the days of the old Whig party he was one of its leaders in this county, and Henry Clay was his ideal of a statesman; and, perhaps, no one suffered more keenly than he the mortification of Clay's defeat for the presidency, in 1844. As a Whig, he was elected four times to represent this county in the legislature: the first time in 1830, and the last in 1849. He held many minor offices, and it can be said, with truth, that he performed the duties of every public trust, to which he was called, with fidelity. Upon the repeal of the Missouri compromise and the organization of the Republican party, he united with it, and became a radical anti-slavery man. He supported Lincoln for the presidency, and, when the South seceded, he was in favor of coercion, and he heartily endorsed the war measures of his administration. Though more than three-score-and-ten, when the Rebellion began, yet he took a deep interest in the efforts of the government to suppress it, and contributed money liberally to encourage enlistment. And, perhaps, no events which have occurred in his life were more joyful to him than the abolition of slavery and the final triumph of our arms in the suppression of the Rebellion.

Naturally inclined to be studious, in early life he provided himself with a good library, and his leisure moments were devoted to reading and to the study of mathematics, in which he became well versed.

Endowed with a good share of common sense and a generous nature, and having acquired extensive practical knowledge and a readiness with the pen, he made himself very useful to his neighbors and to the community in which he lives.

His manner of living was plain and simple, and his habits strictly temperate. His life, in some respects, has been a success, having raised a family of nine children and accumulated an estate of three thousand acres of land in Pickaway and Ross counties, which he distributed among his children as they arrived at full age or married.

On the fifteenth day of October, 1861, he and his wife had the pleasure of celebrating their golden wedding. His wife died on the fifteenth day of April, 1868, aged seventy-four years and four months. They had fourteen children, five of whom died in infancy. The remaining nine are still living, are married, and have families. The following are the names of these surviving children: Samuel G.; Harriet, wife of Robert Zurwehly; Catharine, wife of Ovid Lutz; Isaac; John A.; Lydia, wife of Peter Lutz; George; Mary, wife of Lewis R. Lesher; and Rachel, wife of Christopher Patrick. The oldest of these is sixty-two, and the youngest forty-two. The living descendants of Samuel Lutz are nine children, forty-nine grandchildren, and thirty-one great-grandchildren.

The Lutzes are a social race, and no interesting anniversary is allowed to pass without being celebrated by its appropriate family reunion. The last of these which has thus far been held, was on the thirteenth of March, 1879, the ninetieth anniversary of Samuel Lutz's birth. The orator of that occasion was Harry E. Lutz, a grandson of "our hero," and a son of John A. Lutz, the lawyer. If it be true, as we have heard it intimated, that he is ambitious to attain a high rank in the honored profession of journalism, we hazard nothing in predicting, that at no distant day, should his life and health be spared, he will fully realize his ambition. His address, on the occasion referred to, was so graceful and felicitious, and, withal, so fine a resume of the life and character of his honored grandfather, that we insert it here:

Nearly seventy-seven years ago two large, canvas-covered wagons plodded slowly westward from Pennsylvania. They passed over hills covered with the majestic trees of the forest; they journeyed through valleys richly mantled with flowers and grass; they crossed peaceful rivulets, angry torrents, and broad rivers. In one of those wagons there was a boy of thirteen summers. He was small in stature, but his bright gray eyes, which shone beneath a broad, high forehead, and lighted up a thoughtful-looking face, betokened a maturity of mind beyond his years. Untutored and inexperienced though he was, he had enough of natural force of mind to overcome the disadvantages of his position. This journey introduced him into a new life, for those wagons finally halted in the valley which has now been his home for seventy-seven years, and we meet to-day to celebrate the ninetieth birthday of that boy, who is now father, grandfather, and great-grandfather.

In 1807 he studied surveying at Chillicothe, under John G. Macan, and last year, after seventy-one years' service in that profession, he bought a new stock of instruments, expecting to begin life anew. In 1810 he surveyed the first public road which the Pickaway county commissioners ordered, and recently, after an interval of sixty-nine years, he was again appointed to resurvey a portion of that same road.

In 1811 he married Elizabeth Fetherolf, and they, together, shared the joys and the sorrows of life for a full half century.

In 1813 he served a few weeks in the militia, when Ohio received a fright from the British, which has only been equalled by that which John Morgan's raid occasioned in 1863. Although it is a family trait "to snore louder in bed than to shout in battle," our hero was not without glory in this his only campaign, for he confidently affirms that he fired off his gun once, which is more than many of his fellow warriors could say. And for this invaluable service his grateful country has pensioned him and given him one hundred and sixty acres of land. He afterwards served eighteen years as a justice of the peace, and represented his county in four sessions of the Ohio legislature.

Such is the record of his life, as it would be told to a stranger, but it is as inadequate as the boy's note of his daily experiences, that "he got up, washed, and went to bed." Behind this short account there is another, of days of joy and days of sorrow, of weeks of pain and weeks of pleasure, of years of gain and years of loss; and it is this account which truly shows the progress of his mind, but which we have not now time to trace.

We will, therefore, turn from the life to the character of our hero, and we shall find that, in the words of Emerson, the man towers head and shoulders above his deeds. The most prominent characteristic of his mind is force. He puts his whole soul into whatever he undertakes He is inclined to go over or through, rather than around. You have noticed an ant moving along on the earth, and have noticed that when it comes to an obstacle in its path it immediately turns aside. That is the way with some men; they change their course whenever anything opposes them, without trying to overcome it. But that is not the way with our hero. If it is possible, he will go over, or he will go through. Last summer, while in Adelphi, a man told me an anecdote which fully illustrates this trait in his character. About fifteen or twenty years ago, he was carrying one end of the chain, while surveying a field, and the man was carrying the other, when they came to a large pond. He urged our hero to make a triangle and estimate the distance across, but, with scowls, was answered: "Come on, come on; what are you about? Let's go through!" And in they plunged, up to their waists, and did go through. This same force of mind, however, makes him impatient of slow people, and causes him, also, to get into what has been called a "cast-iron sweat" at trifles.

WILLIAM DRESBACH.

THE GEO. DRESBACH FARM, (HOUSE BUILT IN 1824.) RES. OF WM. DRESBACH, SALT CREEK TP., PICKAWAY CO., O. (I.U.B.CHURCH)

Another trait of his character is inquisitiveness. He would walk a mile to find out a stranger's name, and think that he was amply repaid for his journey, though he should forget it the next day. He would have made a first-class newspaper reporter, if he had been taken when young, for he could get an interview with the greatest man on earth any day. While we were traveling, he wanted to know the name of every station which we passed, and asked me all sorts of questions about the things which he saw, and not unfrequently compelled me to expose my ignorance, and that was rather rough on my pride, you know. He invariably inquired the price of everything, from a boot-black's outfit to the steel bridge at St. Louis. Macaulay may have had a great memory, but I would be willing to wager a fortune that our hero has forgotten more than he knew. But, notwithstanding all the facts that have passed from his mind, his inquisitiveness has not been in vain, for he is well posted in history, and has a wide knowledge of current events,

Another characteristic of his mind is studiousness. He sometimes works at a problem during a whole day, which is something that neither love nor money could induce any of his descendants to do. Farm life has very little in it to stimulate one to hard study, but our hero overcame those discouragements, and is now well acquainted with the different branches of mathematics. But this special study did not so bias his mind that he neglected other things, for he has read much of the classical prose and poetry. Last summer, when in his ninetieth year, he bought a volume of poems, and since then has spent many of his leisure moments in reading those stirring Scottish lays of Robert Burns.

The chief characteristic of our hero's old age is vigor. To-day, were we to walk a race, he would outstrip one-half of us. Last summer, when strong men were lying under shade-trees, complaining of the heat—when people of all ages and conditions were being stricken down in the great cities—our hero surveyed a field in Ross county. When eighty-six years of age he climbed to the top of the Bunker Hill monument, and, a few days afterward, he went up the three hundred and sixty-four steps leading to the dome of the capitol at Washington. In 1876 he passed through that most wearisome of all ordeals, the attending of the Centennial. And that he fully appreciates his vigor, the following anecdote will show: Last summer, while we were at Cincinnati, he started to get into a stree-car before it should stop, but I kept him from doing so; and when we were seated in the car the driver passed through and remarked that he was too old a man to get on a car while it was in motion. At that a scowl came over our hero's face, like a thunder-cloud, and, throwing up his arms, he exclaimed, with withering contempt, "That's nothing; I could jump over the whole car." Then, seeing the general look of amused incredulity, he added, with emphasis, "Why, yes! why, yes!"

Whatever position in society our hero has attained, it has been entirely owing to his own efforts. No long line of ancestors has given him "title deeds to sloth." Others may boast of their descent, but he can glory in his ascent. As the Swedish epic says:

> "Boast not thy father's fame—'tis his alone,
> A bow that thou canst bend is scarce thine own.
> What can a buried glory be to thee?
> By its own force the river gains the sea."

We are accustomed to speak of beauty as an exclusive attribute of youth, but we forget that nature has thrown a mantle of grace over old age also. One is the beauty of action; the other, the beauty of repose. One is the beauty of a torrent dashing over rocky precipices; the other is the beauty of still waters, which unchangeably mirror the heavens. The bright green of a forest in spring is beautiful; but so, also, are the golden hues of the trees in autumn. The rosy-faced child and the white-haired old man, alike command our love. And we can think of nothing in which our hero has been more fortunate than in having all the venerableness of age, without its pains and its weaknesses.

I would call him great, not only because he has performed his part in the drama of life well, but also because I think that his natural talents are sufficiently above mediocrity to make him deserving of that name Great men do not always occupy high places, and the heroes whose names adorn the pages of history are outnumbered by heroes equally great, though unknown to fame. In the story of our family, one of the brightest pages will be the one which records the struggles and triumphs of Samuel Lutz.

The grandmother who accompanied Mr. Lutz to Ohio, died at the home of her son, June 23, 1818, aged about seventy-five. His father died September 4, 1824, at sixty-two, and his mother, January 27, 1842, at eighty-six.

Mr. Lutz was, as we have seen, about thirteen years of age when he left his native State, having received there only such education as the Pennsylvania common-schools afforded. After his arrival here, the only training which he received from a teacher was that obtained during the two months under Professor Macan, studying the elements of surveying. So that, even in his favorite science, it may properly be said that he was self-taught.

Always a man of scrupulous integrity, and a firm believer in christianity, it was not until about four years ago that he made an open profession of religion, and united with the Cumberland Presbyterian church, in his immediate neighborhood.

At the family re-union (the first one noticed above) held to commemorate the settlement of the Lutz family in Pickaway county, a large stone (after the good old Jewish fashion) was set up and dedicated, as a memento of the event. The formula for the dedication of this stone, pronounced by John A. Lutz at the close of his address on that occasion, will form an appropriate ending for this imperfect sketch. It is as follows:

"To perpetuate the memory of the interesting event which we to-day celebrate, and as a memorial of the divine goodness to us as a family, I now solemnly dedicate this simple monument, composed of a rude boulder, found upon these premises, and doubtless brought hither by the great northern drifts. Of itself it is a monument of the wonderful changes which have taken place on the surface of the earth in the geologic periods of the past, in the formation and preparation of these picturesque hills and beautiful fertile valleys for the abode, comfort, and happiness of man.

"May no rude hand deface it, nor unrestrained violence destroy it, but may it ever remain to remind the future generations of our children o the event we celebrate, and of the goodness of God to their ancestors. And to this let all the kindred say, Amen."

THE DREISBACH FAMILY.

The history of the Dreisbach family, which has, in Salt Creek township, a representative in William; in Circleville, Martin E. and Mrs. D. B. Wagner; in Pickaway, Isaac E.; and in Washington township, Edward Dreisbach, with numerous others, extends back to Martin Dreisbach, who was born in the year 1717, in the earldom of Witgenstein, Germany, and his wife (Anna Eve Hoffman), the daughter of a teacher, of Nausausiegen. They emigrated from the fatherland in 1746, to the United States, and located upon a farm in Lancaster county, Pennsylvania. They had four sons and two daughters—Jacob, Henry, John, Martin, Margaret, and Catharine.

Jacob, the eldest son, married Magdalene Buchs

(whose name, anglicized, is Books), and they had a family of thirteen children, eight of whom were sons, namely, Martin, John, George, Samuel, Benjamin, Henry, Jonathan, and Jonas, all of whom were early settlers in Ohio.

George, the third son, was born January 13, 1784, and his wife, whom he married in Northumberland (now Union) county, Pennsylvania, was born February 14, 1788. Her name was Catharine Betts. They were married January 10, 1809. Their children were, Mary, born November 27, 1809; Hannah, January 2, 1812; Elizabeth, June 17, 1814; William, September 21, 1817; Manuel, March 9, 1820; Sarah, January 16, 1823; George, August 18, 1825; Abner, August 16, 1828; and Solomon, August 16, 1831. All are now living except Mary, Sarah (Mrs. P. Brock), Manuel, and Solomon, the last named of whom died in infancy.

Only the eldest of the children was born in Pennsylvania, and the others in Ohio, their parents moving, in 1811, to this State. They stopped at first at Peter Spyker's, on Salt creek, south of Tarlton, but in a short time removed to the farm upon which their son, William, now resides, and which the elder Dreisbach bought of Mrs. Sayler, a widow. He cleared up this farm, endured the privations and toils, braved the dangers of pioneer life, and lived to enjoy the triumph of his labors. He was a soldier in the war of 1812, and underwent, in the service as well as at his home in the back woods, the viscissitudes of a frontier life in troublous times. He was a man of hardy constitution, and one of the most actively industrious of the large class of fearless, thrifty men, who prepared the way for the army of civilization and hewed out the rich inheritance that the present generation enjoy. He was noted for his uprightness of character, and his long life was, in all respects, an exemplary one. The church of the United Brethren was the religious institution which most closely embodied and exemplified his ideas, and he was for long years one of its most worthy members, as well as one of its best supporters. His long life of usefulness was brought to a close November 3, 1863—ten years after the decease of his wife.

The descendents of this pioneer pair were brought up at the farm home, accustomed to the labors incident to such life as they led, enjoying its simple pleasures, and taking advantage of the few opportunities afforded for improvement. Their educational facilities were limited; their chances for social recreations of seldom occurrence; but they had health—that best of all inheritances—the example of good lives before them, wholesome training, and the happiness—physical as well as mental—that wholesome labor and the right discharge of duty bring. They retained the traits of their parents, and matured into men and women of intrinsic worth, valuable to society and to the communities in which they dwell.

Hannah, the eldest living, married Philip Pierce, and resides near Bloomington, Illinois. Elizabeth is the wife of A. Medsker, of Fort Wayne, Indiana.

Manuel fell a victim to one of those terrible crimes of violence which grew out of the Rebellion. In 1863, he was living in Amanda township, Fairfield county, Ohio, and was a strong Union man. The drafting of men for the army by the National government was meditated, and in some sections had been begun. In his neighborhood, men were mustering, to prevent, by force of arms, its taking effect. Partisan feeling ran high, and violence was threatened in many localities. Manuel Dreisbach was not one of those who feared to speak his sentiments, and he did so, on several occasions, telling various individuals that they had no right to resist the orders of the government, and using his influence towards creating a law-abiding sentiment. It was feared by some of his friends that he would meet with violence, but he entertained no such apprehensions. One day, while engaged upon his farm in threshing grain, he went to the house to make some arrangement for dinner for the men in his employ, and there met a man who had worked for him several years, and with whom he was on the best of terms, so far as he knew. The man had a rifle, and with scarcely a word of warning, he raised it to his shoulder and fired. The ball took effect in Mr. Dreisbach's chest, but he did not fall. The assassin drew a revolver, to finish his bloody work, but was driven away by the threshers, who pursued him with pitchforks. He escaped. Mr. Dreisbach died in a few hours. John C. Corder, the hired man who fired the fatal shot, is to-day in the State's prison, serving out a sentence for murder, having escaped, by a narrow chance, the gallows. No cause was shown for the crime, other than that Mr. Dreisbach's utterances had been distasteful to some of the people in his neighborhood. It transpired, in the trial, that Corder had, sometime in previous years, committed a murder in Virginia; that he was a desperate character, whom a few dollars would induce to commit any crime. It was alleged that he was a hired assassin.

George Dreisbach is in Winona county, Minnesota, and has twice represented a constiuency in the legislature of that State. He married Mary Nichols. Abner is in Australia, and has been there since 1852. William lives in Salt Creek township, at the old homestead, an illustration of which is given on another page. He is a farmer by occupation, and one of the substantial, representative men of the county. Like his father, he was, in his early years, a Democrat, but since 1848 has not voted with that party, and, most of the time since its origin, he has been a supporter of the Republican party. He is a member of the United Brethren church. He was united in marriage, February 22, 1839, with Margaret, daughter of William and Jane Earnheart, of Washington township. They have had nine children: James A., Mary J., Martin, Harriet, George, Kate, Amanda, Jemima, Milton and Abner Scott, all of whom are living, except Martin and Jemima. The mother of these children died, May 28, 1863, and Mr. Dreisbach, August 1, 1869, was married to his second wife, Mrs. Louisa Ford (formerly Wheitsel), a daughter of Jacob and Polly Wheitsel, of Salt Creek township, with whom he is still living.

THE STROUS FAMILY.

Jacob Strous, born in Mifflin county, Pennsylvania, October 27, 1775, came to Ohio in the fall of 1799, performing the journey on foot. He remained with his brother-in-law, Adam Defenbaugh, six miles below Chillicothe, until 1802, when he settled near where the village of Laurelville, in Hocking county, now stands. He and Defenbaugh, who also settled there, put up, on Laurel creek, a short distance above the present mill, the first grist-mill in this region. The mill consisted simply of forked stakes driven into the ground and covered over with slabs.

In June, 1807, Jacob Strous was married to Mary Reichelderfer, and resided in the neighborhood of Laurelville until his death, which took place in 1845. He was an active and industrious pioneer, and did much for the improvement of his neighborhood.

He was the father of five children as follows: John, born January 28, 1808; Mary, born August 16, 1812; Samuel, born August 9, 1814; Elizabeth, born August 12, 1824; Allen, born December 26, 1826.

John married, November 13, 1832, Angeline Holderman, born February 22, 1811, and settled where his son, David, now lives. He followed milling and farming during his life, which was one of great industry and usefulness. He died July 23, 1875, and his wife, March 21, 1879.

Mary Strous married Hiram Flannagan. She is now a widow, and resides at Laurelville.

Samuel married Mary Swoyer, January 24, 1841, with whom he is now living in Salt Creek township, Pickaway county, Ohio. They have had five children, four of whom are living.

Elizabeth is the wife of William Webster, and resides in Pickaway township.

Allen Strous lives near Laurelville on the old homestead.

John Strous had eleven children, who are all now dead but three, and it may here be mentioned as a somewhat remarkable fact that, since 1850, there have occured at the house which is now the residence of the son, David H., and a view of which is elsewhere given, no less than fourteen funerals.

David H. Strous, one of the substantial and enterprising citizens of Salt Creek township, was the third child of John and Angeline Strous, and was born February 11, 1837. At the age of twenty-one he took an equal interest with his father in the mills and farm, and at the death of his father, succeeded to the entire ownership. Mr. Strous' career has been a very successful one; his energy, industry and good management being rewarded by the accumulation of a good property.

Mr. Strous was united in marriage, April 22, 1858, with Ann Bochart, and to them the following named children were born, viz.: Jane Almeda, born September 10, 1858, is now the wife of Levi Lutz, of Pickaway township; Susannah, born May 29, 1860, is now the wife of Byron Mowery, of Salt Creek township; John Elsy, born August 15, 1862—died August 26, 1863; Charles, born June 3, 1864—died September 9, 1865. Mrs. Strous, the mother of these children, died September 23, 1866. August 20, of the following year, Mr. Strous was again married, to Rebecca J. Dillon, who was born May 19, 1842. The result of this union is five children, as follows: Olive D., born August 18, 1868—died December 7, 1870; Frank D., born September 3, 1869; Eddie D., born March 3, 1872; Eva Grace, born October 16, 1874; Lizzie May, born April 8, 1876.

Just west of his residence, Mr. Strous has a beautiful grove of forest trees, containing about fourteen acres. The ground is very pleasantly situated, being higher than the surrounding land, and is skirted by Salt creek, on the bank of which is a beautiful mineral spring. A company has been formed who contemplate the improvement of the place next season as a pleasure resort.

JOHN MOWERY

was the youngest son of John Mowery, sr., and was born in Berks county, Pennsylvania, August 12, 1805. When five years of age, his parents emigrated to Ohio, and settled in Salt Creek, Pickaway county, where John F. Mowery now lives. His father made a purchase of land in sections eleven and fourteen, and erected his dwelling in the southwest corner of section eleven. He died about a year after his settlement.

John Mowery, the subject of this sketch, married, September 27, 1827, Rachel Dunkel, daughter of George Dunkel, and took up his residence on the homestead which became his at his father's death, and which he occupied during his life. He died July 2, 1876. He was a prominent member of the Lutheran church, in Tarlton, and was a man of strict integrity. He was an industrious, hard-working farmer, and possessing a sound judgment, he accumulated a good property, owning at the time of his death between six and seven hundred acres of land.

Mrs. Mowery died October 8, 1878, aged sixty-nine years, nine months and eighteen days.

There were thirteen children born to John and Rachel Mowery, three of whom died in infancy, and the dates of their birth are not recorded. The others are as follows: Leannah, born March 9, 1828, married for her first husband Venus Reichelderfer, by whom she had two children. She is now the wife of Elias Crites, and lives in Allen county, Ohio; Catharine, born February 27, 1831, died May 3, 1862, was the first wife of her sister Leannah's present husband; Mary, born September 18, 1833, became the wife of Jonathan J. Stout (now deceased), and resides in Washington township; Rachel, born May 27, 1836, married Amos Reichelderfer, and now resides near Bucyrus, Ohio; Susannah, born January 18, 1839, is the wife of Peter Myers, and now lives near Stoutsville, Fairfield county; William H., born June 13, 1845, married Leahan Fetherolf, and now resides in Salt Creek, near Tarlton; John F., born February 3, 1848, married Mary Wolf, and now resides on the old homestead; Louisa Jane, born November 23, 1850, is the wife of William H. Housell, of Tarlton; George D., born May 10, 1853, married Alice Courtright, and lives at Stringtown; Allen S., born April 9, 1857 (unmarried), lives with his brother George. The four brothers, above mentioned, wishing to perpetuate the memory of their parents, have secured the insertion of their portraits, with a view of the old home, in connection with the history of Salt Creek.

THE RIEGEL FAMILY, of Salt Creek township, has been as prominently identified with the improvement of that part of the county and territory adjoining, as any family who reside in the vicinity. Solomon Riegel, the father, is a man of great activity and industry, and ever since he came to the State has been engaged in some enterprise which has developed and enriched the neighborhoods of which he has been a resident. He was a native of Berks county, Pennsylvania, a son of George and Elizabeth Riegel, and was born April 10, 1811. He came to Salt Creek in 1832, induced by the favorable reports of the country, made by his brother, Jesse, and others. Two years later, October 31, 1834, he married Mary, daughter of George and Mary Dunkel, natives of Berks county, Pennsylvania, who removed to Ohio in 1802. She was born March 31, 1803. Soon after their marriage, the couple removed to Fairfield county, where they remained three and a half years. From thence they went to Hocking county, where Mr. Riegel worked for a time for his brother-in-law, George Dunkel; but Mr. Riegel securing, as a present from his father, a farm of one hundred acres in Fairfield county, removed to it, and there made the beginning of his successful and actively industrious life. After living here ten years, accumulating some property, and being generally well rewarded for his labors, Mr. Riegel bought Mr. Dunkel's saw-mill, woolen-factory and about two hundred and fifty acres of land, and engaged in business upon a large scale. He erected, at Laurelville, a hotel and other buildings, and contributed largely to the good appearance and prosperity of that village. Building has always been one of the most common exhibitions of Mr. Riegel's active creative nature, and one of his family, who has taken pains to sum up the results of his work in this line, states that within a few miles of the corners of Pickaway, Hocking and Ross counties, he has erected nineteen dwelling houses, and enough other buildings, mills, barns, etc., to make a total of one hundred. In this work he has usually been his own contractor, designer and superintendent, getting the timber from the woods manufacturing the lumber, and taking the stone from the quarry himself—that is, having it done under his supervision. He has also been an enterprising farmer, and has devoted considerable capital and time to milling, and to stock-raising and dealing. His various business ventures have, as a general thing, been thoroughly managed, and have paid well, so that he has accumulated a large property, although, like nearly all men, meeting with an occasional loss. It has been principally through his efforts that some of the best turnpikes of Pickaway county, especially the southeastern part, have been constructed.

Mr. Riegel is one of those men, who, not having the advantage of education, has still been eminently successful, through the possession of sound native sense, good judgment, a genius for work and strict integrity of character. And we may also add, that having achieved an independency for himself, he has materially benefitted the community of which he has been a valuable member, the neighborhood in which he has lived. He is a man of strong moral character, and, religiously, is a member of the Reformed church. It is a notable fact, too, that every one of his entire family, nine persons beside himself, are members of the same church. Another fact, rather curious, is mentioned by members of the family. There has never been a death within the circle. Not one family in a thousand of as many members, and aggregating as many years, has thus been spared the terrible visitor. The mother's name (Dunkel) is honored by the insertion of its initial in the name of each of her eight children. The first-born (February 21, 1836), George D., is now in Salt Creek township, and resides at his father's residence. He married, in 1859, Lovina Werner, of Allen county, Ohio, who died, September 18, 1872. He was engaged, for a number of years, in a general mercantile business, at Laurelville, beginning at the time the civil war commenced, and continuing until 1867. From 1870 to 1876 he conducted a large bus ness in produce and provisions, in Brooklyn, New York. Harvey D., the second son, born January 31, 1838, was, for a number of years, in California, but is, at present in the lumber and planing-mill business at Laurelville. He married Matilda Hedges, of Tarlton. Jane D., born August 6, 1840, married Andrew Defenbaugh, and resides at Cedarville, Fairfield county. Samuel D., born July 29, 1842, took for his first wife Mary Morris, of Washington township, and, after her death, married his present wife, Mary Owens. He resides in Salt Creek, and is a farmer and bee-keeper. He is publisher of the Bee Keeper's Instructor, and one of the best authorities in the country upon all matters pertaining to bee culture. Sarah Ann D., born June 28, 1843, is the wife of Wm. C. Markel, and resides in Salt Creek. Mary Elizabeth D., born September 2, 1845, is the wife of George H. Lutz. Solomon D., has his home in Salt Creek, a short distance from that of his father. He is one of the representative farmers of the township, and one of its most substantial, well-informed citizens. In addition to farming, he carries on the business of raising and selling stock, and is a large dealer. He married Mary A. Rush, daughter of John and Melinda Rush, of Greene township, Ross county. Emma C. D., is living in Greene township, Ross county, having married George M. Rush.

JOSEPH SHOEMAKER

was born in Tarlton, Salt Creek township, February 18, 1808. His parents, John and Elizabeth Shoemaker, of German descent, were natives of Berks county, Pennsylvania, where there is a little village called Shoemakerville, in honor of the family. They emigrated to Ohio in 1806. He was the first-born of three children—Isaac, two years his junior, who is still living, and Mary (afterwards the wife of Dr. William B. Hawkes, of Columbus), who died in 1837. The three children were left half-orphans, by the death of their estimable father, after only about ten years experience of pioneer life. Mrs. Shoemaker, the mother, subsequently married Dr. Otis Ballard.

Joseph Shoemaker, the subject of this brief biography, grew up in the little village of Tarlton, and, in addition to the practical education that farm life afforded, had the limited advantages of instruction at the best schools in this part of the country—the old academies of Circleville and Lancaster. He taught school for a short time, but, resolving to lead the life of a farmer, to which he had become accustomed by all his associations as a boy, he began in earnest the chosen avocation, which he has since pursued, and in which he has been eminently successful. In addition to his regular agricultural pursuit, Mr. Shoemaker has been engaged in raising cattle and in extensive stock raising. His father was an active, energetic pioneer, and the son has inherited many of his qualities. The farm upon which he resides, in Tarlton, is a portion of the large body of lands his father owned.

Mr. Shoemaker has had no ambition to hold office, and has not been, in any sense of the term, a politician, although a firm supporter of the principles he believed to be best, and taking a deep interest in public affairs. He was an "old line Whig" until the formation of the Republican party, since which time he has by ballot, and by the quiet influence that every man of worth unconsciously exerts, supported the men and measures of that great political majority.

He is one of the oldest and most prominent members of the Methodist Episcopal church, but his efforts for the promotion of good morals and right living have by no means been confined to the limits of that organization, either as the field in which or the medium through which they were made. All improvements, all plans for the advancement of the best interests of the community, have had, in Mr. Shoemaker, a warm friend and supporter. The temperance cause, in all the forms in which it has battled evil for the past forty years, has had his assistance. He has been among the foremost in securing good schools for the village in which he has passed the many years of his life. In short, he is a public-spirited, though modest, man, and the community has much to thank him for.

Mr. Shoemaker was married May 22, 1832, to Eliza Carpenter, a native of Vermont, who removed, with her parents, at an early day, to Athens, Ohio. Their children, four in number, were Otis B., Cynthia S., Mary E., and Ann Eliza. Otis B. married, for his first wife, Sarah Dunan, and, after her death, Mrs. Minerva Lutz; they now live in Tarlton; Cynthia S. lives in Greenfield, Ohio, and is the wife of R. H. Miller; Mary E. married the Rev. T. R. Taylor, and resides in Portsmouth; Ann Eliza married Joseph Ward, who died in 1877.

Mrs. Shoemaker died September 30, 1859.

June 2, 1863, Mr. Shoemaker married Nancy C. Meeks, a native of West Virginia, with whom he still lives. The offspring of this union were two children—John William, aged fourteen, and Joseph, aged nine years.

SALT CREEK TP. PICKAWAY CO., O.

PICKAWAY.*

Only a little more than eighty years ago, the territory now constituting Pickaway county, to-day teeming with busy industry, intelligence and happiness, was a complete wilderness, unvisited by the cheering rays of civilization. Over these fertile and cultivated fields—dotted with substantial dwellings, surrounded by many evidences of even luxury and refinement—roamed savage wild beasts, and a race of men more savage still than they. Here sported the timid deer, and the dismal howl of the wolf was heard. In the forest, the Indian pursued his game and sauntered along the rippling streams, obtaining thus his daily food. Here the romantic lover "wooed his dusky maid" in primitive simplicity. Everything now is changed. The wilderness that met the first gaze of the pioneers has been made to bud and blossom as the rose. Where, less than a century ago, were the scattered huts and wigwams of the Indians, are now the comfortable homes of an enlightened and happy people, blessed with abundant social, religious, and educational privileges. This amazing change was rendered possible by the enterprise, toil, and privation of those noble pioneers who are rapidly passing away, and in their commemoration the following account of their labors is written.

No place in the county—if, indeed, in the entire State—is invested with such extraordinary interest as the township of Pickaway. Here were situated the principal Indian villages, for the destruction of which Lord Dunmore's campaign was organized. On its soil the army made its encampment, and by a treaty or truce, brought to a close what threatened to be a long and bloody war. The writer will merely mention here the places of historical interest in the township, the events which make them so, being fully narrated in another portion of the book.

At the time of Lord Dunmore's incursion into the country, in 1774, there were several Indian villages on the plains and vicinity, the most important of which were Cornstalktown and Squawtown, situated on Scippo creek. The former named after the Shawnee chief, Cornstalk, was located just north of where the iron bridge crosses the creek on the Chillicothe pike, and the latter, named for the sister of Cornstalk—Grenadier Squaw—was located just south of the bridge. Camp Charlotte, the place of Lord Dunmore's encampment, was situated on Scippo creek, in the southwest quarter of section twelve, on the old Winship farm. General Lewis camped on the southeast quarter of section thirty, on Congo creek.

On the farm of James T. Boggs, a short distance east of his residence, is the so-called "Logan elm," under which, according to a certain tradition, the famous speech of the celebrated Mingo chief was made. This tradition relates that Col. Williamson, an officer under Lord Dunmore, recited to Captain John Boggs the circumstances of the conclusion of the treaty with the Indians, and described the place of meeting as being near Congo creek, about a mile below Camp Lewis, in a small piece of prairie of about thirty acres, in the middle of which was a mound. Logan was present, and delivered the speech under an elm that stood a short distance southwest of said mound. Captain Boggs had no difficulty in subsequently finding the tree, from the description given him by Williamson, and it has ever since been carefully preserved by members of the family, because of the historical associations that are believed by them to surround it. The tree is of regal majesty, being seventy-nine feet in height, and measuring, from the ends of the branches on one side to the other, one hundred and twenty feet. The trunk is twenty feet in circumference.

FACE OF THE COUNTRY—STREAMS.

The surface of the township is generally rolling, with the exception of that portion comprising the Pickaway "plains," where it is almost perfectly level. These "plains," so justly celebrated for their beauty, exuberant fertility, and ease of cultivation, when first discovered by the pioneers, were entirely devoid of tree or shrub, and were covered with a rank vegetation, consisting mostly of a wild grass, which old inhabitants say grew to such a height that it could be easily tied over a horse's back. The productiveness of the virgin soil of the "plains" was very great—one hundred bushels of corn, and fifty bushels of wheat to the acre being raised with scarcely any labor.

On their arrival here, the pioneers naturally located on the plains, because of the little labor required to raise a crop; but from their entire lack of timber and living water they were not considered desirable for permanent residence, and when the land was offered for sale, in 1801, the surrounding territory was generally preferred by the purchasers. The principal stream within the limits of the township is Scippo creek, which, rising in Fairfield county, enters the township in section twelve, flows a tortuous course through the north part, and reaches the Scioto about two miles north of the south line of the township. Congo creek flows through the south part, and unites with Scippo a mile above its mouth. Kinnickinnick, in the east part, and a small, unnamed tributary of the Scioto, in the west part of the township, are the only other water courses worthy of mention. On Scippo creek there were, at one time, five grist-mills in operation, as mentioned more particularly elsewhere.

In territorial extent, Pickaway exceeds any other township in the county, and in fertility of soil is second to none. It embraces all of the original surveyed township number ten, in range twenty-one (Worthington's survey), containing thirty-six square miles, and, also, the fractional township number three, in range twenty-two, lying between the west line of range twenty-one and the Scioto river, containing about eleven square miles, comprising, in all, a territory of forty-seven squar

WILD ANIMALS.

Game of all kinds, especially deer and wild turkeys, was abundant long after the first white settler came into the township. The killing of two or three deer in a single day, by a hunter, was an ordinary occurrence, and to shoot one from the cabin door, not an uncommon one. Wolves were so numerous as to be a great drawback to the introduction of sheep by the settlers, and rendered necessary their careful protection at night; pens being usually built for that purpose. Pickaway was not a favorite haunt for bears, but a few of them would come in every fall from the Raccoon hills. An old bear, with a cub, was shot through the body, but only wounded, by Jacob Try, at Jefferson. The animal got away, but was tracked by Try's dog over into Wayne township, where she was shot by a settler of that township. The cub, which was half grown, was subsequently taken alive in a thicket a short distance east of Jefferson, by George Try and two or three other young men, with the assistance of the dog. During the struggle between the dog and his antagonist, the young men tied the feet of the bear, using their suspenders for the purpose. They then procured a pole, strung the animal upon it, and carried him, alive, to the village, where they kept him for some time.

INDIANS.

The Indians lingered about the region for some years after the advent of the white settler. They had camping grounds in the township, but no villages after the white men came. In their intercourse with their palefaced brethren, they were uniformly friendly, and no trouble or annoyance was occasioned by their presence. They would occasionally bring in from the Raccoon hills large quantities of bear meat and venison which they would sell or "swap" to the whites.

A white man killed an Indian on Paint creek, in Ross, the report of which, on reaching the township, created some excitement among the settlers, who apprehended trouble from the red men in consequence. The people collected together in expectation of an attack, but no trouble ensuing, the excitement soon passed away.

EARLY SETTLEMENT.

The initial settlement of Pickaway county was made in this township, in the year 1796 or 1797. The first cabins were erected on Zane's "trace," which led through the plains from the crossing of the Hockhocking (now Lancaster) to Chillicothe. It cannot, with absolute certainty, be stated who was the first actual settler, but from the best information now obtainable, we are inclined to the belief that Caleb Evans enjoys that distinction. He was a native of Pennsylvania, whence he removed to Kentucky, and resided there until the year stated, when he came to Ohio. He settled on Scippo creek, in section five, where his grandson, Samuel H. Evans, now resides. He was possessed of considerable means, for a pioneer, on coming to this country, and lost, a short time afterwards, by a fire which destroyed his house, four hundred dollars in silver coin. He was a man of strong traits of character, and a good and worthy citizen. He was married twice. By his first wife he had two children—Jonas and Joseph. Jonas went to Indiana, and died there. Joseph remained in Pennsylvania. The second wife of Caleb Evans was Elizabeth Wiggins, who became the mother of nine children, viz.: William, David, John, Archibald, Caleb, Samuel, Ruth, Mary and Elizabeth. William and John settled in Licking county, Ohio. David went south, and nothing was learned of him afterwards, and Archibald died when young. Caleb died in Mexico, while serving as a soldier in the United States army. Samuel, the best known of the sons, in this county, was twice married: first to Susannah Hitler, by whom he had two children. The mother and both of the children died, within a few days of each other, of scarlet fever, which cases are said to have been the first in the county. Mr. Evans married for his second wife, Elizabeth Hitler, sister of his first wife. Four children were the result of this union, of whom Samuel, living on the old homestead, is the only survivor. Samuel Evans, sr., died many years ago, but his wife, Elizabeth, only quite recently—July 28, 1879.

In the spring of 1798, George Fryback and family left Bedford county, Pennsylvania, for Ohio, but, arriving at Waynesburg, the family stopped there while the father, on horseback, came on to Pickaway county, and, selecting a location on Scippo creek, in seetion seven, planted a few acres of corn. He camped there through the summer, and in the fall returned for his family. During his absence, his corn was stolen. He changed his location to the mouth of Congo creek, the following spring, and remained there until the land came into market in 1801, when he entered the south half of section six. Mr. Fryback died here in 1834. His son, John, married Lettitia Emerson, and resided on the homestead until his death, November 6, 1875, aged eighty-seven years and eight months. His wife died one year previous. Of their twelve children, eleven grew up, and eight are now living. The other children of George Fryback were Sally (Anderson), Mary (Loofburrow), Catharine (Emerson), Ann (Jackson), Susannah (Robinson), Elizabeth (Barr), Lydia and George, all now deceased.

Samuel and David Denny were among the earliest settlers of the township, although the particulars of their settlement we are unable to give. David had a blacksmith shop on Congo creek, in section thirty-two. About 1800, or soon after, he removed to the Walnut plains, in Harrison township, and was the first settler in that locality. Samuel Denny died in this township in 1822.

John Roger and Jacob Greenough were among the MAJOR JOHN BOGGS, AND THE BOGGS FAMILY.

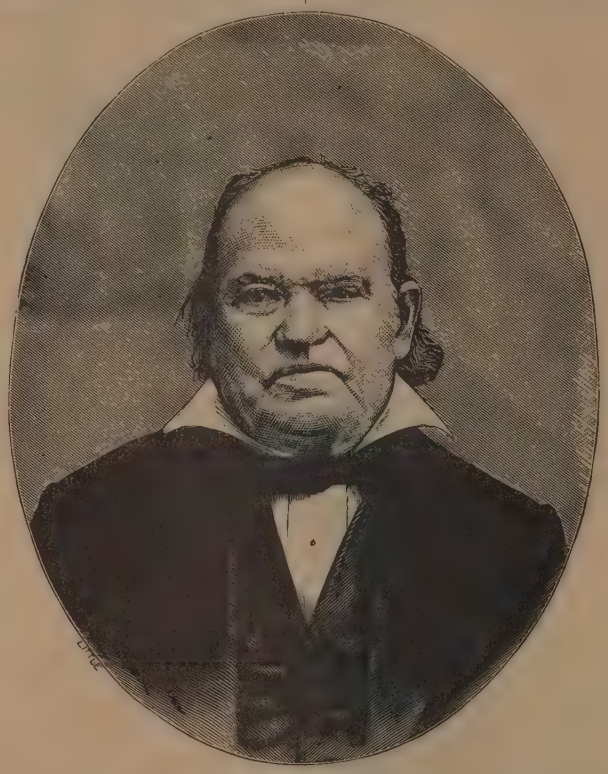
There was some interesting history in the Boggs family before they left Virginia. The parents of Major John Boggs, John and Jane (Irwin), lived upon a small stream in Virginia, which empties into the Ohio, named after them, "Boggs' run," and, during the time of Indian troubles, took refuge in the fort at Wheeling. A dramatic incident in the family history was enacted while they were living at Boggs' run. Indians appeared at the place one day and surprised and captured the eldest son, William, within sight of the other members of the terror-stricken family. They intended to massacre or take captive the whole family; but, upon questioning the boy whom they had caught, and conveyed to a secure place, they were told that there were seven or eight men at the house, and they considered this number too great for their band to venture out against. They had seen several men about the farm, during the day, engaged in harvesting, and supposed that William Boggs' words were true, and that they all slept in the house at night —which was not the case by any means. The elder John Boggs was the only man there. This occurred in 1781 or 1782 when Major John Boggs was but six years old. The captive William was taken to West Liberty, near the present city of Urbana, Ohio, and kept there about nineteen months, when he was exchanged, and returned home. His father did not recognize him in his Indian habiliments, even after having an extended conversation with him. Another son of John and Jane Boggs was killed on Ohio soil, just opposite Wheeling. He was returning, with half a dozen comrades, from a hunting expedition, and they were encamped for the night, when a band of Indians stole upon them, as they were sleeping, and fired into their midst. Boggs was wounded, but sitting, crippled, on the ground, made a desperate fight before he was finally dispatched, with a tomahawk. All of the rest of the party escaped.



John Boggs, the Major, was born May 10, 1775, and emigrated to Pickaway county, with his parents, in 1798. They came down the Ohio, in a keel-boat, to the mouth of the Scioto, and thence, by barge, up the latter stream, to the station below Chillicothe. There they left their boat, and went up the stream, on foot, to a point within the present limits of Greene township, Ross county, from which they could look far up the valley, upon a scene of the richest and most peaceful loveliness. But little did they then think of the teeming life that that lonely but fertile valley, should one day hold, or of the signs of industry, wealth, culture, and happiness; it was destined to display. They found that some pioneer had been here before them, and, as in the ethics of the early settlers, it was considered highly dishonorable to locate where another pioneer had made a beginning, however small, they went on, up the stream, to the Pickaway plains, where John Boggs, sr., selected a site, and subsequently entered six hundred and forty acres of land—that now owned by the heirs of Jacob Hitler and Jacob Ludwig. The son, John, went up Congo, to the place where stands the Logan elm, and where James T. Boggs now resides. After making his location, and preparing a rude home, he returned to Boggs run, Ohio county, Virginia, and there married, in the year 1800, Sarah McMicken. He brought his wife to his new home, and there reared his family, living for a time in the log house, but, at an early day, probably in 1801 or 1802, building the house which is still standing. Major Boggs was very poor, and had to struggle hard for a living. He was a man of very industrious habits, and did with a will whatever he undertook. He cleared up his farm, and toiled patiently in the work of improvement, against many disadvantages, but with ultimate success and satisfaction. He commenced boating in 1803, and took the first boat load of flour that was ever sent out of the Scioto, to New Orleans. He made three trips, and returned on foot, or on horseback, the whole distance from New Orleans to Pickaway township, passing through the Indian nation, and keeping a sharp look-out for robbers. He met with no mishap of bodily harm, and with but one loss of money. That was when a tavern-keeper, with whom he and his friend, Daniel Crouse, stopped, picked the lock of his saddle-bags, and took from them three hundred dollars in silver, with which he paid a debt to Crouse. Major Boggs never knew of his loss until he arrived at home, and, though he applied to the tavern-keeper, who acknowledged his guilt, the money was never recovered. Mr. Boggs received the title of "Major" in the war of 1812. Through his industry, economy, and good management, he became owner of about one thousand, eight hundred acres of land in Pickaway township, two thousand acres in Indiana, and a large amount of personal property.

Major Boggs was a man who had the universal respect of his neighbors and acquaintances. Although not a member of any church, he was a warm friend of religion, and contributed liberally to aid its progress among the people. Politically, he was a Democrat, and a great admirer of "Old Hickory." He died February 6, 1861, at the home of his son, Moses. He had married his second wife, a sister of the first, Mrs. Jane (McMicken) Taylor, in Zanesville, and had been, for a number of years, living in that place, when he was taken sick, and returned to Pickaway township, as he said, to die. His first wife died, December 31, 1851. His father died on the same day of the month as the son—February 6—1827, and it is a curious fact that, had they each lived until his next birthday, they would have been, at the dates of their death, at precisely the same age—eighty-seven years. The descendants of John Boggs and wife were: William, Jane, Lemuel, John, Nancy, Lydia, Moses, James, and Sidney (the latter, although the name might not be understood to signify it, a daughter). William Boggs is in Bellefontaine; Jane, Mrs. F. Shelby, died in Indiana; Lemuel was killed in 1827, in the mill which his father built, about ten years before; John is living in Pickaway township, with his second wife, Lucy H., a daughter of Judge Isaac Cook, of Ross county; his first wife was Mary Ann Evans; she died in 1852. Mr. Boggs is one of the largest land-owners in Pickaway county having about two thousand eight hundred acres in the township in which he lives, and enough more in the west to make about nine thousand acres. Nancy Boggs died when quite young; Lydia is also deceased; Moses Boggs died December 7, 1863; he married Margaret S., a daughter of Judge Cook, of Ross county, August 3, 1841, by whom he had seven children, two of whom are dead. John M., the eldest, married Fanny S. Stearns, and now resides in Lafayette, Indiana; Lemuel, a resident of Circleville, farmer, substantial man of business, and owner of the Elmwood elevator, married Jennie Groce; Scott C., married Ada Shannon, and lives on the old homestead; William is in Lafayette, Indiana, and Sally T. in Pickaway township. A view of the old home of Moses Boggs appears in this work. James Boggs, youngest son of Major John Boggs, married Minerva Whitsel, and resides on the old homestead. They are the parents of five children: Mary (Mrs John Davenport), Taylor, who married Alva, daughter of Abel Jones, of Pickaway plains, Irwin, Samuel, and James. Sidney Boggs, youngest child and daughter of Major John Boggs and wife, married Dr. L. Jones, and is living in Lafayette, Indiana.

first squatters on the "plains." They afterwards settled in Washington township, in the history of which mention is further made of them. James Wilson came to Chillicothe in May, 1798, and soon after removed to the banks of the Congo, just above its junction with Scippo creek. He died June 8, 1799. He was a brother to the father of Rev. Robert G. Wilson, D. D., formerly president of the Ohio university.

George Hitler, sr., and family, of Somerset county, Pennsylvania, came into the township in the spring of 1799. His family then consisted of his wife Susannah and four children—John, Catharine, Jacob, and George. He resided five or six years in Pickaway township, first locating on the lower plains, and then settled permanently in section thirty-three, Washington township. He died April 2, 1818, at the age of nearly fifty-five years. His wife survived him some thirty years. The children born in this county were Peter, Abraham, Elizabeth, Sarah, Susannah, Mary, and Joseph. Four are now living, viz.: George, in Circleville township; Mrs. Lane, Mrs. John Arnhart, and Joseph Hitler, in Indiana.

Samuel Morehead came in from Kentucky about the same time as the Hitlers. He located first on the lower plains, but afterwards moved in the vicinity of Jefferson, where he resided for many years, finally removing to Indiana.

John Gay, the father of Mrs. George Hitler, left Pennsylvania for Pickaway county, with his family, in the fall of 1798. He came by boat, and was frozen in, on the Ohio, during the winter, and did not arrive until late in the spring of 1799. He made his location on Punkin run, and resided there until his death. He lived to the great age of one hundred and two years and ten months.

Captain John Boggs, a native of Pennsylvania, removed with his family to Wheeling, Virginia, in 1771, and settled at the mouth of Boggs' run, opposite Boggs' island, near old fort Wheeling. He owned a little farm on this island, from which he was often driven to the fort by the Indians. In 1796, he and his son, John, came to Pickaway to make a selection of land for settlement. They came down the Ohio in a keel-boat, to the mouth of the Scioto, then pushed up that river, with others, on a barge, to what was called "the station," below Chillicothe. Here they landed, and came on foot along the river, until they arrived at the place afterwards entered by Major Brink, now owned by Nelson Kellenberger, in Ross county. Here was a high, beautiful location, and the captain at once decided to fix his abode there. On making further explorations, however, he discovered four logs laid apparently for a foundation of a home, and considering it unfair to dispossess the absent squatter of his "improvement," he went on to section seven, in this township, where he made a location, and which he subsequently entered and made his permanent residence. He brought out his family in 1798, and erected his cabin a short distance east of the site of the present residence of James T. Boggs, and the old structure, erected in 1798, is yet standing. Captain Boggs subsequently moved to Scippo creek, on the hill above the present bridge, where he built a one-story brick house, one of the first brick houses erected in the township. He died at the residence of his son, Major John Boggs, in 1829.

Major Boggs settled on the farm now occupied by his son, James T., and erected the brick house thereon in 1816. It is said, that in 1803, Major Boggs took the first flat-boat down the Scioto, loaded with flour, to New Orleans, although cargoes of pork and whiskey had been shipped down before. He made several trips to New Orleans, carrying his specie home on a "pack-horse." He served in the war of 1812, with the rank of major. He died at the residence of his son, Moses, February 6, 1862, aged nearly eighty-seven. His first wife died December, 1851, and he subsequently married the widow of Captain James Taylor, of Zanesville, a sister of his first wife. Four of the children are now living, to wit: William, near Bellefontaine; John and James T., in Pickaway township; and Mrs. Jones, in Indiana. Moses died in 1863. His wife, who was Margaret Scott Cook, daughter of Judge Cook, still survives.

Samuel Seall, sr., came from Pennsylvania in 1799, and located in Pickaway township, in section number nine, where he lived six or seven years, and then moved to Walnut township, and settled on eighty acres in section thirty-three. He died there in 1812. His son, Samuel, married Mary Gougar, in 1829, and followed blacksmithing, in the village of Jefferson, for a number of years. Afterwards, he bought and settled on a farm of two hundred and twenty acres, in Pickaway township, adjoining the farm on which his father first located. In the spring of 1845 he sold out, and settled in Washington township, on the place now occupied by his son, George, and resided there until his death, in the fall of 1870. Two of his three children are living—John, now county treasurer, in Circleville, and George, in Washington township, Pickaway county, Ohio.

Thomas and John Barr came to Pickaway, from Pennsylvania, at a very early date. Thomas located just east of where James T. Boggs now lives, and John on the place now occupied by Daniel Hitler. They were both men of more than ordinary intelligence and influence. Thomas was once associate judge of Pickaway county, and his brother a representative from this county to the legislature. Judge Barr died, September 21, 1830, aged fifty-eight years, and his wife, Sidney, February 23, 1869, aged eighty-five years and eight months.

John Sharp, originally from Pennsylvania, came to Ohio, from Wheeling, Virginia, about 1799, settling in Chillicothe. For a few years he carried on a store there, and then located on a farm near the north line of Ross county, as now constituted. Shortly afterwards, he came to this township, and put up a cabin on the farm now owned by Abraham Jones. Being unable to enter the section on which he had located, he left his cabin, and moved to Congo creek, entering the half section now owned and occupied by his son, John D. Sharp—number thirty-two. The log house which he erected here is still standing. He died in 1827, and his wife in 1840. John D., the only survivor of the family, resides a short distance south of the old dwelling, and is now aged nearly seventy-seven.

John Rush emigrated from Kentucky as early as 1797, settling for a few years on "high bank," below Chillicothe. He then came to this township and located on Scippo creek, in section twelve, of the fractional portion of the township, where he continued to reside until the time of his death.

Henry Nevill came into the township about 1800, and purchased a large tract of land on the Pickaway plains. Subsequently, he laid out the village of Jefferson, which prospered considerably until Circleville was started, when it declined. Mr. Nevill was wealthy, but by the erection of a large grist-mill upon the on which, together with the dam, which caused him a great deal of trouble, by repeatedly breaking away, he expended an immense sum of money, and finally became financially embarrassed. He was engaged for some years in trade in Jefferson, and subsequently in Circleville. He eventually moved to Illinois.

Jonathan Ellis was an early settler where William Rush now lives. He was a cabinet maker and carpenter, and built the frame of the Boggs mill. He was also an early justice of the peace of Pickaway township.

Matthew Ferguson was an early settler of this township. He lived to the advanced age of ninety-nine years, dying November 2, 1848. His wife, Ann, died December 24, 1851, aged eighty-seven years.

Jacob Stingley came in from Ross county, in 1805, and entered the west half of section number eight, settled upon it, and resided there until his death. The land now constitutes a part of the farm of Abel Jones.

Hugh Foresman settled on the plains in 1806. He was born in Ireland, December 11, 1748, and came with his parents, when three years of age, to Westmorland county, Pennsylvania, where he resided until his removal to Ohio. He married Judeth Slocum, February 25, 1782, and had ten children—Jane, Ruth, John, William, Robert, Hugh, Mary, Judeth, Agnes, Jonathan, and Alexander. Jane became the wife of James Torbert, who came to Pickaway in 1808. Torbert was a man of local prominence, and was wealthy. Agnes (Mrs. McCrea), now residing in Circleville, is the only survivor of the family. She was born June 3, 1799, and married, September 16, 1819, Matthew McCrea, who died September 4, 1847. They had a family of eight children, three of whom are now living, namely, Adam, proprietor of the Pickaway house, in Circleville; William, in Illinois; and George, in St. Louis. Hugh Foresman, sr., died in this township, December 17, 1811, and his wife March 12, 1813.

Thomas Emerson moved in from Virginia in 1807, and located on Scippo creek, where his grandson, George Emerson, now lives—section eighteen.

About the same time Gabriel Steeley moved in from Pennsylvania, and settled in the southwest part of section twenty, where the Wilsons now live. He was the father of seven children. John resided where Abram Penn now lives, and Meek on the homestead. John married Margaret Emerson. Two sons—Lemuel and Benjamin—now reside in the township. Edmund, Silas, and Jane, widow of Jesse B. Lutz, reside in Indiana. Nancy, wife of James Rice, lives in Pickaway; and Margaret, wife of James Hayes, in Kingston.

Jacob Wagner came to Ohio from Frederick county, Maryland, with his family, in the fall of 1807. He remained in Ross county one year, when he moved into this towhship and located where Otis Lutz now lives, in section thirty-one. He finally sold to David Crouse, and moved to Upper Sandusky, where he resided until his death. His son, Jacob Wagner, now aged eighty-three years, has resided in this township ever since he came, in 1808. He married Sarah Young, who died May 4, 1874. He has resided on the place he now occupies nearly forty years.

James Hedges came from Berkeley county, Virginia, and located at Jefferson, in 1807. He married Miss Margaret Nevill, and resided in Jefferson until the fall of 1810, when he moved to Circleville. His father, Philip, and a cousin, Joseph, arrived a short time afterwards. They both married into the Nevill family, and Joseph became a partner of Henry Nevill, in the store at Jefferson, which was finally moved to Circleville.

In October, 1808, William Caldwell and family moved to Ohio from Huntingdon county, Pennsylvania, and located in Ross county, west of Kingston. After living through the winter in a cabin which he erected there, he came, in the following March, to Pickaway, and settled in section fifteen, where he resided until his death, in 1815. His wife survived him several years. Their son, John Caldwell, who came into the township with his parents in 1809, is still a resident of it.

George Kellenberger and wife, Jemima (Rice), came from near Fredericksburg, Maryland, soon after the close of the war of 1812. He located a few miles below Chillicothe, but subsequently came to Pickaway, and moved into the old house of Major Boggs. He finally purchased and settled in section thirteen, where his son George now lives. He died December 31, 1861, in his seventy-first year. His wife died December 25, 1865. Five sons were born to them, all now dead but two—Nelson, in Ross county, and George, on the old homestead.

John Entrekin, then about twenty years of age, came to Ohio from Huntingdon county, Pennsylvania, in the spring of 1798. He came with a party of eight men, who made the journey on horseback, over the mountains. The party made a location at the bend of the river, three miles above Chillicothe, and grubbed out about one hundrd acres, which they planted to corn. In the fall they all returned to Pennsylvania, and those of them who had families moved out. John Entrekin brought out his parents, with his brother William and sister Martha, and made settlement where he had previously made an improvement.

Mr. Entrekin married Nancy Crouse, in December, 1801, and settled on the Kinnickinnick, on the farm now owned by Z. Downs. He continued a resident of Ross county until the spring of 1828, when he came into Pickaway, and settled where William W. Entrekin, his son, now lives, buying out a son of John McCutcheon, who came here in 1808. Colonel Entrekin died May 10, was born at what in early times was called "the station," below Chillicothe, April 8, 1796. His parents, David and Mary (Williams) Shelby, were natives of Rockingham county, Virginia. David Shelby was one of the earliest pioneers in the Scioto valley, coming to Chillicothe with General Massie's party, and was one of the first settlers in Pickaway county. Sometime prior to 1800 he located in the township of Pickaway, where he afterward entered the west half of section three, erecting his cabin on the site of the red frame dwelling-house, now occupied by Silas Saxon, which he also erected as early as 1819. David Shelby was a man of prominence in the county. He was a member of the State legislature for twenty-one consecutive years, with the exception of one term, and was the first justice of the peace in the township of Pickaway, being elected to the office before Ohio was made a State, and serving a number of years. He died December 25, 1845, at the age of eighty years. His wife died October 3, 1830, at the age of sixty-eight years. They were the parents of eight children: John, Joseph, Rachel, Hannah, Charity, Rezon, Benjamin, and Isaac. Hannah, now the widow of Rev. Joseph Curtis, and living in Illinois, is the only survivor. Charity, the only one of the family besides Benjamin, who settled in Pickaway county, was the wife of Henry Morris, and lived where her daughter, Mrs. Jacob Weaver, of Pickaway township, now lives.

BENJAMIN SHELBY

Benjamin Shelby, at the age of nineteen, went to Indiana, and lived with his uncle two years, during which he was engaged in boating on the Wabash, taking corn, pork, and flour from Evansville to Fort Harrison, now Terre Haute, on a keel boat. He returned to Ohio, and commenced flat-boating to New Orleans, in which he continued twelve years, making two trips each year. In the fall he would buy cattle in Illinois and Missouri, which he would fatten and drive to Philadelphia or New York, and for many years was extensively engaged in this business. In 1823 he purchased, of Christopher Bartley, forty acres of land in section three, Pickaway township, including the Bartley grist-mill, on Scippo creek. He afterwards bought, of Bartley's heirs, the remainder of the quarter, and located where his daughter, Mrs. Stage, now lives. Mr. Shelby became a large land-holder, owning some sixteen or seventeen hundred acres in this county and in the west.

He had command of a company of militia, in Indiana, and was subsequently appointed colonel of militia in this county.

He married Nancy Enoex, and raised a family of five children, three of whom are now living. The eldest was Evaline, born March 28, 1825, married Jacob Reesor, and died in Illinois, October 9, 1869; Evan C., born August 25, 1828, married Elizabeth, daughter of James Rice, of Pickaway township, and resides in Circleville; Malinda H., born December 19, 1834, is the wife of Isaac W. Stage, and lives on the old homestead; David, born October 29, 1837, married Margaret Mason, and occupies the farm on which his grandfather settled; John, born November 15, 1839, was shot, by accident, December 25, 1871, and died three days afterward.

Benjamin Shelby died May 4, 1876, and Mary, his wife, October 9, 1869.

1842. His wife survived him, and died January 16, 1845.

FIRST EVENTS.

The first habitation erected in the township, save the huts and wigwams of the Indians, was probably the log cabin of Caleb Evans. It was located in section five, near the present site of the dwelling of Samuel H. Evans. The house was destroyed by fire. The first white child born in the township, and probably the first in Pickaway county, was Mary Evans, daughter of Caleb and Elizabeth Evans. The date of her birth was June 8, 1798. She became the wife of her cousin, Archibald Wiggins, and removed to Kentucky. The first death was that of James Wilson, who died June 8, 1799. In the fall of the same year Hugh Lynn died, and his was the second death in the township. His widow, who was a sister of Mrs. George Hitler, sr., subsequently married Samuel Morehead. The first blacksmith shop was kept by David Denny, established about 1800. Its location was on Congo creek, east of the log house of John Sharp.

CHURCH ORGANIZATION.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

The first Methodist class organized in the township was at Salem. A log meeting-house was built a short distance northeast of the site of the present house, in 1802 or 1803. Some of the members of the class were: John Parsons and wife, Michael Saylor and family, Henry Houston and family, Allen Parker and family, and David Crow and family. Rev. James Quinn, a circuit preacher, preached in the old house. The present church was erected in the fall of 1816. The stone for the foundation was hauled by John Clarence. It was built of logs, and subsequently weather-boarded. Meetings have ever since been held in this house. The old structure, with its simple furniture, affords a striking contrast to the imposing city churches of to-day. The circuit was originally called Pickaway circuit; afterwards Circleville, and is now Kingston circuit. The present pastor is Rev. William C. Halliday. A Methodist class formerly held meetings in the school-house near the Evangelical church, and subsequently, for a number of years, in the church itself.

Palestine church, in the northeast part of the township, was built about the year 1840, by a German Reformed and Lutheran society. The Methodists afterwards bought an interest in the building and held meetings there a number of years, the former society having disbanded. Services have not been held there for some years.

A Presbyterian church was organized on the plains by the Rev. James Robinson, then of the Mount Pleasant church, in 1808. The church consisted of but few members, and never had any meeting-house or fixed location, and remained in existence only a few years. The meetings were usually held at the house of John Boggs or John Ball. In 1816 Mr. Robinson commenced preaching one-third of his time in the Rawl school-house, near the present site of Emmett's chapel. The Methodists also organized a society, on the plains, at an early date, and held their meetings alternately with the former church, in the school-house, until about the year 1835, when the two societies united in the erection of a brick church, on the hill, just south of Congo-creek bridge. It was used by them, alternately, for about ten years, when some difficulty arose between the two denominations, and the Methodists withdrew and provided another place of worship. Elias Reed, a leading member, bought the farm of John Rawl, and turned the dwelling into a meeting-house. The old building, built in 1816, is still standing, though greatly dilapidated. It was used by the society until 1852, when the present Emmett's chapel (so named, in honor of the pioneer Methodist preacher, father Emmett) was built. The Presbyterians continued to use the brick church for a few years after the withdrawal of the Methodists, when, by reason of removals and deaths, their number became so reduced that preaching could not be supported, and the house was sold and taken down.

THE EVANGELICAL CHURCH.

The class was formed by Rev. John Dreisbach, in the year 1835. The first members were the officiating clergyman and his wife, Thomas F. Kraft and wife, Adam Boyer and wife, and John Kraft and wife. Abraham Dreisbach, who subsequently became a minister of the church, Isaac E., Catharine and Sophia Dreisbach, and Mrs. Eliza Steeley, were also early members, uniting soon after the organization was effected. The first meetings were held at the dwellings of the members, and afterwards in the log school-house, which stood where the frame school-house now stands, near the church. After the frame school-house was built, the society occupied it until the erection of their present church, in the summer of 1850. The building cost nine hundred and three dollars and sixty-one cents. It was dedicated December 22, 1850, by Bishop Joseph Long and presiding elder J. G. Zinser. Rev. Mr. Dreisbach preached for the class for a few years, and until the regular circuit preachers were appointed. John Heisler was leader of the class until 1840, when Isaac E. Dreisbach was appointed, and has continued its efficient head until the present. The membership is now thirty-six. The preachers are C. M. Reinehold and A. Evans. A Sabbath-school was organized soon after the church came into being, and has continued through every summer since. Isaac E. Dreisbach is its present superintendent.

EARLY BURIALS AND BURIAL PLACES.

The first place within the township chosen for the interment of the dead, was the Boggs burying-ground, situated on a little eminence a short distance north of the residence of James T. Boggs. The first person buried there, whose grave is marked, was David Boggs, who died May 10, 1800, in the tenth year of his age. The next was Jacob Sayler, who died September 21, 1800, aged fifty-two years. William Morgan was buried there in September, 1807, aged three years; Henry Beauchamp, son of Risdon and Mary Beauchamp, in the same year, and his sister Rachel, aged five years, the following year.

The first burials in the old, and now dilapidated, Jefferson burying-ground, were those of Nancy Evans, in August, 1813; Willard Evans, in September of the same year; James Brotherlin, in December, 1813; and Elizabeth Brotherlin, in April 1814.

In the Salem burying-ground, Susannah Crow was the first person interred. She died July 8, 1809. Thomas Crow was buried here in January, 1814.

Some of the earliest interments of the deceased pioneers of Pickaway, were made in the Mount Pleasant cemetery, in Ross county, a mile southwest of Kingston. The first grave was that of "Jane, wife of George Harrison, who died September 6, 1800, in the twenty-seventh year of her age." The next was that of Jane Denny, who died in October, of the same year, in the sixtieth year of her age; Matthew Ferguson, jr., was buried in May, 1810; John Ferguson, in April, 1813; Rebecca Duncan, in December, 1813; Hugh Foresman was buried in December, 1811, and his wife, Judeth, in March, 1814.

EARLY SCHOOLS.

Little that is definite can be learned in regard to the first schools in the township. The earliest schools were kept in unoccupied cabins, and derived their support from private subscriptions. One of the first schools was kept in a cabin which stood on the hill near Mr. Evans', where the old graveyard now is. And one, also, in a log house, in the south part of the township, a short distance southeast of where J. D. Sharp now lives. The first school in this house was taught by Jesse Bartlett, who came here from New England. He kept school here two or three years, and then settled in Ross county.

The first school-house, as near as we can learn, was the Rawl school-house, which stood just east of Reed's chapel—the old meeting-house. The first school in it was kept by Hugh Hannagan. The house was afterwards moved to near the place where James T. Boggs' dwelling house now stands.

The original log meeting-house built at Salem, in 1802 or 1803, was used, also, as a school-house. David Jones kept school there, and others, whose names cannot now be remembered. John Caldwell, who is still living in the vicinity, was a scholar in this school.

PHYSICIANS.

The first physician resident within the township, was Dr. William B. Gould, who resided at Jefferson. He settled there in 1802 or 1803, and practiced, with only moderate success, for about fifteen years.

Dr. Daniel Turney came to Jefferson in 1806. He studied medicine with Dr. Scott, of Chillicothe, and graduated in Philadelphia. He remained in Jefferson five or six years, when he removed to Circleville. Dr. Turney was a man of strong traits of character, superior professional attainments, and, in his day, was the leading practitioner of the county. He was born in 1786, and died in Columbus, in 1827.

MILLS.

The pioneers of Pickaway obtained their grist, at first, at what was called the floating mill, on the river, below Chillicothe. Mr. Jacob Hitler informs the writer that the mill consisted of two flat-boats between which a wheel was placed in rig. The whole was covered over with a kind of roof. The mill lay at anchor wherever the force of the current was sufficient to run the wheel.

Subsequently, Crouse's mill was erected on Kinnickinnick, in Ross county, and the settlers then went there to mill. The grain was ground in the order of its reception, and the mill was so crowded with business, that several days would often be required in going to mill and back. There is now no mill in the township, but we will briefly mention a few that have had an existence.

The first grist-mill was built on Scippo creek, by Daniel Dreisbach, about the year 1815. On the same stream Benedict Morris had a mill at an early day.

Chrisropher Bartley erected a frame grist-mill on Scippo creek, about forty rods east of the road running past David Shelby's, which he run until his death. Benjamin Shelby afterwards bought the mill of Bartley's heirs, moved it down to the road, and rebuilt it. He afterwards added a saw-mill. The property was destroyed by fire in the fall of 1871.

In 1819, Major John Boggs erected, near the mouth of Scippo creek, a frame grist-mill, of three run of stone, having previously erected a saw-mill at the same place. Major Boggs operated the mill until 1827. On Christmas day, of that year, his son, Lemuel Boggs, was caught in the machinery, and crushed to death. This terrible accident induced Major Boggs to sell a half interest in the mill to George Kellenberger, when he retired from the active control o the concern.

There were a number of saw-mills on Scippo creek, in an early day, besides those already mentioned, but the particulars of their history the writer is unable to give.

THE ELLENWOOD ELEVATORS

were erected by Lemuel Boggs, the present owner, in the fall of 1876. He built them more for his own private convenience than to engage in the grain business in a general way; yet, from the first, the elevators have done a large business. Most of the farmers in the vicinity dispose of their grain there, receiving a price for it equal to that paid in Circleville, and save the toll required in going to the latter place. The first year Mr. Boggs shipped one hundred and ninety thousand bushels of corn, and now handles one hundred and fifty to two hundred thousand bushels of the same annually, and about seventy-five thousand bushels of wheat.

At Jefferson, Henry Nevill erected, in the first settlement in the township, a wind-mill, the only one, it is supposed, ever erected in the State. It was used for "cracking corn," for a time, but it was not very highly prized by its owner or his neighbors, and in after years was allowed to go down. It was a high structure, with long, broad wings, or fans, and was a terror to the farmers' horses, which could hardly be driven within a hundred yards of it.

THE OLD VILLAGE OF JEFFERSON.

No history of the township would be complete without at least a brief reference to the thriving village which it once contained. Jefferson was laid out by Henry Nevill, a wealthy Irishman, in 1803. Its location was near the north line of the township, in section six. Nevill opened the first store, which he carried on alone for a few years, when he took in Joseph Hedges as a partner. Another store was shortly afterwards established, by George Brown, who came in from Chillicothe. Other stores were subsequently started, and at one time Jefferson could justly boast of the extent of her mercantile trade. The goods were brought from Philadelphia and Baltimore, in wagons drawn by six-horse teams. The founder of the village built the first tavern, which was first kept by one Bobst. The sign displayed the portrait of the distinguished author of the "charter of our liberties," in whose honor the town was named. Henry Tom succeeded Bobst as landlord. The mention of his name, by old settlers, is always coupled with anecdotes of his prodigous strength. He was a man of stalwart frame, and with his hands would break a new bed-cord almost as easily as if it were made of straw. Joseph Adamson was the last proprietor of the house. He afterwards moved to Circleville, where he kept the Valley house. There were two other hotels built in Jefferson, one of which was the Caldwell house, kept by its owner, William Caldwell, and others. Besides the business places mentioned, there were the usual mechanic shops and other establishments necessary to a first-class town with a population of some three or four hundred. There were several physicians, the best and most favorably known of whom was Dr. Daniel Turney, of whom mention is made elsewhere.

The only brick building erected in the place was the dwelling of Major Putoff, an officer in the war of 1812. The house was finally purchased by John B. Moore, who took it down and rebuilt it in Circleville, on Union street, opposite Colonel Anderson's. It is now owned and occupied by G. F. Wittich.

The first courts held in the county were held at Jefferson, and a strong effort was made by the proprietor and inhabitants of the place to secure the location of the county seat. When this failed, the town began to go down, stores and many dwellings were moved away, and in 1840, the place had decreased to eighty-five inhabitants. No vestige of a town now remains, and only a single house (the old office of Dr. Turney, now the dwelling of Mrs. Kinmore) is left to mark its former site.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

THE ENTREKIN FAMILY.

James Entrekin, the original representative of his family in America, was a native of the Highlands of Scotland, and resided in a mountain pass known as the Entrekin pass. His wife was from the north of Ireland, and was of Scotch-Irish extraction. She reached the great age of one hundred and three years. They came to America and settled in what is now the eastern part of Adams county, Pennsylvania. One son, William, with his entire family, was killed by the Indians at a small stream called Bloody run. James, the other son, married Elizabeth Hall, who, like him, was of Scotch-Irish descent, and they settled near Gettysburg, upon the ground where the great battle was fought in the war of the Rebellion. Their children were three sons and four daughters, namely, James, John, William, Elizabeth, Jane, Ester, and Martha.

John Entrekin, born April 22, 1778, moved with his father's family, when fourteen years old, and in the year 1792, to Huntingdon county, Pennsylvania. In April, 1798, he removed, with eight others, to the northwest territory, and settled in Ross county. They traveled from Wheeling to Chillicothe by the bridle-path known as Zane's trace, and saw only four houses while making their slow journey. John Entrekin and his eight friends cleared, that season, ninety-nine acres of land, which was afterward entered by Cryder, and is now known as the Dunn farm. After this was done, and a crop of corn raised, they all returned to their homes in Pennsylvania and made preparations to move their families to the new home in the wilderness. They returned in October, 1798. John Entrekin was not married. The family consisted of the father, mother, John, William, and Martha. Mrs. Elizabeth Entrekin died September 5, 1800, at the age of sixty-seven years, and was buried on the farm now owned by D. Umsted. Through this death the family was broken up. The husband returned to Pennsylvania and lived with his son James. Martha, the youngest daughter, went to Kentucky, and lived with her married sister, Mrs. James Parks, and there married Thomas McCutchen, a brother of John McCutchen, who lived and kept a tavern near where William W. Entrekin now resides. William Entrekin returned to Pennsylvania, where he died in 1854, in the month of July. On December 25, 1801, John Entrekin married Nancy Crouse, a daughter of John and Catharine Crouse, who emigrated to Ross county with their entire family, in April, 1798, and settled there permanently. John Crouse and wife were both born near Baltimore, Maryland, he on the thirteenth of January, 1759, and she on the first of May, 1764. He was of German extraction, and she of Welsh. Mr. Crouse purchased, in 1798, the mill erected by William McCoy and John D. Rush, on Kinnickinnick, in the same year—the first mill in the Scioto valley. Mr. Crouse died September 5, 1847, at the age of eighty-eight years; and his wife September 12, 1845, aged eighty-one years. He served his country with great credit in the Revolutionary war.

John Entrekin was one of the prominent men of Ross and Pickaway counties. His life up to 1828 was identified with the former county. By crumbling papers, yellow with age, now in the possession of William W. Entrekin, we obtain the dates of some of the events of his life. The oldest is one which is dated "January 14th, 1802, Territory of the United States Northwest of the Ohio," appointing John Entrekin as captain of a company of militia of the First regiment of the county of Ross. A little later he received the following letter, which serves to show that it meant something to belong to the militia in those days:

"CHILLICOTHE, May 20, 1803.

"SIR:—You will please immediately to inform your neighborhood that the Indians are in force on our frontiers, and that they ought immediately to arm and equip themselves for the defense of the neighborhood, and be ready to obey such further orders as they may receive.

"G. LANGHAM.

"It is certain they have killed Captain Herod.

"JESSE PRENTISS."

Fortunately for the subject of our sketch, and for the people of Chillicothe and vicinity, the attack at this time apprehended did not take place.

Mr. Entrekin received his commission as captain of the Second company, First battalion, First regiment, Second brigade, of the Territorial militia in 1809. It bears the date March 24th, and the signature of Samuel Huntington, then governor.

In June, 1817, he received from Governor Thomas Worthington, a notification of appointment as major of the Second regiment, and only a few days later he was made lieutenant-colonel. November 13, 1818, he was made colonel of the Third regiment, Third brigade, Second division.

Mr. Entrekin was three times appointed justice of the peace: in 1815 by Governor Worthington, in 1819 by Governor Ethan A. Brown, and in 1822 by Governor Allan Trimble. He was Ross county's representative in the legislature in 1821. Mr. Entrekin's was one of the half-dozen families which composed the society of the Mt. Pleasant Presbyterian church, the first church in Ross county.

During the war of 1812, he performed considerable very arduous service for his country. He at first had charge of a company of horse, in the Auglaize country, whither he was sent to aid in the relief of Fort Defiance. He returned from there to Chillicothe, and in the following fall and winter had charge of the force which guarded the wagon trains which transported supplies from the then capital to Upper Sandusky, and also had charge of the business in a commercial way. Toward the close of the war, he was captain of a company of infantry. After the close of the war, in 1814, he had an adventure with some Indians, near Little Sandusky, and the sword which saved his life from their knives is now in the possession of his son.

After the war he engaged in farming and other business, and established his sons in the occupation of cattle breeding and dealing. He moved from Ross county to Pickaway township, Pickaway county, in March, 1828, and first lived in a log and frame house which stood just south of the present residence of William W. Entrekin. He was elected common pleas judge of Pickaway county, by the Legislature, in 1838, and served until his death. He died May 10, 1842, at the age of sixty-four years, from a surgical operation performed by Dr. Mussey, of Cincinnati. He was a man of great activity and force, influential, highly respected, generous and just. Mrs. Entrekin was born Fe' ruary 16, 1783, and died January 16, 1845, at the age of sixty-one.

The children of John and Nancy Crouse Entrekin, were four sons and six daughters: Elizabeth, James, Catharine, John, William W., Dan. Crouse, Pheraby, Diantha, Jane and Nancy Crouse. Elizabeth was born January 4, 1803; married James McCoy; died August 23, 1872. James was born October 18, 1804; he married Margaret Steele, and after her death, married Elizabeth Shirley; died October 19, 1875; Catharine, born November 1, 1806; married John Carter, of Nicholas county, Kentucky, and died in Missouri, November, 1867; John was born April 9, 1809, and now resides in Saline county, Missouri; he married Frances More, now deceased; William W. was born March 12, 1812; he married Jane Bell, daughter of Thomas and Ruth Bell, of Circleville; their children were John Rockwell, born October 1, 1844; Creaton, born March 24, 1847; Flora Bell, born September 18, 1849, and Tacy Crouse, born February 24, 1862. William W. Entrekin is the only son of John Entrekin now living in the State. He is a large landholder, and prominent farmer of Pickaway township, and has been a successful man in varied and extensive affairs of business. His influence and activity have been largely instrumental in securing to the people of the Scioto valley a railroad, and he has labored to bring about the construction of others, which, if ever completed, will be of great advantage to the country. His residence (subject of illustration) is one of the beautiful homes of the southern part of the county, and was built by him with funds furnished by his father, in 1840. He is a member of the Presbyterian church, as are also all the members of his family. In politics, he was, originally, an old line Whig, but since 1854 has belonged to the Republican party.

Dan. Crouse, next younger, bother of William W., was born September 21, 1814, and is now living in Independence, Jackson county, Missouri. He married Jane Torbet.

Pheraby was born May 25, 1817. She was first married to Russell D. Rockwell, but is now living with her second husband, Abram Jones, one mile south of Kingston, in Ross county.

Diantha was born August 1, 1819, and married Dr. A. W. Thompson, of Circleville. She died August 22, 1858.

Jane, born January 30, 1822, died in infancy.

Nancy Crouse, born December 8, 1831, is living with her brother, in Independence. Missouri.

JOHN CALDWELL,

seventh child of William and Jane (Moore) Caldwell, was born in Huntingdon county, Pennsylvania, February 5, 1800, His parents were natives of the same county, but of Irish ancestry, and emigrated from Pennsylvania to Ohio, with their family, in October, 1808, locating, first, about a mile west of Kingston, on the old Lancaster road. In March, 1809, Mr. Caldwell removed to Pickaway township and settled on the west half of section fifteen, where he resided until his death, March 21, 1815, aged fifty-two years. Mrs. Caldwell died September 1, 1823. They were among the early members of the Mount Pleasant Presbyterian church, in Ross county, of which Mr. Caldwell was elected a ruling elder, and ordained to that office August 7, 1811. Their children, besides John, with the dates of their birth, were as follows: James and David, twins, born July 28, 1787; Robert, born January 25, 1790; Samuel, born June 14, 1792; William, born August 29, 1794; Elizabeth (Mrs. Elias Benton), born June 12, 1797; Daniel, born July 9, 1802; Joseph, born May 1, 1804; Johnson, born January 12, 1805.

John Caldwell, the subject of this sketch, married, January 24, 1828, Elizabeth, daughter of Isaac and Elizabeth Monnett, and resided on the homestead until 1855, when he moved to the place where he now lives. Mrs. Caldwell died June 22, 1838. By this marriage there were seven children, as follows: Elizabeth Jane, born February 23, 1829, married Dwight Calhoun, October 29, 1848, and now lives near Kenton, Hardin county, Ohio; has six children. Isaac M., born February 2, 1830, married Sophronia Morris, November 7, 1852, died May 4, 1863, in camp, near Memphis, Tennessee. His widow, with three children, lives in Pickaway township, Pickaway county, Ohio. Robert, born February 22, 1831, married Cynthia Pinneo, August, 1856. He now lives in Sheldon, Illinois; has three children. William Lewis, born March 12, 1832, married Alvina Tobias, October, 1860, and died July 8, 1876. His widow lives in Sheldon, Illinois, and has five children. Amos B., born December 17, 1833, married first, Margaret Pinneo, and second (February 13, 1866), Lovinia Holmes, and is now a resident of Sheldon, Illinois. He has five children, one by his first wife. John Wesley, born February 11, 1835, married Virilla Shoecraft, June, 1867. He is at present superintendent of public works, of Seymour, Indiana. He has one child living, and one deceased. Sarah B., born June 22, 1837; died, March 19, 1838.

Mr. Caldwell was married November 12, 1839, to Rebecca McClellan, daughter of Thomas and Ann (Kinnear) McClellan, who was born February 13, 1810. The fruit of this marriage was three children, the eldest of whom, born August 19, 1840, died in infancy. Ann Maria, born November 24, 1841, is unmarried, and is at present a teacher, with her brother, in the schools at Seymour, Indiana. Thomas McClellan, the youngest, was born June 20, 1843, and died September 23, 1852.

Mr. Caldwell has filled the office of township clerk of Pickaway for a number of years, and served as justice of the peace three successive terms, beginning in 1836. He has given all of his children a fair education, two of whom—John Wesley and Ann Maria—having graduated, in 1861, respectively, at Ohio Wesleyan university, and Ohio Wesleyan female college, Delaware, Ohio.

Mr. Caldwell is a devoted member of the Methodist Episcopal church, of which he is a liberal supporter, and enjoys the universal respect of his fellow citizens.

JOHN CALDWELL.

MRS. JOHN CALDWELL.

RESIDENCE OF JOHN CALDWELL, PICKAWAY TP., PICKAWAY CO., O.

WALNUT.*

Bounded on the north by Madison township, on the east by Fairfield county, on the south by Washington and Circleville townships, on the west by the Scioto river, and on the northwest by Walnut creek, lies Walnut, one of the most fertile and productive townships in Pickaway county. It contains a large proportion of excellent corn land, and produces, also, abundant crops of wheat, oats, and grass.

The surface is generally undulating, though the eastern part of the township is considerably more rolling than the western and central portions. The highest point is Ringgold, where an elevation of over five hundred feet above Circleville is attained. There are several mounds and ancient remains in the township, the most interesting of which are found near Ringgold. In a timbered piece of land on the farm of Mr. Snyder, are three mounds, of conical shape, in a nearly straight line east and west, and only a few rods from each other, each from twelve to fifteen feet in height. A few rods to the east of these mounds is a slight depression in the surface of the ground, in the form of an exact circle, of about two hundred feet in circumference and four or five feet in width. Old residents report that the ditch, when first seen by them, forty or fifty years ago, was several feet deep, and that it was surrounded by an embankment, but no traces of this are now discernible. On the farm of Mrs. Spade, in the same vicinity, is a similar specimen of antiquity, though the ditch is less distinct. The mounds above described are hollowed out, and are full of stone, and in the early settlement of the township were inhabited by countless numbers of snakes, of almost every variety of species, and the place was called "snakes' den," and it is still so designated. The reptiles would crawl out in the spring of the year and infest every portion of the township during the summer, returning to their nests in the fall, and such a pest did they become, that it was necessary, finally, to attack them in their nests and destroy them.

WATER COURSES AND TIMBER.

The principal stream is Little Walnut creek, which flows a general east and west course through the township, uniting with Walnut creek in section eighteen. Its main branch is Turkey run, which, rising in Fairfield county, enters the township on section thirteen, flows in a westerly direction until it reaches section sixteen, when its course lies northwest, entering the parent stream in the north part of that section.

The original varities of timber consisted principally of walnut, maple, oak, butternut, hickory, and a large proportion of wild cherry of splendid growth, many of the trees measuring five or six feet through. There was also a great deal of buckeye, but it was not valued as timber, and the tree proved very unwholesome to the cattle, which ate freely of the branches and nuts, and sickened, and sometimes died, in consequence.

SETTLEMENT.

Tradition relates that several years prior to the arrival of the first settler, a company of six men, from Virginia, had visited the township, making the journey in a canoe. They started out to explore the country with the view of selecting a place for settlement, and halted only when they reached section sixteen in what is now Walnut township, Pickaway county. Here they made an encampment, cleared off a small piece of ground, trapped and hunted a few months, and then returned to Virginia. When the pioneer, Williamson, came he erected his cabin on the spot where the party had camped.

The pioneer settler in Walnut was William Williamson, who came into its forests from Hampshire county, Virginia, in the spring of 1797 or 1798. He leased some school land in section sixteen, and, assisted by his brothers, Cornelius and John, who came out with him, erected a cabin and put in six or seven acres of corn, on land now constituting a part of the farm of Joshua Hedges. In the fall they returned to Virginia, and the following winter William brought out his family, consisting of his wife and one small child. The parents performed the entire journey on foot, carrying the child in their arms, while the few goods they had were transported on a packhorse. Williamson's cabin stood on the site of the old log-and-frame dwelling of Jabez Hedges, about thirty rods northeast of the present brick residence of Joshua Hedges. Tere he lived until 1812, when he bought the northwest quarter of section fifteen, to which he removed, and which he made his permanent residence. Williamson was born in Hampshire county, Virginia, June 23, 1768, and was, consequently, about twenty-eight years of age when he came into the township. He died June 17, 1844, and is buried in the old burying-ground, a short distance north of where he first lived. His wife, Sarah, died October 13, 1831, aged fifty-two years. The names of the children of this pioneer family, mentioned in the order of their births, are as follows: John, Eliza, Maria, Hiram, Mary, Mahala, and Jackson—all born in this township, with the exception of John. Eliza became the wife of John Kimble; Maria, of Jabez Hedges; Mary, of Williamson, her cousin; and Mahala, of Theophilus Nicholson. Cornelius Williamson and family moved out a short time after his return to Virginia, and located near the site of the old graveyard previously mentioned. A child died soon after, and the family, thinking the new country sickly, went back to Virginia, In about 1830, however, they came out again, and made a permanent settlement. John Williamson, sr., father of William and Cornelius, with his family, joined the settlement in 1815.

William and Joseph Buck and their families, originally from Pennsylvania, removed to this State from Kentucky, and arrived in the township about a year after Williamson. William took a lease, for seven years, of about thirty acres in section sixteen. At the expiration of his lease he removed from the township, going south, somewhere on the Mississippi river. Joseph Buck entered one hundred and sixty acres in section eighteen, where he resided until his death, about 1808. His life was cut short by accident. He was testing a mowing scythe, which he had just "hung," when Henry Reader, his neighbor, passing by the field in which he was at work, was asked to stop and try it. He did so. The first stroke he made the scythe choked, and, in forcing it through the grass, the point struck Buck, who was standing near, in the back of the leg, just above the knee. An artery was severed and he bled to death in the field before surgical aid could be obtained.

James Martin settled, as early as 1798, in section thirty-three, on land now occupied by John Reber. Mr. Martin came from Pennsylvania. He had two sons and several daughters, one of whom became the wife of Andrew Cradlebaugh, a former resident of Circleville, and whose son, Colonel John Cradlebaugh, was a prominent member of the bar of that city.

Abraham Crist settled, about the year 1800, where Stevenson Peters now lives. He had a saw-mill there in an early day, with a run of stone for grinding. The machinery was run by a tread-wheel, propelled by a yoke of oxen. He had also a small distillery, which he operated until his death—in 1833 or 1834. He was taking a load of whiskey to Circleville, and while watering his team at Hargus creek, the horses became frightened in some way and ran over him, causing his death.

William Ward and family came from Pendleton county, Virginia, in the spring of 1802. The family consisted of his wife and seven children; a married daughter remaining behind. They came to Wheeling by wagon, and thence on a flat-boat to Portsmouth. From Portsmouth they journeyed, through the almost trackless forest, with team and wagon. Ward settled on three hundred acres in section seventeen, and moved into a cabin until then occupied by William Buck, a squatter, who vacated on the arrival of Ward. The daughter, Elizabeth, with her family, came out about a year afterward, and remained about two years on section eight, when they returned to Virginia. The other children were Charles, William, Robert, Mary, James, George, and Richard. Charles, William, George, and Robert settled in Fairfield county. Mary died unmarried. James married Elizabeth Brobst, and settled on a part of the old homestead. He died in 1863. Four of his sons live in this township—William, Peter, Josiah, and Daniel. Richard Ward married Mary Rout, and settled on the old homestead. Two sons—William Harvey and Sidner J.—are at present residing in Walnut.

In 1803 John Morris moved in and settled on a quarter section in number thirty-three, the farm being now owned by Johnson Bowman. The only settler then in this portion of the township was James Martin, who adjoined him on the north. Morris occupied his original location until his death. A son—Ezekiel—resides in Washington, aged seventy-eight years, and James in Walnut. John died June 5, 1877, and his widow occupies the farm.

Thomas Longworth settled a short distance north of the present residence of John Haas, near where the old graveyard now is, in about 1803. He had a large family, but none of them are now left.

Joshua Hedges, with his wife, and eleven children, came into the country in 1804. They came with team and wagon from Berkeley county, Virginia, their native place, to Brownsville, Pennsylvania, a town on the Monongahela river. There they loaded everything on to a flat-boat, and traveled thus to Marietta, and thence by wagon, over the rough and almost impassable roads, to Zanesville. Their household goods, which were packed in eight or nine large trunks, were left at Marietta, to be shipped up the Muskingum. The shipping agent neglected to send them for several weeks, leaving them exposed to the weather, and the goods were utterly destroyed. The family went to Lancaster in Fairfield county, where they made a temporary location, arriving the seventeenth day of May, of the above year. Mr. Hedges died there the same summer, and in the fall the family came to Walnut. They put up a cabin on section nine, which, with other lands, the father had entered, and moved into it on Christmas day. In 1812, Mrs. Hedges married Henry Dreisbach, of Pickaway township, and moved with him to Bloomfield, where they kept a tavern. The children of Joshua Hedges were Joshua, jr., John, Obed, Jabez, Cynthia, Phebe, Rhoda, Julia, Cyrus, Morgan and William. All are now dead but Jabez. He was born December 28, 1789, near Martinsburg, Virginia. He married Maria Williamson, and first settled on Walnut creek, but in 1829 moved to his present location in section sixteen. His wife died May 13, 1868, and he now lives with his son Joshua. Mr. Hedges was a volunteer for a few months, in the war of 1812, but lay sick most of the time at Fort McArthur.

William Tallman, a Pennsylvanian, settled where Absalom A. Peters now lives, section twenty-four, about the year 1805. He possessed considerable means when he arrived, and subsequently owned a large amount of land. He died in Royalton, Fairfield county, but his body was brought to Walnut, and buried on the farm. He was the father of Judge George Tallman, formerly a resident of New Holland, this county.

Richard Hooker, son-in-law of Tallman, came from Brownsville, Pennsylvania, in 1805, and settled a short distance north of Ringgold, where he resided until some time after the war of 1812, when he returned to Pennsylvania. He was a man of superior ability, and served several terms in the State legislature.

Jacob Hoover, from Pendleton county, Virginia, came to Ohio in 1805. He entered the southeast quarter of section five, and settled where his son, Christian Hoover, now lives. The old log cabin, into which the family moved so long ago, is still standing, but not in its original location. He died there in 1825, aged forty-seven. Mrs. Hoover lived until the age of eighty-four, having died only a few years since. Their children were: Sarah (now Mrs. Aucker); Elias (deceased); Elizabeth; Martha (deceased); Christian; Ann M.; Mary, wife of Lewis Rhodes; Peter (dead); and Nancy, wife of Philip Glick.

Alexander Frasier, a Scotchman, located on the same section, soon after Hoover; finally went to Madison township, where he died.

In 1806, Joash Miller and family came from Berkeley county, Virginia, into Walnut, and made their location where Jacob Hines now lives. A son, Joseph, married Phebe Hedges, and settled on the place now occupied by Elkanah Humble. Peter Miller married a daughter of Lewis Scothorn, and occupied a part of the old homestead. Jacob Hines and Elkanah Humble married daughters of Joash Miller.

Benjamin Bowman and family came from Greene county, Pennsylvania, in 1802, and settled on the Pickaway plains, where he remained several years, and then came to Walnut and entered a quarter section, where his son John now lives. He died September 29, 1816, and was buried on the farm. He had eight children, two of whom—John and Mrs. Joseph Bowman—are among the oldest residents of the township. John married Ruth, daughter of William Brown, and has raised a family of eight children, as follows: Harriet (Mrs. Grandstaff) resides in Indiana; Emily is the wife of Harvey A. Blue; Benjamin, residing in Illinois, and William, deceased, were both, formerly, auditors of Pickaway county; Eliza (Mrs. Newman), Mary Jane (wife of William M. Peters), and Richard M. J., reside in Walnut.

William Brown and family, his son Samuel and family, and several sons-in-law and their families, came from Huntingdon county, Pennsylvania, in the fall of 1806. Mr. Brown, sr., entered considerable land in Walnut township, and divided it among his sons. After residing in the township many years he removed to Hancock county, and died there, at the age of more than ninety years. All of his children, after living in the township for longer or shorter periods, moved to Hancock county, with the exception of William, who permanently settled in Walnut, and Mrs. B. Brown, who went to the coal regions. Two children of William Brown, jr., now live in Walnut, viz.: William, on the homestead, and Mrs. John Bowman. Obed died April 2, 1866, but his widow (Delilah Snyder) is still living.

Lewis Scothorn settled on Turkey run, in section fourteen, in 1806. He came from Rockingham county, Virginia, bringing his family and goods on pack-horses. He was a very successful hunter, and many a deer fell a victim to his unerring rifle. He dressed their skins and made them into moccasins, which he found a ready market for among the settlers. He died in Fairfield, in 1816. His widow subsequently went to Hancock county, where she died at an advanced age. His son, Lewis, a resident of the township, was born January 31, 1812, and married Susannah Westenhaver, who died in May, 1850.

Another son, Joseph, married Hannah Crum, and, subsequently, purchased and settled where Ashton Whitehead lives. He finally removed near Ashville, and made a permanent location on land now owned by Ezra Hedges.

Jacob Beery was the earliest settler in the northeast part of the township. He arrived from Northampton county, Pennsylvania, in 1807, and settled where his son, David Beery, now lives, where he continued to reside until his death, in 1845. His widow died in March, 1866, having reached the advanced age of nearly eighty-eight years. Their three children—Sarah, Lydia and David—came in with them, and they all subsequently married into the family of Jacob Scleich. The wife of David (Harriet Scleich) died January 18, 1863. They had ten children, nine of whom are living.

J. C. Peters came from Berkeley county, Virginia, near Winchester, in 1808. He settled in Walnut, and resided here until 1825, when he moved to Madison township, on section thirty-three. William L. Peters still lives on the southeast quarter of the same section. Mr. Peters was married twice, and had, by his first wife, fourteen children, and by his second, two. William Peters married Susannah Hoffhine, and to them have been born six children: John N., Harriet A., George S., Francis J., Edward A. and James P. Mr. Peters had one child (now dead) by a previous marriage.

George Brinker, then eighteen years of age, came to Ohio in 1810. After working out by the month for some time, he married Mary Shope, and settled on the southeast quarter of section number three, which, with other lands, his step-father had taken up and failed to pay for. He was twice married, and was the father of twelve children. His mother married, for her second husband, Jacob Shaffer, and they were early settlers in Madison township. They moved from thence to Upper Sandusky, where he died, and she came to Walnut, and died at the house of her son, George, whom she survived. Two sons of George Brinker—Barnabas and George, jr.—reside in Walnut.

John Peninger and family, Jesse Morral and Mary Harrold, came from Pendleton county, Virginia, in 1810, and about the same time William Morral and his family. Peninger settled on Dry run, near Emanuel church. Jesse Morral and Miss Harrold were united in marriage soon after their arrival, and their marriage is the second recorded in the records of Pickaway county. He first located in section twenty one, but afterwards moved to the southeast quarter of section sixteen. He subsequently lived in Harrison and Madison townships, but finally came back to Walnut, and died on the Hoover place, in 1824. His wife died in 1831. They raised two children, Robert J. and Fidelia, several having died in infancy. Robert married Martha Hott, and settled where he now resides, on section seventeen. Fidelia became the wife of William Smith, and lives in Illinois.

Henry Hott, father of Mrs. Morral, with his family, and several brothers, came from Hampshire county, Virginia, in 1812. He located on the northwest quarter of section eighteen, on land now owned by Ezra Hedges, and resided there until his death. Two of his brothers settled in Harrison township.

George Groce, a native of Maryland, and his wife, Catharine, emigrated to Ohio, directly after the close of the war of 1812. He first located at Circleville, and built the third house in the town. A few years after, he settled in Walnut, where his son, Allen Groce, now lives. He died in October, 1857, aged nearly seventy-six; his wife's death occurred many years previous. John, Allen and Amos, his sons, now reside in Walnut, and a daughter, Mrs. Samuel Crites, lives in Fairfield county.

Charles Duryea emigrated from Cumberland, Maryland, to this township, with his family, about the year 1812. He never owned any land, and frequently changed his location. Thomas, his son, married Nancy Williamson, daughter of John Williamson, and first located a short distance northeast of Nebraska.

Benjamin Trone, in 1813, when thirteen years old, came from Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, to Walnut, and the same year his father and family came from New Jersey, and settled on the southwest quarter of section eleven. A number of years after he sold his farm to his son, Asa, and after a residence of some twelve years in Royalton, removed to Circleville. Benjamin settled on eighty acres of his father's farm. He died in 1860. He was twice married, and was the father of seven children, of whom Harvey and Asa now reside in the township. His widow, aged seventy-three, lives with her son, Asa.

Paul Cromley settled where his son, Jonas, now lives, in section ten, in 1813. He came, with his family, from Lehigh county, Pennsylvania. His surviving children are: Jonas, the eldest of the family, now aged seventy-six; William, sr., and Mary, widow of Peter Hoover. Stephen died in 1871, aged sixty-five; Elizabeth died unmarried; Catharine married Peter Westenhaver. The youngest son was Thomas. Paul Cromley purchased his land on which he first located of James and John Cromley, who were also early settlers here.

Hugh Creighton, a native of Ireland, moved to this State from Pennsylvania, in 1804. He resided two or three years at Zanesville, and then settled in Bloomfield, this county. In 1816, he came to Walnut, and bought of Jeremiah Smith one hundred acres in the southeast part of section nine, now owned by Mrs. Peter Hoover. He subsequently located on Walnut creek, in the northwest part of the township, and, with his son, Samuel, built the mills now owned by Mr. Spindler. He finally moved to Fairfield county, near Lithopolis, where he died, in 1858, in his eighty-fifth year. His wife was eighty-seven at her death, surviving her husband eight years. They had four sons, and a daughter, now widow of Cyrus Hedges, and residing in Walnut. Two of the sons survive—Samuel, in Lithopolis, and Joseph, a Methodist minister, at present presiding elder of the Chillicothe district. William, the oldest, was among the early pioneers of Iowa. Henry was murdered by his wife, in January, 1877. She was convicted of manslaughter, and sentenced to the State penitentiary for three years.

Tunis Peters came from Hampshire county, Virginia, in the fall of 1817, and spent the following winter in a cabin which stood on the farm now owned by George Keiger. In the spring of 1818 he bought and settled on eighty acres in section thirty-five, now owned by Amos Groce. In his later years he removed to Logan, Hocking county, where he died in 1826. His son, Absalom A. Peters, aged seventy-six years, resides in Walnut, within half a mile of the site of the cabin in which he spent his first winter in Ohio, sixty-two years ago.

Michael Blue emigrated to Ohio from Hampshire county, Virginia, in 1812. He resided a number of years in Fairfield county, and then came to Walnut. He died at the residence of his son John, at the age of nearly eighty years. His wife survived him five or six years, and died at the age of eighty-two. Their children were: Tunis, deceased; Francina, now widow of John Williams, living in Illinois; Jonathan, in Harrison township, Pickaway county, unmarried; Harvey A., who married Emily Bowman, and is a resident of this township; Louisa and Michael, who died young; Abigail (deceased), who was the wife of Henry Whitemer, of East Ringgold; Catharine, deceased; Absalom, living in Illinois; Deborah, who became the wife of John Smith; John, resident of Fairfield county; and William, dead.

Samuel Peters and family came from Baltimore, Maryland, during the war of 1812, and settled in Fairfield county, where he died in 1829, and his wife Mary in 1861, in her eighty-eighth year. They had thirteen children, viz.: Henry, Robinson J., Nathan, Wesley, Rachel, Stevenson, Leah, Mary, Andrew, Gideon, Elizabeth, Louis S., and Ebenezer. Rachel is now the widow of William Brumfield; Leah is the wife of Broad Cole; Mary is the widow of Daniel Walters; Elizabeth is the wife of Newton Williamson. All the children are living except Gideon, who died February 26, 1844, and nine of them are each over seventy years of age.

Jacob Westenhaver came to Ohio from near Martinsburg, Virginia, in 1806. He spent the first winter with his father-in-law, Joash Miller, in this township, when he went to Chillicothe, and remained for a short time. He then located in Jefferson, Pickaway township, this county, and subsequently settled in Circleville, where he erected one of the first buildings in the town. He finally came to Walnut and settled in section three, and died there in 1847, his wife surviving him. They were the parents of eight children, three of whom—Mrs. Ashbroon, Mrs. Culp, and Emanuel—reside in Walnut.

Zachariah Pritchett, his wife, and two children, came to Ohio from Sussex county, Delaware, in 1824, performing the journey with a horse and cart. They remained near Kingston, Ross county, until fall, when they went to Harrison township and located on Walnut creek. Subsequently they came to this township and purchased eighty acres in section twenty-one, where John Reber now resides. They removed to their present location in the fall of 1836, where the father died in March, 1877.

Isaac Weaver settled in Walnut, on the farm now owned by Emanuel Snyder, in the winter of 1827. His parents came from Rockingham county, Virginia, when he was ten years of age, and settled in Richland county, Ohio. He resided there until he was twenty-five years of age, when he married Sarah Fetters and removed to this township. He lived in Walnut until the fall of 1869, when he sold to Mr. Snyder and moved to Circleville, where he now resides, at the age of seventy-eight. He is the father of nine children—David, Louisa, Philip, William, John, Elizabeth, Mary Jane, Susannah, and Samuel. David is engaged in merchandising at Nebraska, in this township; Louisa (afterwards Mrs. Matthew Kelley), is deceased; Philip is a farmer, and resides in this township; William is one of the firm of Lynch & Weaver, grocers, in Circleville; John lives in Arkansas; Elizabeth resides in Walnut, and is the wife of Norman Peters; Mary Jane is the wife of Thomas Stofer, of Circleville; Susannah, wife of Thomas Johnson, and Samuel, live in Illinois.

David Kershner came from Lehigh county, Pennsylvania, in 1821. He kept bachelor's hall for seven years, in Bloom township, Fairfield county. He bought thirty acres of land there, which he cleared up. He married Rebecca Alsbach, and three years after sold out and bought the place on which he now lives.

Daniel Snyder settled where his son William now lives, in 1834, emigrating from Pennsylvania. He died soon after his settlement. His widow, aged nearly eighty-seven, resides with her son, Emanuel Snyder.

John May came from Maryland, in the spring of 1836. His mother, Catharine May, and five children, came out nine years before. Mr. May bought the farm now occupied by Jacob Martin, and lived there until the fall of 1860, when he moved to Ringgold, where he has since resided. He is now aged eighty-four. Charles May, who came to Ohio with the mother, in 1827, made a settlement in Walnut. He has been twice married; now lives in Illinois.

EARLY SCHOOLS.

The first school-house in Walnut, according to Mr. Hedges' recollection, stood a short distance north of the old graveyard, in section sixteen, where Joseph Leesman, Asa England, Joshua Baker and Philip Gatewood kept at an early date. A little log school-house was built just east of where Monroe Scothorn now lives, shortly afterwards, in which Hugh Hannagan, Hugh Creighton and others were early teachers. These buildings were constructed of logs, of course, with stick chimney, puncheon floor and door and clapboard roof. One whole end was required for the fireplace. The light was admitted by means of a "window" in each side of the house, made by cutting out the half of two logs nearly the entire length of the house, and sticks placed in the opening, over which oiled or greased paper was pasted. Along each window was a rough board, which rested on wooden pins, stuck into the logs, and constituted a desk at which the scholars sat when engaged in writing. The seats were merely split slabs, supported by wooden pins. In this manner the school-houses were built for a number of years after the first settlement of the country. A school-house was erected on the section line between numbers twenty-two and twenty-three, in 1810, in which the first teacher was a man by the name of Adison. John Bowman and wife (formerly Ruth Brown), still living in the neighborhood, attended this school. A school was kept by John Wilson, as early as 1823, in a little cabin on the farm now owned by William Reed. Lewis Scothorn and Barnabas Brinker were scholars of this school. A hewed-log school-house was soon after erected on the hill, a short distance southwest of this cabin, and Edward Kennedy taught the first school therein.

CHURCHES.

THE METHODISTS.

Members of the Methodist Episcopal faith established public worship in the township at an early date, the earliest meetings being held at the dwellings, successively, of Noah Jones, Moses Oman and George Brinker, and, in the eastern part of the township, at Jacob Longabaugh's and widow Cole's. The Hedges' chapel class was organized at the house of George Brinker, in 1841, and consisted of the following members: Thomas Young and wife, Shadrach Cole and five children, James Hoyman, George Brinker and wife, John Knight, wife, and sister, Betsey, Lewis Fridley, wife and daughters, Hannah and Catharine, Cyrus Hedges, his wife, Jane and daughters, Ann D. (now Mrs. Smith), and Cynthia, Eli Hines and wife, Sarah Payton and daughters, and Gideon Cummings. The Revs. James Gilworth and Thomas Hurd were then on the circuit, and Shadrach Cole was local preacher. The first class leader was Thomas Young, whose efficiency and devotion to his work is fondly mentioned by his few remaining associates. The chapel was built in 1843, its erection being largely attributable to the energy and liberality of Cyrus Hedges, who donated the ground, in addition to his subscription of fifty dollars. The house was dedicated by Rev. Joseph Trimble. The Sabbath-school of this church was formed in the spring of 1844, with John Spindler as superintendent.

The Union Methodist Episcopal church was formed some time between the years 1825 and '30, the following named persons being the constituent members, to wit.: William Tallman and wife, Andrew Trone and wife, Jacob Longabaugh and wife, Wesley Peters and wife, James Clark and wife, and Martin Barnhart and wife. The meetings continued to be held at Mrs. Cole's, as previously mentioned, until the erection of a church in the year 1835, for which William Tallman gave the land. Mr. Lewis S. Peters, who has officiated for many years as local preacher, united with the class when the meetings were held at widow Cole's. The first church building was a small brick structure, which, as the class increased in membership, became inadequate to the needs of the society, and, about fifteen years after its erection, it was torn down, and on the same site the present brick house was built. The church, in its most prosperous days, numbered nearly one hundred members, but it now consists of only seven or eight

THE EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION.

Mount Zion's church, formerly called the Cinser church, was organized at the house of Solomon Cinser, in 1830. Cinser and wife, John Bridagum and wife, Jacob Rife and wife, Valentine Reber and wife, were the original members. Meetings were held at the house of Mr. Cinser until 1840, when the frame church, on the south line of the township, was erected. This, is said, by an old member, to be the first church edifice erected by the denomination west of the Allegheny mountains.

Emanuel church was formed about the year 1832, with the following named members: John Tobias and wife, Peter Tobias and wife, John Hittle and wife, and Peter Moyer and wife. Meetings were held at the dwellings of the members until the church in the southeast corner of section twenty-eight, was built. This was in 184–. The present pastors are Revs. C. M. Reinehold and A. Evans.

THE UNITED BRETHREN.

A class was organized at the house of James Ward, in 1833. The meetings were held there for some time, and then in a log school-house, on the bank of the creek, near the present covered bridge. A log school-house was afterwards built where the brick now stands, in district number four, when the class met there for worship. This was in 1845. A revival, under the preaching of Rev. Isaac Kretzenger, the circuit preacher, soon followed, resulting in the addition of quite a number to the church; and the need of a suitable house of worship was felt. A mound, supposed to be of artificial construction, in the south part of section seventeen, was seleeted as the site. Some five or six feet of the top of the mound was leveled down, and a frame building erected thereon. The church, at the suggestion of Robert J. Morrall, one of the members who selected the location, was christened "Mount Hermon church." In 1875, the old building was removed (and is now occupied by Jacob Smith as a dwelling) to give place to the present frame structure. The church now has a membership of about sixty, Daniel Bonebrake being the pastor.

A class formerly existed in the Pontius neighborhood, but it disbanded in 1845, and the members, then only five or six in number, united with the Mount Hermon class. The Sabbath-school of this church was organized as a union school, in the hewed-log school-house, now used as a dwelling house by Daniel Litton, in 1843 or '44, with Henry Pontius superintendent.

The Bethlehem church was organized at the house of John Hager, in 1835, with the following members: John Hager, wife, and son Peter, Silas Warn and wife, Samuel Weakley and wife, Thomas Duryea and wife, and Nathan Beaver. Meetings were held at the residence of John Hager until the erection of the church, in 1840.

A class was formed at the dwelling of John May, on the farm now occupied by Jacob Martin, in 1838 or 1839, by Rev. William McCabe. They held their services there for some time, until the class became large, when it was divided, and one part met for worship at the house of John Morris, and the other in the Albright church on the town line, which some of the members assisted in erecting. The two classes subsequently reunited and continued their meetings in the Albright church until 1874, when the Bethany church building in Washington was erected.

The East Ringgold class was organized in 1860 by Rev. Thomas Forsyth, and was composed of the following members: John May and wife, Elizabeth Spade, Adaline and Catharine Peters, and John Bridagum. The frame church, erected by members of the German Reformed church, at the Ritter burying-ground, was purchased and moved to its present location in East Ringgold. Since the Rev. Mr. McCabe, the following ministers have preached on this circuit: Jacob Alsbaugh, Joshua Montgomery, Pleasant Brock, Joseph Yarnell, William Fisher, Wilson Cones, William Cones, William Kern, Joseph Buckwalter, E. Vanderman, William Miller, Thomas Forsyth, Joseph Huffine, —— Eastep, Lemuel Montgomery, Joseph Brundage, William Burnsworth, Samuel Whitmore, George Humplman, Joseph Brown, Baker Gillespie, Nathaniel Smith, and Peter Waggoner, who is still on the circuit. There are thirty-two names on the class-book, but the actual membership is much less, having been reduced by removals and deaths. John May is leader.

WARNER CHURCH, of the German Reformed and Evangelical Lutheran denominations, was built in 1839. The land, consisting of over five acres, was donated by Henry Warner, one of the members, in consequence of which the church was named for him. The deed of conveyance was to George Pontious, Henry Spade, Henry Warner, and Martin Falk, trustees of the church, and their successors. The preacher, at the time of the erection of the church, was Rev. Henry King, and the deacons were John Glentzer, Henry Heffner, Philip Leist, and Solomon Stout. Soon after the erection of the building, certain forms of worship were sought to be introduced by some of the German Reformed members, which, being considered as innovations upon their principles and practices by the other portion, met with opposition, resulting, finally, in a split. The former withdrew, and erected a frame building at the Ritter burying-ground, half a mile northeast of Ringgold. This branch of the society subsequently disbanded, and the building was sold to the United Brethren, who removed into Ringgold. The Warner church contains a membership of about one hundred and forty, the Lutherans composing much the larger portion.

In 1842 a German Reformed clergyman, by the name of Strickland, came into the township from Pennsylvania, and preached at some of the dwellings of the inhabitants and at the school-house, which stood a short distance north of the site of Hedges' chapel. He organized a society, and afterward returned East. He was followed by a minister by the name of Phillips, during whose labors the North Union church was built, in 1844. The church was erected by the inhabitants generally, without respect to any particular denomination, and ministers of different faiths officiated in its pulpit. In the spring of 1851, a United Brethren class was formed, and used the church for a number of years, when the organization was broken up. The building has not been used for religious meetings for ten or twelve years.

FIRST SABBATH-SCHOOL.

Hugh Creighton was the pioneer in Sabbath-school work in Walnut. As early as 1822 or 1823 he kept a day-school in the log school-house which stood just east of the present site of Monroe Scothorn's residence, and on the Sabbath he would collect the children together for religious instruction, although no regular organization was formed. After the removal of the school-house, as previously mentioned, a school was organized by Mr. Creighton, but it continued in existence only a short time.

FIRST BURYING-GROUND.

The first place selected by the pioneers of Walnut for the burial of their dead, was the "sixteenth burying-ground," situated on the bank of the creek, in the north part of section sixteen. The first burial—and probably the first death—in the township, was that of a child of Cornelius Williamson. The grave is unmarked, and the exact date of the event is not known, although it was prior to 1800. The oldest inscription is that on the tombstone of Mary, daughter of William and Nancy Ward, who died September 20, 1802, at the age of twenty-one years.

POST-OFFICE.

A post-office was established at Nebraska, in 1853, with Andrew Hedges as postmaster, the name of the office being "Hedges' Store." When Hedges sold his store to Thomas Gregg, in the spring of 1856, William Nicholson became postmaster, and continued to act until the summer of 1857, when Caleb Brobst assumed the duties of the office. D. F. Weaver, the present incumbent, was appointed in the summer of 1859, and the name changed to Nebraska. Mr. Weaver has held the position of postmaster over twenty consecutive years.

The office at East Ringgold was established in 1855. The first postmaster was W. C. Finkel, afterwards probate judge, who kept the office in the house which is now the dwelling of Louis Heckman. On his removal to Circleville, in 1862, he resigned his commission, and was succeeded by W. S. Heim, who officiated for about a year, when Dr. E. C. Witt was appointed, and served until 1871. S. H. Tobias was the next incumbent, holding the position a few years, and was followed, for a shorter term, by J. J. Kershner. William M. Peters, the present postmaster, was commissioned in the summer of 1878.

O. E. Niles was the first mail-carrier through Walnut, or rather the Lindsey boys, who carried it for Niles. They carried the mail on horseback, the route extending from Circleville to Lithopolis, through East Ringgold, Nebraska, and Teegardins, in Madison.

THE FIRST STORE

in Walnut was started in 1834 by Edward Kennedy, in a small hewed-log building, near where the barn of Elkanah Humble now stands.

A store was established at Nebraska by Andrew Hedges, in 1853; he sold out to Thomas Gregg, in the spring of 1856, and Gregg to Caleb Brobst, in July, 1857.

In June, 1859, W. J. & D. F. Weaver bought out Brobst and continued together until August, 1864, when D. F. Weaver purchased the interest of his brother, and has continued in trade until the present time. In February, 1879, he took in his son, A. E. Weaver, as a partner, and the firm name is, now, D. F. Weaver & Son. The new store building was erected in the spring of 1874.

The store at Ringgold we mentioned in connection with that village.

MILLS AND OTHER INDUSTRIES.

The first mill in the township was a saw-mill built by Richard Ward in 1811 or 1812, on the Little Walnut, in section seventeen. In 1815 Ward sold it to Jabez Hedges, who run it four or five years, when he sold the property to George Hoover, who let it run down, and, finally, abandoned it. The next saw-mill was put up by James Bell on Turkey run, in section fourteen, as early as 1816 or 1817. William Williamson had a saw-mill on Little Walnut, in section sixteen, as early as 1825, which he operated until his death. Subsequent to the above, many other saw-mills had been built, which are not now in existence.

The first grist-mill was built by John Hager, sr. He and his wife came from Hagerstown Maryland, in 1803, making the journey on foot, and carrying all their worldly goods in a pocket-handkerchief. Hager subsequently entered section fourteen, and, notwithstanding the little he had to begin with, finally accumulated considerable property. A few years after his arrival he built a small log grist-mill on Little Walnut, a short distance east of the frame grist-mill of Samuel Campbell, the remains of which can yet be seen. The mill now owned by Mr. Campbell, Hager built about 1814, although, in 185—, it was rebuilt by his son, John, to whom the father gave the property. Thomas Duryea bought it in 1844, and, since then, it has passed through many hands, Samuel Campbell, as before mentioned, now owning it.

James Bell had a grist-mill on Turkey run, in the southeast quarter of section fourteen, as early as 1818. He run it a number of years, and his sons, after his death. Isaac Stout subsequently operated it for a great many years. The building is still standing. David Glick had formerly a mill in operation on Little Walnut; near the east line of the township.

The mills of John M. Spindler were established by Hugh Creighton & Son. The dam was put in and the saw-mill erected, as previously stated, in 1838. In 1846 a grist-mill of two run of stone was added. Some two years after the erection of the grist-mill Creighton & Son sold the property to Joseph Deitz, who operated the mills two years, and, failing to pay for the property, it was purchased by the present owner. Mr. Spindler has used the grist-mill chiefly as a hominy mill, in the manufacture of which article he has built up a considerable trade.

There are, at the present time, four saw-mills in the township, all of them steam mills, with the exception of that of J. M. Spindler, on the big Walnut. The latter was erected by Hugh Creighton & Son, in 1838.

The saw-mill at East Ringgold was originally built by Aaron Stuckey. In 1871, Absalom A. Peters bought it, tore it down, and rebuilt it. About a year ago he sold it to his son-in-law, A. L. Peters, who now owns it.

The mills of Lewis Scothorn and Emanuel Westenhaver were both built in 1877.

The leading industry for many years in Walnut was the manufacture of whiskey. Almost every farmer had a small copper still, and the "liquid poison" was almost as abundant as water. There have been more manufactories of this kind built in the township than in all the rest of the county. The writer is informed by R. J. Morral that from a certain point of view upon his farm, the sites of thirty-four former distilleries can be seen. Of course, the effect of the business upon the moral and material interests of the community was extremely detrimental, and it was not until the Ohio canal was built, when an outlet was had for the surplus production of the corn and rye of the farmers, that it began to be abandoned.

A machine and general repair shop was started by Henry Smith, near the location of the present residence of E. P. Griner, in 1842. He removed to his present location, in section twenty-nine, in 1877, and continues the business which he has carried on for so many years.

The carriage and repair shop of Enos Longabaugh, near Bethlehem church, was established in 1873. The business is conducted by Samuel M. Miller.

PHYSICIANS.

The first doctor resident within the township was Dr. Josiah Luckey, who came in soon after the close of the war of 1812. He was then unmarried, but subsequently he married Esther, daughter of James Williams, and fixed his residence at Nebraska. He remained a few years and then removed from the township.

In 1820, Dr. William Turner, from Maryland, settled on Big Walnut, and practiced his profession in this and adjoining townships until his death, which occurred a few years after his settlement.

Dr. P. Pence located at East Ringgold, in 1845, and practiced medicine until 1850. Dr. E. C. Witt was also a practitioner there, but at what time, we are unable to state.

Dr. John T. Jones, recently deceased, was a practitioner of medicine in this township for a period of nearly thirty years. He began the study of medicine with Dr. A. W. Thompson, now of Circleville, in 1840, and subsequently graduated at Ohio medical college, Cincinnati. He first began to practice at Londonderry, Ross county; afterward practiced in Kentucky, and then coming (in 1850) to this county, settled at East Ringgold. He afterward removed to Nebraska, in this township, where he resided up to the day of his death, July 3, 1879.

Dr. William T. Kennedy, a native of this county, settled at East Ringgold in January, 1875. He was educated for his profession at Starling medical college, Ohio, where he graduated in the spring of 1873. Dr. Kennedy first began to practice in Circleville, and continued there for about sixteen months, when he removed to Ringgold, where he has since resided, and been engaged in the practice of his profession.

Dr. G. E. Bragdon, of St. Lawrence county, New York, located in Walnut in March, 1878. He acquired his medical education at the University medical college, New York city, graduating in February, 1878, and had practiced in Canton, New York, for some time previous.

NEBRASKA GRANGE, NO. 64, OF THE PATRONS OF HUSBANDRY.

This society was organized June 16, 1873, with a membership of twenty-three. The first officers elected were as follows: John Courtright, master; A. C. Nothstine, overseer; Joshua Hedges, steward; John G. Haas, assistant steward; James Ward, lecturer; Lewis S. Peters, chaplain; Ezra Hedges, treasurer; John M. Spindler, secretary; James H. Moody, gate-keeper; Mrs. M. S. Courtright, stewardess; Mrs. E. A. Nothstine, ceres; Mrs. H. D. Haas, pomona; Mrs. Sarah Westenhaver, flora.

In the spring of 1874 the society built them a hall in the second story of the store of D. F. Weaver & Son, at Nebraska. The hall is a commodious one, and neatly furnished, the whole costing one thousand two hundred and fifty dollars. The membership is now seventy, the present officers being as follows: John Courtright, master; Joshua Hedges, overseer; W. A. Griner, steward; Jonathan Hay, assistant steward; John G. Haas, lecturer; L. S. Peters, chaplain; A. C. Nothstine, treasurer; R. M. J. Bowman, secretary; Leander Ward, gate-keeper; Mrs. Harriet Haas, ceres; Mrs Rebecca Hay, pomona; Mrs. M. L. Courtright, flora; Miss Bell Beckwith, stewardess.

EAST RINGGOLD.

For the following facts we are indebted to S. P. Tobias and Philip Heim.

The only village in the township of Walnut is East Ringgold, situated in the southeast part, on the Royalton pike.

The first settler there was a Mrs. Fink, who was living on the place now occupied by Levi Graumlich, in 1837, but how long before that is not known. Sebastian Miller, a German by birth, came from Pennsylvania, in 1841, and located where J. P. Leist now lives; he was a mechanic, and engaged in the business of wagon-making. His house was a one-story and a half frame, which served the double purpose of dwelling and shop, keeping the shop in the upper room.

Aaron Stuckey settled there in 1841, and in addition to other improvements, erected a steam saw-mill.

In 1842, Mrs. Sanders settled on the place now occupied by Rosanna Spade, and the same year Adam Spade located where Lewis Heckman now lives. About the same time, William Boyer, sr., took up his residence on the farm now occupied by L. F. Beck.

Lewis Heckman, who is still a resident of the place, moved in, from Springfield, Ohio, in 1846, and located where Abraham Phillips now resides.

The first store at East Ringgold was opened in the fall of 1849, by Daniel Bock, in the building now occupied by Jacob Leist. Bock purchased the estate of Sebastian Miller. A. C. Stout afterwards kept a store in the same building.

In 1851, William C. Finkel, a wagon-maker by trade, started a store in the building now occupied by Mr. Heckman. Subsequently, Philip Heim became a partner of Mr. Finkel. The partnership continued one year, when Mr. Heim bought Finkel's interest. Two years afterward he sold to his father and brother, P. & D. Heim, who carried on the business one year, when they were succeeded by Samuel Gessley, who continued about the same length of time.

John Hook began, in the spring of 1864, in a small building, now constituting a part of the dwelling of J. J. Kerschner. In 1866 he moved into the building he now occupies, which had formerly been used as a wagon and undertaker's shop by John Bridagum.

John Woodell and Solomon Tobias, established a store in the building which is now the office of Dr. Kennedy, in 1871. About a year afterward Woodell bought out his partner, and erected the building now occupied by Isaac Tobias, in which he continued until his death, about a year afterward. The building was purchased by Mr. Tobias, who opened with a new stock in the fall 1874, and has continued with success until the present.

The first school at Ringgold was kept by John Cooley, in 1838, in a log cabin, which stood on the Ritter farm.*

The town west of Silver street, was platted, in 1860, by Mr. Burget, and the remainder by John Nevy, subsequently. The place was originally called Grand View, and the name ought to have been retained, the location being one of the most picturesque in the county.

It is not now possible to give the particulars of the first election in the township, as the early records are not in existence.

Walnut was originally six miles square, but in the year —— that portion of the township lying northwest of Walnut creek was set off to Harrison, and that part of Harrison lying southeast of the creek was detached, and annexed to Walnut, making that stream the boundary line between the two townships. This was done as a matter of convenience to the people in that portion of either township lying beyond the creek, which, having no bridges, it was difficult to cross. The township now embraces four entire tiers of sections on the east side of the original surveyed township number nine, in range twenty-one (Matthew's surveys), and all of the other two tiers of sections, in the same township, except the two northwesterly sections, and a small part of sections five and eight adjoining. It also embraces all of the fractional township number two, in range twenty-two, lying south of Walnut creek, and next the river. This part of the township was, in an early day, inhabited by a very poor class of people, who came in and occupied the cabins of the large land owners, and were a source of considerable expense to the township before the county provided a place for its paupers.

* Mr. A. A. Peters says a school was kept, at a much earlier date, in a cabin where the saw-mill now stands.

The present township officers are as follows: R. M. J. Bowman, clerk; Joshua Hedges, John Courtright and Harvey Trone, trustees; William Cromley, treasurer; Henry Whitemer and Monroe Scothorn, justices of the peace.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

THE COURTRIGHT FAMILY.

John Courtright was a native of Pennsylvania, and emigrated with his family to Ohio, in 1803 or 1804. They journeyed over the mountains and through the forests in a three horse wagon, bringing with them such articles of household necessity as they were able to convey. On their arrival he bought land near Royalton, Fairfield county, and began the labor of making a home in the wilderness. Progress was necessarily slow at first, but year by year the clearing was enlarged, and as prosperity followed, he added to his possessions, until he was the owner of some two thousand one hundred acres of land, the result of his own exertions, seconded by those of his sons, as they arrived at an age to assist in the smaller and larger duties of the farm.

His children were: Abraham, who died in 1851, leaving a family; John, who married, raised a family in Walnut township, and died in October, 1878; Jacob, who married, and remained on a part of his father's estate, in Bloom township, Fairfield county, where he died in 1864; Jesse D. Courtright, who was born May 5, 1811, and in August, 1831, was married to Sally Stout, by whom he had nine children.

The children of Jesse D. are: Mary Jane, who married Thomas Cole, and lives in Amanda township, Fairfield county; Sarah, who married Emanuel Westenhaver, and lives in Walnut township; Elizabeth, who married Ezra F. Beery, and lives in Bloom township, Fairfield county; John, who was born January 28, 1838, married Minerva L. Brobst, at Marcy, Fairfield county, August 16, 1866, by whom he has three children—Alva B., Sally F., and John D.; George S. Courtright, who married Miss M. Cornelia Stevens, and is a physician at Lithopolis; Samuel W., who married Jennie R. Martin, and practiced law in Circleville; in 1875, was elected judge of common pleas, which office he holds at the present time; Alva P., who married Annie Vattier, of Cincinnati, where he practiced medicine several years, after which he removed to Circleville, where he ranks among the highest of the physicians in Pickaway county; Edson B. Olds Courtright, who died in April, 1867; Amanda C., who died in infancy.

Jesse D. Courtright moved into Walnut township in 1833, two years after his marriage, and here his children were born. He was a man of strong convictions, and firm in his adherence to the principles of the party to which he belonged—the Democratic party. His abilities were so well appreciated by the public, that in 1853 he was elected to the State legislature, where he served two years. He was many times elected to fill township offices, serving as justice of the peace during a period of twenty-five years, and holding the office of township trustee nearly the same length of time. He was also land appraiser of his township.

In his religion he was a consistent member of the Presbyterian church for thirty-two years, as was also his wife.

He was for many years a member of the Masonic fraternity, receiving all the degrees up to and including that of Knight Templar, and was, in every respect, faithful and true to his obligations as a Mason. Four of his sons followed in his footsteps, and became worthy members of the order. John D. is a member of Lithopolis lodge, No. 169, in which he has served as master for fourteen years. He is also a member of Circleville Chapter, No. 20; Tyrian Council, No. 60; and Lancaster Commandary, No. 2. He was also instrumental in the organization of Nebraska Grange, No. 64, organized June 16, 1863, and has continued its master from that time until the present. He has served as township trustee some eight years.

Portraits of John Courtwright and his wife, with a representation of their home in Walnut township, appear in this connection.

THE DUNNUCK FAMILY.

Joshua Dunnuck was a native of Maryland, from which State he emigrated to Ohio some time previous to the war of 1812, in which he served for a short time as a member of Captain Nye's light-horse company; he also, in common with every other able-bodied man, served in the State militia during the enforcement of the militia law of the State.

After being a resident of the State a number of years he was married to Miss Diana Tallman, by whom he had four children who lived to maturity, besides several who died in infancy. Of their children, Phebe married Absalom Ashbrook, and raised a family of children, of whom all but one lived to raise families. John married Henrietta Scott, in Fayette county, and made a home in Indiana. Elizabeth married William Peters, and lives near Pleasantville. Benjamin married Minerva Ashbrook, and died in Walnut township, where his family now live. Joshua Dunnuck's wife died, and he married a second time, his wife being Mrs. Phebe Bell, of Walnut township; their children were Diana, who was married, in Indiana, to Abel Lloyd. George T. died when nineteen years of age.

Thomas J. married Ruth Bowman, a daughter of John and Ruth Bowman, of Walnut township. With his wife Mr. Dunnuck received some property, as well as some from his father; his wife also received property from the estate of her brother, William Bowman. Mrs. Dunnuck was a woman of feeble health, but of a singularly gentle and loving disposition, and made a willing helpmeet to her husband, and a careful, judicious mother to their children, of whom they had five. Two of these died in infancy. Their home was a happy one, but, just as they were about completing his present comfortable dwelling-house, which was designed by Mrs. Dunnuck, and before it was occupied, she died from consumption. She was born October 12, 1834, and died September 12, 1876, aged nearly forty-two years. Her death left a vacancy in the once happy home that no other can fill. Their children were: Milton C., who is married, and lives in a house on the same premises as his father; Alma B., who now attends to the household duties in her mother's place; and Grace B., who also lives at home. Mr. Dunnuck has the assurance of a comfortable home during the remainder of his life, on the farm he has occupied since his marriage, which, at his death, will become the property of their children. He was a member of the National guard, and was called into duty in the one hundred days' service, but procured a substitute, as his presence was at that time needed at home.

Joshua Dunnuck, his father, had still another daughter—Sarah Ruth—who married and lost her first husband, John Louderman. She remarried, and now lives in Illinois. Mrs. Joshua Dunnuck died in Fayette county, where they were then living, about 1833 or 1834. In 1838 Mr. Dunnuck moved, with his family, to Indiana, and, in April of 1839, died there.

Portraits of Thomas J. Dunnuck, and Mrs. Ruth Dunnuck, his wife, appear in connection with this sketch.

JACKSON

Jackson lies east of Muhlenburg and Monroe, and extends to the Scioto river. Scioto township adjoins it on the north, and Wayne and Deer Creek on the south. Its surface is generally quite level; having the Scioto for its eastern boundary, and Darby creek running diagonally, from northwest to southeast, through its center, it contains a large proportion of first and second bottom land, and is among the most productive townships in the county.

INDIANS.

For several years after the first settlement of the township, small bands of Indians lingered about the region. Among the last who came to Jackson was a friendly Indian, who went by the name of Captain Johnny. With a number of other Indians, he had a camp on Darby creek, and the place is still pointed out as Captain Johnny's camp. He and another Indian, named Cherokee Tom, fell out, and finally fought a duel, with knives for their weapons. After the quarrel which led to the duel, Tom went off for a long time, when, thinking that Johnny had forgotten the difficulty, he returned to the camp on Darby creek. The next morning, Captain Johnny went to Tom's wigwam, and arousing him from his sleep informed him that he must fight. Tom yielded a reluctant assent, for Johnny was a powerful man, much the superior of Tom. The contest was short and bloody, terminating in Tom's death. Johnny went over to Mr. Renick's, borrowed a shovel, and buried bim on the place now occupied by G. A. Florence. They undoubtedly had a burying-ground there, for when the cellar of the present house was dug, the remains of several Indians were found.

THE JOLIFF SURVEY.

While the army of Lord Dunmore lay at Camp Charlotte, waiting the conclusion of the treaty with the Indians, John Joliff, a private soldier, discovered the fine tract of land in this township, of which he made the survey. The tract embraces four or five thousand acres, and lies west of Circleville. This survey was made in 1774, and is believed to have been the first survey made in the State. William Renick informs the writer that the survey was made without compass or chain, and so well was it done that the efforts of the numerous land speculators ("land sharks," they were called) to invalidate it, proved unsuccessful. The regularity of the survey was, after considerable litigation, confirmed by the courts.

T. J. DUNNUCK.

MRS. RUTH DUNNUCK.

SETTLEMENT.

Jonathan Renick was the first settler. He came from Hardy county, Virginia, in the year 1798, having previously purchased the Dade tract. He erected a cabin on Darby creek, and kept bachelor's hall for a few years, when his father, John Renick, and family arrived. He afterwards settled, and permanently resided, where Gustavus Florence now lives. He was born July 22, 1775; married Lucinda Suddeth, March 22, 1812, and died September 3, 1843, his wife having died three years previous. They had but two children—Sarah, who married Ezra Florence (now deceased), and resides in Circleville, and Mary, who died in 1853.

John Renick, the father of Jonathan, settled where John Fleming now lives, and resided there until his death, January 13, 1814, aged nearly sixty-five. Mary, his wife, died September 15, 1834, in her eighty-second year. Their children were: Thomas, Jonathan, Margaret, Rachel, Seymour, Abel, James, Asahel, Anna, Catharine and Mary. Thomas married Tabitha Radcliff, and moved to Jackson, from Kentucky, after the rest of the family came. His location was the place now occupied by his son, Job, where he continued until his death. His wife survived him some ten years. He was associate judge of Pickaway county for several terms, and was a member of the State legislature when it met at Zanesville. Mr. Renick was a man of intelligence, sound judgment and upright character. He was the father of fourteen children, four of whom are now living, as follows: Benjamin F., in Darby township; Felix and Job, in Jackson; and Matilda, wife of James Bennett, in Deer Creek. Margaret became the wife of Henry Van Metre, and afterwards moved to Champaign county. Rachel married Joseph Van Metre, and lived on the farm now occupied by Felix Renick. Abel married Miss Harness, and first settled in Jackson township, but subsequently removed to Marion county. James was never married. Asahel married Harriet Scott, and occupied the homestead. Anna became the wife of Reese McNeal, and settled on high bank prairie, below Chillicothe. Catharine married Ralph Osborne, of Columbus, afterwards auditor of the State, and Mary married John Cunning, of Columbus.

James Renick was a general in the war of 1812, and was under Hull at the time of the surrender of Detroit. He was a brave officer, and, it is said, when Hull refused to fight, and hoisted the white flag, he indignantly broke his sword in disapprobation of what he regarded Hull's treachery. General Renick was a member of the State legislature while the seat of government was yet at Chillicothe.

William Marquis came from Virginia soon after Jonathan Renick arrived, and located on Darby creek, just above McLane's mills. He built there, shortly afterward, a log grist-mill, and also a saw-mill. He then returned for his family, and his brother-in-law, Alexander Argo, and family, moved out with them. Marquis subsequently sold his property on Darby, including the mills, to Anthony Hall, and located on the farm now owned and occupied by Alexander Caldwell. His house stood on the opposite side of the road from Mr. Caldwell's residence and a little north of it. He established a copper still there for the manufacture of whiskey. Subsequently he moved to the place now occupied by Jonathan W. Huston, and resided there until his death. The frame dwelling of Mr. Huston was built by Marquis at a very early date, and is, possibly, one of the oldest frame houses in the township. Marquis built here, also, another distillery, and continued to grind out the "liquid poison." He died April 1, 1829, and his wife July 6, 1827. They are buried on the farm on which they last lived, a short distance north of Mr. Huston's house. Argo, in 1820, bought one hundred acres of land of Marquis, on which he lived until 1835, when he sold to J. W. Huston, and moved to Illinois.

Anthony Hall was the next arrival after Marquis. He came with his family from Jefferson county, Virginia, and, as before stated, bought the property of Marquis. He operated the mills until his death, in 1825. Mrs. Hall died in 1823. They had eleven children, as follows: Joseph, Nancy, William, Rachel, Anthony, Lucy, Elizabeth, John, Mary, James, and Martha, all of whom settled and resided in the township for longer or shorter periods. Rachel married first, Thomas Glaze, and afterwards, George Davis, and lived on the farm now occupied by Mr. McMasters. Lucy married Philip Thompson, and subsequently settled on Deer creek, near Chillicothe. Mary was the wife of William Bowsher, and resided first on the farm now occupied by Henry C. Blacker, in Circleville township, afterwards removing to Sandusky. Martha became the wife of James Thompson, resided, for five years, at the mills of which he was the owner, and then moved to Williamsport, in Deer Creek township.

The next settler was Alexander Caldwell, sr. He was a native of Ireland, and emigrated, with his mother, to the United States when fourteen years of age. He came to Pickaway county prior to 1800, and located on congress land, where H. C. Blacker now lives, in Circleville township. Being unable to secure the land when it came into market, in 1801, and it being entered by another, he came to Jackson, and settled on the farm now owned by Mike Henry, where he afterwards lived. He was married three times, his first wife being Jane Boyd, and the mother of his children, of whom he had fourteen—six only living to adult age. They are: Catharine (now widow of William Bell), living in Walnut; Henry (deceased); Johnson and Alexander, in Jackson; William B. (deceased); and John H., who lives in Darby township.

Henry Slyh, sr., â native of Pennsylvania, emigrated to Ohio, from Jefferson county, Virginia, in the fall of 1802. His family consisted of his wife and six children. The journey was made with a five-horse team and wagon. He first located on Darby creek, on land belonging to Anthony Hall, and resided there eleven years, when he bought one hundred and fifty acres where his son Henry now lives; he died here, November 30, 1849, aged nearly eighty-two; his wife, Elizabeth, died in 1838, at the age of sixty-six. Their children were Mary, John, Frederick, Catharine, Henry and Elizabeth. Only the last two are now living. Henry, who occupies the homestead in Jackson, was born in Virginia, July 9, 1801; Elizabeth, now Mrs. James Hurst, resides in Missouri.

George Glaze, from Hampshire county, Virginia, came into the territory now constituting Pickaway county, at a very early date. He purchased five hundred acres of military land, lying mostly between the Scioto river and Darby creek, and near their junction. In the fall of 1807 he came out, on horseback, with two daughters—Eva and Mary—who remained here while the father returned for the remainder of the family, with the exception of Richard, John and Adam, who had come ont some time before and commenced the improvement of the land their father had purchased, and George, who was an apprentice in Winchester, Virginia. When Glaze came into the country he brought five hundred dollars, which was a large sum for a pioneer immigrant to possess. He finally became a large owner of land. He died, in 1825, at the age of seventy-seven. The only surviving member of the family is Mary, widow of John Henry Knight, residing with her son-in-law, Barnabas Brinker, in Walnut. She was born December 13, 1789. When in her twenty-fourth year she married Mr. Knight, and lived for ten years on Dry run, in section thirty-four. They then removed to Green Springs, Seneca county, and remained three years, when they returned to Walnut, and located where Mr. Brinker now lives. He died here in 1834. She is the mother of seven children, all now dead but a son, who lives near Tiffin, and Mrs. Brinker, in Walnut.

James R. Hulse came to Pickaway county in 1811, from Orange county, New York. After his arrival here he married Rebecca Van Metre, and located first on property now owned by Henry B. Swearingen, taking a lease of the then owner, Henry Bedinger, of Virginia. He afterwards purchased six hundred acres of the Cable survey, and subsequently added six hundred acres more of the same. Mr. Hulse, at the time of his death, in 1862, was among the largest land owners of the county. His wife died in 1839. Subsequently, he married Mrs. Bales. He had, by his first wife, nine children, four of whom died young. Three are now living, viz.: Hepzibah, Aristeus, and James R., all residing in Jackson. By his second marriage there were two children—Jonas, who resides in Circleville, and Effie Jane, who died in January, 1877. Mrs. Hulse, second, survived her husband about a year and a half.

Melkire Staley and family moved into Jackson at an early date, and located on the river; remained a number of years, and then removed to the north part of the State. Peter, a brother of Melkire, came a few years later, and settled east of Mr. Bells. He finally moved to Allen county.

Robert Martin came into the settlement in 1808 or '9; remained several years, when he removed to Marion county. John Baer came in with Martin, and made his location in the southeast part of the township, where he resided until his death.

John Fisher and family, and his son, Absalom, and his family, came from Pendleton county, Virginia, in 1815. John Fisher settled on the farm now owned by William Bell, his cabin being situated on the hill just below Mr. Bell's house. Absalom located a short distance southeast of his father. He erected his cabin in 1816, and it is still standing, and occupied. The father died in Jackson in 1847, and the mother in 1844. Both are buried on the hill, where they lived. Absalom Fisher removed to Illinois, in 1856, where he and his wife both died in 1861. The only one of their twelve children now living in Pickaway county is John G. Fisher, who resides in Scioto township.

A family of the name of Suddeth, and another of the name of Barnes, were early settlers in Jackson. Suddeth lived on land now owned by the heirs of Jacob Van Metre. One of the daughters became the wife of Jonathan Renick, and another the wife of William Miller, of Harrison.

James Hemphill and Samuel Hunter joined the settlement at a comparatively early date. Also Joseph and Ebenezer Petty, who lived below the Darby bridge, on what is called the Franklin place. Joseph afterwards moved to Missouri, and Ebenezer to Urbana, Ohio.

Andrew Whiteside and family emigrated from Ireland, in 1818. They soon after settled near Chillicothe, where they continued to reside until 1828, when they removed to Jackson, and settled where a daughter, Mrs. Lutitia Walker, now lives. The father died here in 1839, and the mother in 1863, at the advanced age of eighty-three years. Three of the children are still living.

Jonathan W. Huston emigrated to Ohio, from Pennsylvania, with his parents, James and Ann Huston, in 1818. The family settled in Colerain township, Ross county. In 1828, Jonathan W. came to Pickaway county, and in the spring of 1834, located in Jackson, where he has since lived. In 1833, he married Sarah Reber, of Fairfield county, who died in 1852. In 1854, he married Luvanne Pitkin, with whom he is now living.

Robert Campbell came from Pennsylvania to Ohio in 1808. He first located below Chillicothe, and four years afterwards, came to Pickaway county, locating in Wayne township, where he resided until his death, in 1848. He was twice married, and his second wife survived him, dying in Missouri. Joseph, his son, took the old homestead, and occupied it ten years, when he moved to Westfall, in Wayne township. In the spring of 1864, he came to Jackson, where he has since lived. An elder brother, Samuel, resides in Circleville, and Robert, a younger brother, in Deer Creek. A sister, Isabella, wife of William Campbell, resides in Wayne.

Horace Keyes came from Virginia, in 1833, and afterwards located on Darby creek, where he resided some twenty-three years. In 1860, he purchased and settled where he now lives.

FIRST SCHOOL.

About the year 1807, the first school-house was erected just below John Renick's, near what was called "Strawberry prairie." Peter Mickel taught the first term of school. An early school was kept by James Warren, on the south side of the creek. David Culbertson, a local Methodist preacher, of Washington township, was among the pioneer school teachers of Jackson. He kept school in a log cabin, near Mr. Caldwell's.

THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

The first Presbyterian preacher in Jackson was Rev. Mr. Hoge, of Columbus. The meetings were first held at John Renick's, William Florence's, and at William Seymour's, who lived above Darbyville. The church was erected in 1841 or '42, the ground for which was donated by Judge Jonathan Renick. The deed of conveyance was given in trust for the benefit of the Central Presbyterian church, of Circleville, of which the society in Jackson was a branch. The church formed an independent organization in December, 1877, with the following members: Mrs. Mary Scott, Mrs. Kate McMasters, Mrs. Helen Van Metre, Miss Nannie Stone, William Bell and wife (all by letter), and Mrs. Renick, on profession of faith. William Bell was chosen elder. The society was organized by Rev. Dr. Moore, of the Second Presbyterian church, of Columbus. The following members have joined since: Mrs. Mary Jennings, Mrs. Samuel Sines, Miss Mary and Miss Sarah Williams. Rev. Mr. Thompson, of Commercial Point, is the officiating minister.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

The earliest meetings of the Methodists were held at the cabin of John Rush, on Darby creek. The first circuit preacher was Joseph Hayes, of Deer creek. Meetings were also held at an early date at the house of William Littleton, on Lick run, and subsequently in the brick school-house, which stood on the corner of Mr. Slyh's farm, near the present frame school-house. In 1864, the society erected the frame church, near Mr. Neff's, which cost about six hundred dollars. The church now numbers about a dozen members, with Jacob Slyh leader of the class.

EARLY BURIAL PLACES.

The first burials were probably made in the Hall burying-ground, on the bank of the creek, a short distance above the McLane mills. The oldest inscription now decipherable is that of Sally Hall, who died in October, 1807, in her first year. The next is that of another child, of the name of Hall, who died October, 1817, aged one year. Anthony Hall, the pioneer, was buried here in 1825, and his wife, Rachel, in 1823, and Joseph, their son, in 1826. William, son of James and Katharine Anderson; John Cochran, and Thomas McCollister, were all buried in this burying-ground, in 1826. On the farm of John Fleming, a short distance southeast of his residence, is another old burying-ground, the oldest inscription in which is that on the tombstone of John Renick, the pioneer, who was buried there in 1814. There may have been earlier interments there than this, as many graves contain no marks whatever, while the inscriptions on the headstones of some others are so nearly effaced as to be illegible.

The most sickly season in the early history of the township was the year 1826. That year a malignant disease, called by the inhabitants "the cold plague," prevailed, and was oftener fatal than otherwise. The first death was that of John Cochran, January 6, 1826. A week after, William Anderson, an intimate friend of Cochran, died, and then quickly followed the deaths of George Owens and his brother, James, George Davis, Abraham Ward, Mr. Bailey, Joseph and James Hall, Thomas McCollister, Mrs. Slagle and daughter, Maria. Three members of the Chaney family died within a week of each other.

FIRST MILL.

Soon after his arrival, William Marquis built a small log grist-mill on Darby creek, about a quarter of a mile above the site of the present grist-mill of Mr. McLane. This was one of the first mills in the country. The structure has long since been demolished, but a part of the wheel and some of the foundation blocks can yet be seen. Marquis had also a saw-mill, which he erected about the same time. The mills were subsequently, as before stated, bought by Anthony Hall, and they are generally referred to as Hall's mills.

Asahel Renick had a saw-mill on Darby creek at an early day. It caused an overflow of his land to such an extent that he finally tore it down.

The grist-mill of Washington McLane was erected by James Thompson in 1833, and the saw-mill a short time before. Thompson carried on the business for about six years, when he sold to John E. Van Metre. About 1852 or 1853 Van Metre sold the property to Joseph Deeds, who improved the grist-mill considerably, building an addition of twenty feet, increasing the height one story, and putting in new machinery. He, however, made an assignment soon after, and, in the spring of 1856, the property was purchased by Mr. McLane.

FIRST MAIL ROUTE AND POST OFFICE.

A mail route was established in 1805 from Franklinton to Chillicothe, through this township. A weekly mail left Franklinton each Friday, stopped over night at Marquis' mill, on Darby creek; next day reached Chillicothe and returned to Thompson's, on Deer creek; thence home on Sunday. At the establishment of the route there was no post-office between Franklinton and Chillicothe, but, during the first winter following, there was one established at Westfall, and, a short time afterward, one at Marquis' mill, about this time changed to Hall's mill. Colonel Andrew McElvain, for many years a prominent citizen of Franklin county, then a boy thirteen years old, was the first carrier of the mail. There were but four cabins on his route between the two terminal points, and, one winter or spring, he was compelled to swim Darby and Deer creeks twice, carrying the small mail-bag on his shoulders.

The early elections in Jackson township were held in the log house of Anthony Hall, near the mills. The first justice of the peace was William Florence. Esquire Williams and Jonathan Heath filled the same office at an early date. The early township records are not now in existence, and we are, therefore, unable to give the names of the first officers elected. The present township officers are F. M. Slyh, clerk; Horace Keyes, Joseph Hall and M. V. B. Lindsey, trustees; E. F. Coffland, treasurer; S. H. Ridgway, assessor; J. R. Florence and B. N. Walker, justices of the peace. The present township house, located near McLane's mills, was built in 1873.

The first physician that practiced in the township was Doctor Daniel Turney, of Jefferson; after him, Dr. Webb and Dr. Luckey, of Circleville. The only resident physician in the township was Dr. John H. Grant, who came from Kentucky, and resided on a part of the farm now owned by Mr. H. B. Swearingen. He practiced a number of years.

THE FIRST ROAD.

The old State road, running from Chillicothe to Franklinton, was the first road opened in the township. It was originally called "Laugham's trace," three brothers of that name having laid it out.

The only store ever kept in Jackson was the grocery store of Thornton Van Metre, which he opened at the cross roads, just north of McLane's mills, about the year 1840.

FLORENCE GRANGE, NO. 874, was organized in April, 1874, with the following officers: Felix Renick, master; Robert Galbraith, overseer; H. B. Swearingen, lecturer; J. P. Taylor, steward; J. R. Florence, assistant steward; W. T. Bell, treasurer; J. P. Wright, chaplain; G. A. Florence, secretary; A. J. Williams, gate-keeper; Mrs. Felix Renick, ceres; Mrs. H. B. Swearingen, pomona; Mrs. J. R. Florence, flora; Miss Mary E. Williams, lady assistant steward. The meetings are held in the Presbyterian church.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

THE SWEARINGEN FAMILY.

In connection with the view of the house of Henry B. Swearingen, published in this work, we give the following brief sketch of the Swearingen family.

The original representative of the family in America was Garrett Van Swerengen (as the name was then spelled), who was a native of Brabant, a province of Holland. He emigrated with his family, consisting of his wife, Barbara (De Barette), and two children—Zachariah and Elizabeth—to the American colonies, about the year 1654. He settled near Annapolis, Maryland, and in 1669 he and his family were naturalized citizens of the province of Maryland. Zachariah had four sons: Thomas, Van, John and Samuel.

The children of Thomas were two sons, namely: Thomas and Van, who, according to an old "History of the Valley of Virginia," settled in the neighborhood of Shepherdstown, that State, on or near the Cohongoruton, in the year 1734, and were among the first settlers on that water-course and its vicinity. Van Swearingen was county lieutenant of militia of the county of Berkeley, Virginia. He bore the title of colonel, and was a man of local note. He was the father of five children, of whom Josiah, the next in lineal descent, was the oldest, born March 28, 1744. He was a captain under General Lewis in Lord Dunmore's war. He married, on the fifth day of January, 1777, Phebe Strode, who was born on the eighth day of December, 1747. He died August 9, 1795, and she July 6, 1786. They had three sons—Thomas, James and Samuel—and a daughter, Eleanor, who became the wife of Governor Thomas Worthington.

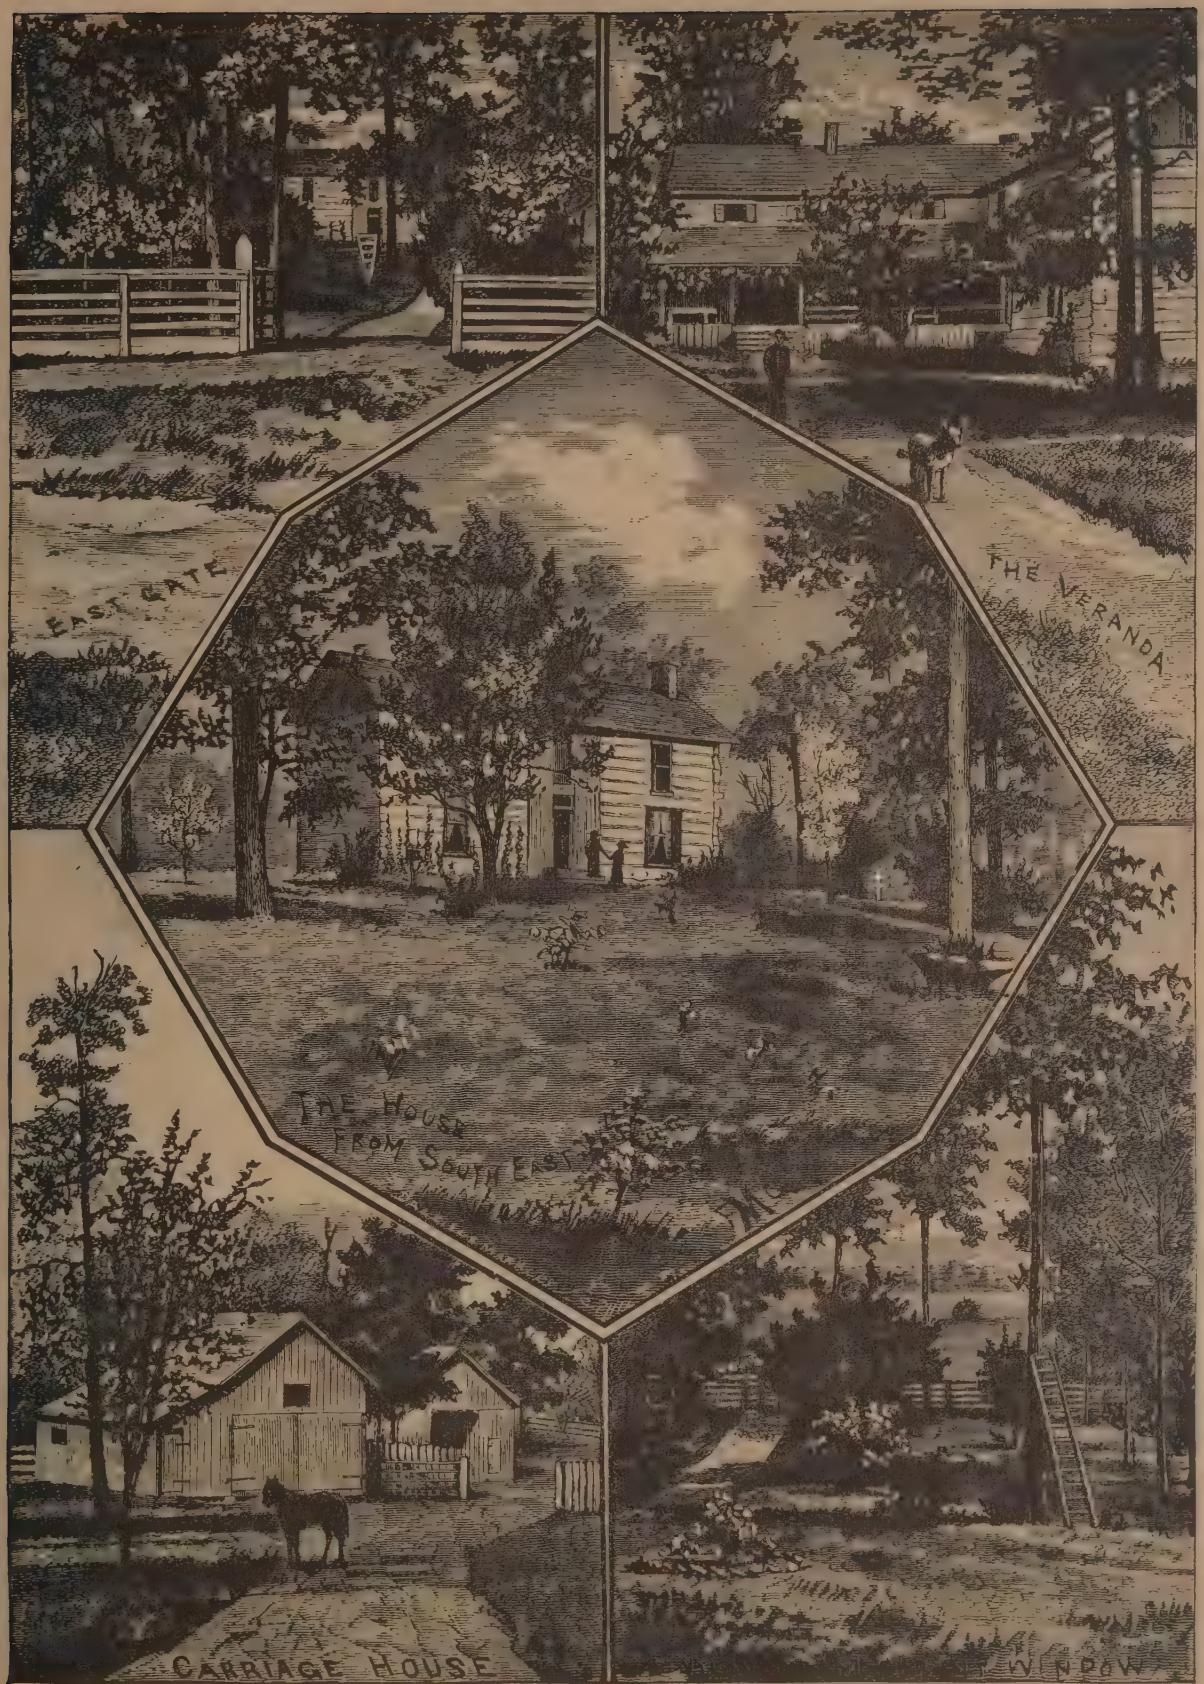
James Strode Swearingen, who was the second son of Josiah and Phebe Swearingen, was born in Berkeley county, Virginia, now Jefferson county, West Virginia, on the third day of February, 1782. At the age of thirteen he became a clerk in a store at Battletown (now Berryville), Virginia, near Winchester, where he remained about two years. He then went into the county clerk's office, as a clerk, at Winchester, Frederick county, and remained about four years, when, on account of ill health, he was compelled to seek other employment. His experience in the county office was an excellent school for him, and he there formed those methodical habits so characteristic of him during his life.

In 1799 he came to Chillicothe, having exchanged his land in Virginia with Governor Worthington for land in the vicinity of Chillicothe. In 1800 he was appointed an ensign in the army, and two years afterwards he set out from Chillicothe for Detroit, on horseback, accompanied by a guide. The country was almost a complete wilderness, there being, at that time, no settlement between Chillicothe and Lake Erie except the old town of Franklintown, and he made this part of the journey without a morsel of food to eat. He was, at this time, a first or second lieutenant, and on his arrival at Detroit, he was placed in command of a company, and sent to Chicago, where he assisted in building old Fort Dearborn. He was afterwards stationed at different points: Fort Pickering, Mississippi; Fort Mifflin, below Philadelphia; Fort McHenry, Baltimore, Cincinnati, Pittsburgh, and other places, but most of the time he was on the frontier.

November 4, 1811, while stationed at Pittsburg, he was united in marriage to Nancy, daughter of Henry and Rachel (Strode) Bedinger. She was born January 7, 1787. Her remote ancestor, Adam Bedinger, was a native of Alsace, Germany. He and his family were protestants, and to escape persecution after the conquest, which resulted in the cession of Alsace to France, he emigrated to America, landing at Philadelphia in 1734. Soon thereafter he joined a party of German emigrants, who settled upon those beautiful, rich lands on the Conowago, York county, Peansylvania. His son Henry married Magdalena Schlegel (Slagle, as anglicised), and removed to Shepherdstown, Virginia, in the spring of 1762. His son Henry, the father of Mrs. Nancy Swearingen, was born October 16, 1753. He was a captain in the Revolutionary war; was taken prisoner at Fort Washington, and confined on Long Island for four years. In 1796 he located the tract of land in Jackson township, Pickaway county, known as the Bedinger survey, the most of which is now owned by Henry B. Swearingen. Henry Bedinger was a man of good native ability, great energy and force of character, and was prominent in the community in which he lived.

In 1814, being then quartermaster-general and a staff officer, James S. Swearingen made his headquarters at Chillicothe, where he remained on duty until the close of the war, when he made a settlement and resided there the remainder of his life. He received, soon after his marriage, from his father-in-law, the Bedinger tract in Jackson township, Pickaway county, Ohio, but he never settled upon it. He died in Chillicothe, February 3, 1864, and his wife January 11, 1859. They were the parents of seven children, three of whom died young. The others were Henry B., Eleanor, Sarah B., and Virginia, who died unmarried, at the age of twenty-one. Eleanor was married first to Dr. John H. Grant, of Covington, Kentycky, and after his death to Major Edward Clarkson, of the same place. She died January 20, 1879, in Jackson township. Sarah B. became the wife of N. W. Thatcher, of Chillicothe, now deceased. Mrs. Thatcher occupies the old home in Chillicothe.

Henry B. Swearingen was born in Chillicothe, November 16, 1814. He came to Pickaway county in 1837, and settled where he now lives, in Jackson township, in December, 1851. He was married, January 2, 1850, to Elizabeth Nesbitt, of Xenia, who was born June 3, 1827. To them have been born eight children—Eleanor V., born March 26, 1854; James S., born August 19, 1857; Nancy N., born December 22, 1858; Robert N., born February 22, 1861 (died October 27, 1865); John G., born February 24, 1863; Henry B., born May 26, 1865; Thomas T.,



BEDINGER.

RESIDENCE OF H. B. SWEARINGEN, JACKSON TOWNSHIP, PICKAWAY COUNTY, OHIO.

was born January 15, 1868; and Mary S., was born March 9, 1871.

The Bedinger survey—the most of which is now owned by Henry B. Swearingen—has never been bought nor sold. It was located by Captain Bedinger in 1796, in consideration of his services in the Revolution. He subsequently gave it to his son-in-law, James S. Swearingen, from whom it was inherited by the latter's son, Henry B., and daughter Eleanor, now deceased. Henry B. Swearengen now occupies the homestead.

One of the most attractive illustrations in this work is that of the residence of Mr. Swearingen and its surroundings. The house, embowered in forest-trees, stands on a beautiful swell of ground, and looking eastward, commands a fine view of picturesque scenery for many miles.

DARBY.

Darby township is situated in the northwest corner of the county, and is bounded on the north by Franklin, connty, on the east by Scioto township, on the southeast by Muhlenberg, on the south by Monroe, and on the west by Madison county. Its surface is remarkably level, except along the water-courses, where it is somewhat rolling. The soil is fertile, consisting largely of corn land, and that cereal is largely produced. For the last two or three years, however, wheat has been more extensively grown than formerly, the crop being found to do well on land on which corn has been heretofore almost exclusively grown.

The principal original varieties of timber were the oak, in several varieties, the white oak on the higher soil, and burr, jack and post oak (sometimes called pin oak), on the black land. There was also considerable red and white elm, hickory, and hard maple. There was formerly a considerable portion of land in this township called "barrens," which, in its natural state, was more adapted to grazing than to tillage.

Much of the land lying back from Darby creek is flat, and before it was drained was too wet for cultivation. The southwest part of the township, during most of the year, was covered with water, and contained a thick undergrowth of timber, which gave it the name, together with the portion of Monroe township adjoining, of "the brush country." But when the land was once reclaimed and cultivated, it was found to be the most fertile and productive of the township. On the farm of F. C. Bostwick is a field, now in corn, which has produced a crop of that cereal every year since 1805, and the growing crop, which is hardly second to any field of corn in the county, is sufficient evidence that the soil has lost but little of its fertility.

But, notwitstanding the fertility of its soil, and the striking contrast which its present condition presents to its appearance when the pioneers first invaded its forests, the township is yet far from being in a high condition of improvement. The cause is chiefly found in the fact that most of its lands are held in large tracts, and are occupied and cultivated largely by tenants, whose rude log houses, or cabins, with their "stick" chimney, look more out of place, because they stand in the midst of such fertile fields. When, as will eventually be the case, the land shall be divided up into farms of moderate size, say, of two hundred acres each, and occupied by their owners with neat and attractive dwellings, the appearance of the township will be vastly different from that which it now presents. The plan of smaller farms, better cultivation and improvements, has already been adopted to some extent, and it is easy to predict that a few years more will bring about a great improvement in this respect. What we have said of Darby, may, in a greater or less degree, be said of all the townships west of the river.

Darby creek, which, in size, is worthy the name of river, now forms the eastern boundary of the township, that portion lying east of the creek having been recently set off, on petition, to Scioto township. Its principal tributary is Greenbrier run, which rises in the northwest part of the township, flows southeast, and forms a junction with Darby, just below the township line. Opossum run rises in Madison county, enters Darby township near the northwest corner, and flows south, along the west line, emptying, at Palestine, into Deer creek, which makes a detour into this part of the township. Buskirk's run, a tributary of Deer creek, and lying mostly in Monroe, heads in this township, a short distance east of Palestine.

INDIANS.

Indians of the Wyandot tribe, from the region of Upper Sandusky, remained in the township for several years after the first white settlers came. They had a camp on Darby creek, on the farm now owned by David Davis. The place is still known as "Indian thicket," the ground being at that time thickly covered with black-haw. They buried many of their dead there, and a number of skeletons, with guns and other implements, have been plowed up. Their intercourse with the whites was of a friendly nature. Three Indians, whose names were Wysock, Canoe and Woyathe, remained in the vicinity for some time after the others had left. They brought in the skins and meat of wild animals, which they exchanged with the settlers for shoes, stockings, and other articles of wearing apparel.

WILD ANIMALS.

Game was quite abundant in the township, in its first settlement. Deer were very plenty, and some of the early settlers killed large numbers of them. Venison, and the meat of the wild turkey, were common articles of food with the pioneers. Wolves, wild-cats, opossums, and other smaller game were also numerous. Wild hogs were frequently met with, and were more dreaded, perhaps, than any other of the wild beasts. The genuine wild boar, exasperated by the hunters, was the most terrible creature of the forest, and the hunt was exciting and dangerous. His attack was too sudden and headlong to be turned aside or avoided, and the snap of his tusks as he sharpened them, in his fury, was something terrible. Jacob Burget, and Cornelius and William Poulson, while out hunting wild hogs, on one occasion, surrounded an old boar, with immense tusks. The hunters were on horseback, and the hog, in his fury, made an attack on the horse of Cornelius Poulson, cutting his ham-strings. The horse was ruined, and had to be shot, but the men, after a desperate fight, succeeded in killing the beast. His tusks are said to have measured over a foot in length. The wild hogs were not valued for their flesh, but were regarded simply as dangerous pests, and were hunted, mainly to rid the country of them. Jacob Burget, above mentioned, was a great hunter. It is said he wore an Indian suit of deer-skin, and that it was impossible to distinguish him from an Indian, a few rods away. He killed a great many deer, wolves, wild hogs, and, also, several bears, and made hunting a sort of business.

SETTLEMENT AND SETTLERS.

The first settlements were made on Darby creek and Opossum run, and commenced soon after the year 1800. Among the earliest were several brothers by the name of Poulson—Andrew, Cornelius, John, Elijah, and William. They came from Virginia on pack-horses, in 1800, and located near Chillicothe, on what is known as "big bottom." Two years afterward they came to Darby and settled on Darby creek, within a short distance of each other. They were all unmarried when they arrived, and, at length, found their wives here. Andrew finally removed to Upper Sandusky. He was a Methodist preacher, and labored as a missionary among the Indians in that region for some time. William Poulson was twice married—first to Betsey England, and, second, to Nancy Tanner, who survives him and occupies the old homestead. Five of the eleven children of William Poulson, now living, reside in Darby, viz.: Sarah, Andrew, Thomas R., David, Elias, and Phebe. Andrew Poulson is the oldest native resident of the township; he was born in 1816. He has been justice of the peace for twenty-seven years, and eight terms in succession. In 1859 he was elected sheriff of the county, serving two years.

One of the first settlers on Opossum run was Peter Long, who came from Rockingham county, Virginia, in 1804 or 1805. He bought, and settled on, the farm now owned by Isaac Mantles, where he resided until his death, June 1, 1852, aged eighty-one years. He died in the woods, and was devoured by wild beasts. Only a fragment of his clothes was afterward discovered. His grandsons—Peter, Jacob, John—and granddaughter—Mary (Mrs. Oglesbee)—reside in Madison county.

Courtney Tanner moved in from Kentucky, about the year 1804 or 1805, and settled where Stephen Self now lives, on the farm of Abraham Alkire. His wife, Mary Ann (Alkire), died soon after their settlement, and he subsequently returned to Kentucky, and married Hannah Francis, who survived him. His children were seven in number (two being by his first wife), as follows: Harvey, Betsey (Mrs. Wood), Rebecca (Mrs. William Heath), John, Harriet (Mrs. Robert Manley), Eliza (Mrs. Wesley McCollister), and Edward. John Tanner married Margaret Alkire, and after a residence in Pickaway county about eighteen months, settled in Madison county, where Mrs. Tanner still lives. He died here, March 4, 1868. Mrs. Tanner is now in her sixty-seventh year, and has three children—Courtney, Abraham and Margaret (Mrs. William Taylor).

Isaac Alkire, born in Kentucky in 1789, came to Ohio with his father, William Alkire, in 1804. William Alkire bought a considerable tract of land in Madison county, and settled there, Isaac and John, his sons, settled in Darby. Isaac, in 1811, married Mary Graham, and located where his daughter, Mrs. Bostwick, now lives. He died May 16, 1877, and his wife, November 14, 1876, aged nearly seventy. They had four sons and four daughters, all now living. Forbes and Jackson live in Indiana; William, George and Mrs. Lewis Green, in Madison county; Mrs. Aristeus Hulse, in Jackson township; Mrs. F. C. Bostwick, in Darby, and Mrs. V. H. Moore, in Circleville. John Alkire married Susan Mantles, and settled on the farm now owned by Abraham Alkire, where Courtney Tanner formerly lived. He afterwards located on Opossum run, in Madison county, and continued to reside there until his death.

Isaac McHenry settled in the northwest corner of the township, on Opossum run, about the year 1807, coming from the State of Kentucky. He was a Baptist preacher, and preached throughout the neighborhood. He eventually lost his land, his claim proving invalid, and he removed to Allen county, Ohio.

Obediah P. Thomas, about the same time, settled on the Wilson farm, now occupied by Scott Robinson, and resided there until his death.

A few years subsequently John Mantles, sr., from Virginia, settled where his grandson, Duncan Mantles, now lives. He was a man of great size, weighing, at his death, November 5, 1831, four hundred and eighty pounds. He was born in the year 1765. His wife died October 11, 1846. Their youngest son, David, married Matilda Noland, and resided on the old homestead until his death. His children—Duncan, Isaac, and John—reside in Darby, and Miranda (wife of W. T. Fitzgerald) in Madison county. Isaac Woods, a son-in-law of John Mantles, was a member of a company, from this neighborhood, which was sent out against the Indians, in the war of 1812. While returning home, at the expiration of his term of service, and in sight of his house, he shot himself, accidentally, in the act of getting over a fence.

In 1812 John Gilliland came from Jackson county, Ohio, and settled on Opossum run, and his brother Andrew about the same time. John finally removed to Illinois, but Andrew resided in the township until his death, in 1832. His son Samuel now occupies the old place.

Thomas Noland joined the settlement on this stream in the year 1815, moving in from Maryland.

Richard Heath was an early settler on the place now owned by John Mantles. He resided there for six or seven years, taking a lease of John Mantles, sr. He married a sister of Thomas Tipton, and, afterward, settled on Darby creek. He eventually moved to Missouri, where he died.

John Bowman was an early settler on the Morgan farm, east of Darby creek.

James Morse settled, at an early date, where Joseph Crossley now lives; and Jonas Deyo on the place now occupied by George Reed. Morse was a mechanic; he had a blacksmith shop, but was principally engaged in the manufacture of plows. He came from New England.

Benjamin Davis emigrated from Maryland, in 1802 or 1803. He first located near Williamsport, Deer Creek township, on the George Wood farm. He afterwards moved to Monroe township, and later, to Darby. He finally removed to Indiana, where he died in March, 1873. His wife died in Monroe township, Pickaway county. He had a family of ten children, of whom one son and two daughters are living—John Davis, in Darby, and Mrs. Cutler and Mrs. Canahan, in Indiana.

Charles Bell came from Virginia, in 1824, and settled on Darby creek, now Muhlenberg township, where he lived until his death, in 1846. His son, John W. Bell, married, in 1836, Susan Ann Henderson, whose father, Charles Henderson, was an early settler in the vicinity of Chillicothe. Mr. Bell located in this township, in 1836, near where his widow now lives. He died May 3, 1862. Mrs. Bell has nine children. A daughter is the wife of J. W. Sheets, the present township clerk.

Elisha Cory, an old settler, opened up the farm opposite the residence of Thomas D. Ridgway, and lived there until his death.

Sampson B. Smith, of Maryland, with his wife, Margaret Hill, came to Darby in 1824, and settled on the farm now owned by Cyrus Comstock, where he continved to reside until his death, in October, 1876 His wife died the March previous. Six of the nine children born to them are now living, and in this township, to wit: Mrs. W. J. Shockley, William, George W., Mrs. Lewis Ballah, Mrs. Richard Dick, and Samuel.

In 1826, Joseph Dalby, with his wife and four children, arrived from Frederick county, near Winchester, Virginia, and settled where his daughter, Mrs. David Hurst now lives, and died there September, 1876. He was twice married, and was the father of twelve children, who lived to adult age, and were married. Ten are now living, three of whom reside in this township, as follows: Mary Jane (widow of Thomas Jackson); Hannah (wife of Theodore Gantz); and Mrs. Hurst, above mentioned. A son, Scribner V. Dalby, lives in Harrisburg, Franklin county; and Israel, near London, Madison county. The other children, except Dr. I. N. Dalby, who lives in Cleveland, reside in the west.

Seth Morton came to Ohio from New England in 1832, and located first in Circleville, where he engaged in the manufacture of cigars. A year or two afterwards he moved to Monroe township, settling at "Five Points," where he resided three years, when he moved to the place now occupied by his widow, on the Circleville pike, in the same township. He died there in April, 1870. He was married twice, and had eleven children. His son Sidney, who married Mary J. Neff, resides in this township.

Samuel Ridgway and family came from Bourbon county, Kentucky, in the year 1812, and settled near Chillicothe, where he died, February, 1837. Thomas D., his son, now living in Darby, aged seventy years, married Eliza Mattson in October, 1833, who died in the fall of 1842. In 1845 he removed to this township, and two years afterward married Rebecca Smith, who died March 4, 1878. Mr. Ridgway has served as trustee of this township for seventeen years.

Robert McDowell came to Ohio from Bucks county, Pennsylvania, in the year 1837. He worked at blacksmithing for about eighteen months at Harrisburg, Franklin county, and afterwards established a tannery at Palestine, which, in connection with Stacey Waldo, he carried on for several years. He then purchased fifty-three acres of the farm he now owns and on which he has since resided. He married, March 7, 1844, Catharine H. Neff. They have two children living and one deceased.

John W. Kennedy came from Mifflin county, Pennsylvania, in June, 1839. He had learned the carpenter's trade in Pennsylvania, and worked, on his trip to Ohio, at different points—first at Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, then at Wooster, Ohio, and other places. He finally reached Palestine, in this township, in company with Frederick L. Smith, where they both decided to remain. In November, 1840, Mr. Kennedy married Mrs. Mary E. Taylor, since which time he has resided in his present location. He has three sons, namely, Henry S., living in Madison county; William J., a physician, residing at East Ringgold; and Samuel W., at home.

Frederick L. Smith married, December 25, 1839, Sarah Smith, and resided in Palestine several years, when he moved to Madison county. Subsequently he removed to Harrison Mills, Fayette county, where he died.

Benjamin F. Renick has been a resident of Darby since 1841. On the fifteenth of November, of that year, he married Sarah Williams, by whom he had two children; his wife died March 14, 1854, and December 8, 1856, he was united in marriage to Mary Taylor. The result of this union is eight children, four girls and four boys, all of whom are living. A sketch of Mr. Renick's ancestry is given in Jackson township.

CHURCH HISTORY.

The first religious meetings in Darby were held by Thomas Reynolds, a Methodist exhorter, who came from Virginia about the same time that the Poulson brothers came. He lived to be eighty years old, and was a zealous and earnest christian. Robert Finley, a traveling Methodist preacher, was the first regular clergyman in this section. He had a son, James, who was a missionary among the Indians at Upper Sandusky. Andrew Poulson says he remembers well the first camp-meeting in the township, held by the Methodists, on Darby creek, in which James Finley and three or four of his Indian converts took an active part. One of these Indians was the well-known Between-the-Logs, who preached, on this occasion, in his native language, his sermon being interpreted by a negro who traveled with him for that purpose. Jacob Young, a Methodist, and Isaac McHenry, a Baptist, were among the pioneer preachers of Darby.

The first church in the township was the log house now used as a dwelling by a tenant of widow Bell. It was erected by the Methodists in 1844, and was called the Free Will church, any denomination that chose to do so, being allowed to worship in it. The Methodist society was formed long prior to the erection of a meeting-house, and held their meetings in a barn which then stood on the farm now owned by Mrs. Bell, and, also, at the house of father Reynolds, and that of John Bowman. The Reynolds, Bowmans, Poulsons, Tiptons, Rains, and some others, constituted the society. The organization subsequently disbanded, but, finally, re-organized, and worshiped in the school-house near the old Free Will church, for five years. The Renick church, so called because of the interest and activity shown in its erection by Mr. Benjamin F. Renick, was built in 1870, costing about two thousand, three hundred dollars. The present pastor of the church is the Rev. Mr. Callahan, of Darbyville. John W. Sheets is leader of the class.

A United Brethren class was organized at Palestine, about the year 1844, by Rev. Henry Jones and Rev. Jesse Bright. The constituent members were: Nimrod Huffman and wife, Jeremiah Deyo and wife, Daniel Alkire and wife. The meetings were first held at the dwellings of the members, and, subsequently, at a school-house on Deer creek. A frame meeting-house was erected at Palestine about the year 1850, which, at this writing, is still standing, though it has not been used for several years. The church flourished for a number of years, and until the war of the Rebellion, when questions of a political nature caused dissension and division amongst members, and the society was finally broken up.

A new church, to be erected on the site of the old one, is now talked of, for which three or four hundred dollars are already subscribed. It will be under the control of no one denomination, but will be open, alike, to all churches of orthodox belief.

EARLY SCHOOLS.

The first school in Darby was kept in a rude log cabin, built for a school-house, which stood on cedar-cliff hill, on Darby creek. The first teacher, or one of the earliest, was John Poulson. This was probably about the year 1815. The next school-house was erected in the north part of the township, near Harrisburg. The first school-house in the Alkire neighborhood stood just above the orchard, on the farm of Abraham Alkire, in which the first term of school was taught by Michael Hornbeck. Soon after the settlement on Opossum run was commenced, a school-house was built just across the line, in Madison county, on the farm now owned by Samuel Boyd, and here the children, in this neighborhood, first attended school. The stone—a big "hard head"—which constituted the back of the fire-place, still remains in position. One of the earliest teachers in this house was Simon Cochran. He was a Methodist preacher, and, at the time of his death, was the oldest minister of that denomination. The first school in Palestine was kept by Miss Emmerett Moore, in a building now occupied by John Skinner.

MILLS.

The first grist-mill on Darby creek, in this township, was the Harrisburg mill, erected by Joseph Chenoweth, as long ago as 1835. It is now owned by John W. Rush and Owen T. Curry. Chenoweth built there a short time before, the first saw-mill in the township, which was finally burned down, and the present mill subsequently erected. A carding machine was established at the same place by Elijah Chenoweth and Alfred Bird. There have been two other grist-mills in the township, on Darby creek—the Kepler mill built by James Kepler, and located about five miles below Harrisburg, near "yellow bank," and, a mile further down, the Garrison mill, erected by John G. Garrison. This was purchased by John W. McKinley.

FIRST ROAD.

The old "Federal road," opened by the general government, and which ran across the southwest corner of the township, was the first road in Darby. The original road of the Circleville and London pike, was surveyed and opened under the superintendence of Judge Thomas Renick, of Jackson township.

EARLY MAGISTRATES.

The earliest justice of the peace now remembered by the oldest inhabitants, was Humphrey Becket, who was elected about the year 1820. He lived on Greenbrier run, on what is now the line between Darby and Muhlenberg. He served a number of years, and was followed successively by John Henderson, William King, John Poulson, John Troutner and Andrew Poulson. The latter served for twenty-four consecutive years, and was elected for one term subsequently. The early elections were held, for several years, at the house of Edward Henderson, where George Smith now lives. The following are the present township officers: John W. Sheets, clerk; Joseph Davis, Joseph McKinley and J. P. Dick, trustees; Courtney Tanner, treasurer; Edson Deyo, assessor; J. F. Morgan and G. W. Smith, justices of the peace.

PHYSICIANS.

Dr. Olds was the first resident physician in Darby. He settled at Palestine about 1830, and practiced until his death. Dr. Harriman came next, from Jefferson, and practiced several years, when he returned to Jefferson, and was followed by Dr. William Wilson. He came from New Holland, and remained two years, when he removed to Darbyville. Dr. Roswell Shepherd came from Vermont about the year 1838, and practiced a number of years and until his death. Dr. George W. House, and Dr. Cromley practiced medicine here a few years, coming from Columbus. The last physician in the township was Dr. W. T. Williman, who came from Logan, Hocking county, in the fall of 1862. He remained until the spring of 1878, when he removed to Mt. Sterling, where he is now in practice. All of the physicians above mentioned resided at Palestine.

PALESTINE.

For the following facts we are indebted to John Ray and John W. Kennedy.

The little hamlet of Palestine, situated on Deer creek, on the western border of the township, and now consisting of one small store, two or three mechanic shops, and about a dozen dwelling houses, was once a stirring little place. It was laid out about the year 1829, by Josiah Rush and George Alkire. The old tavern, built by Mitchell and Pritchard, and now occupied by Thomas Brown, was one of the first buildings erected in the place. Rush & Alkire opened the first store, on the northwest corner of the crossing of the two pikes, in a little building now standing in the rear of the present store. John V. Davis' was the first store kept in the frame building, now vacant, on the southeast corner. Samuel Diffenderfer brought in a stock of goods from Circleville, but subsequently moved back there. Thomas Fellows started in trade, and continued for a time, then moved away. Joseph Tenney, of New Hampshire, a clerk of Fellows, subsequently opened a store where the present store of S. S. Fetherolf now stands, in a building now occupied as a dwelling by Charles Ketchum. Tenney sold goods there many years, and acquired a fortune. He finally sold out to Jerrold Sweatland and returned to New Hampshire. Sweatland carried on the business with success for several years. George Neff & Son followed Sweatland. They moved out the old store and erected the building now occupied by S. S. Fetherolf. These were the principal early traders in Palestine. The only post-office in the township was established here in Joseph Tenney's store, with Tenney as postmaster. The present postmaster is S. S. Fetherolf.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

JOSEPH DAVIS,

one of the substantial and successful farmers of Darby township, was born August 22, 1838. His parents, John and Elizabeth (Crabb) Davis, were among the pioneers of Pickaway county, and now reside in the south part of this township, where they settled many years ago. They were born in Deer Creek township; the father, August 18, 1807, and the mother, December 23, 1819. They have had a family of ten children—Vincent, Martha, William, Joseph, Isaac, David, Thomas, Mary, Fletcher, and Amanda. Vincent, Martha (afterwards wife of William Davis), and Isaac, are deceased; William and Fletcher are residents of Monroe township; David lives in Darby; and Thomas, in Bates county, Missouri; Mary is the wife of Frederick Owen, and resides in Monroe township; and Amanda, wife of William McDowell, resides in Denver, Colorado.

Joseph, the subject of this notice, was married February 15, 1865, to Virginia A., daughter of Joel and Catharine A. Burnley, who was born November 16, 1843. He located where he now resides, on a farm of two hundred and eighty-six acres, which he has since carried on with good judgment and success, giving special attention to the raising of stock. Mr. Davis has held the office of township trustee for six years, and was the Republican candidate for county commissioner, in 1877, but the county being overwhelmingly Democratic, failed of an election.

Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Davis, viz.: Lora B., born August 10, 1868; Filicia Scott, born August 22, 1875. A view of the residence of the family (called "Happy Home"), in connection with their portraits, is published herewith.

DEER CREEK.

The broad acres, rich with their store of waving wheat or rustling corn, the large number of substantial, and, often, luxuriant homes, and the general air of thrift to be seen in almost every portion of the township, have nothing to remind the chance visitant of the dangers and hardships which the first settlers here, the brave pioneers, peacefully sleeping, many of them, upon the domain which they cultivated, were called upon to endure.

The surface of this township is a level plain, except along its principal stream, where it is broken, or rolling. The soil, principally clay, is better adapted to the growing of corn than other grains, though wheat is largely grown, and is a profitable crop.

The only stream of importance is that from which the township derives its name. This enters at the northwest corner, flowing a short distance northeast; its course then changes to a general southeast direction, to near the center of the township, where it assumes a nearly due south course, flowing across the south line of the township, at a point nearly central, east and west. This stream affords several mill sites. Other small streams, tributary to Deer creek, are found in the township, among which may be mentioned Hay run, on the east, and Yellow Bud creek, on the west. These streams are, however, unimportant.

Deer Creek township is situated on the extreme southern boundary of Pickaway county. Its territory is a part of the Virginia military lands, and its boundaries are as follows: On the north, the township of Jackson and Monroe; south, Deerfield township, Ross county; east, Wayne township, and west, Perry township.

SETTLEMENT.

The following is prepared from personal interviews. The writer has endeavored to give, in the course of this history, the name of each pioneer, or early settler. Many will be found in that portion devoted to organization and churches, and when reliable data could be had, he has given to each, brief biographical notices. Following are the names, in part, of pioneers who have no living representatives in the township; the date of their coming was near the dawning of the present century: Samuel Wilson (who was generally known as the "old powder-maker"), Samuel Hanson, Michael Wolfe, Andrew Taylor, Homer Starbill (who was, it is thought, the first blacksmith in the township), John English, Bartholomew Baker and two sons—Joseph and Martin—(who were preachers, rough in their oratory, yet effective withal), and William Scott. There are, without doubt, others whose names are worthy of mention, but are not remembered.

The numerous representatives of the Rector family, now residents of Deer Creek township, sprang from a Virginia ancestry. Edward Rector was born in Fauquier county, Virginia, in 1786. When eight years of age his father died, leaving a widow and five children, of whom Edward was the eldest. In the fall of 1798 the family moved to the Northwest Territory. The mother and the four youngest children made the trip from Wheeling to Portsmouth in a flat-boat. Edward, then but twelve years of age, followed a blazed trail (Clark and Lewis') to Chillicothe, riding one horse and leading another. At Chillicothe, the family occupied one of the three cabins at that time constituting this village. In the spring of 1799, the family moved on to a farm near the mouth of Deer creek. Edward Rector married, in December, 1809, Miss Peggy Brown, and, in the following spring, located on the farm now owned by William Bennett. Here he remained until 1823, when he moved on to the Yellow Bud farm, still occupied by his heirs. By his first wife, who died in 1839, eight children were born. His second wife was Miss Sophronia H. Blodgett, by whom seven children were born, two only of whom are now living. Edward Rector died August 11, 1876. His widow still survives him, residing, at this time, with a daughter (Mrs. Bolin) in Circleville. Henry Rector married Elizabeth Hotsenpiler, and settled on the farm now owned by Cyrus Courtright, on Yellow Bud creek. On this place he died, April 15, 1854. In 1861 his widow was killed by a runaway horse. The children of this couple numbered six. Of these, but one—Amos—now resides in Deer Creek township. John R. Rector married Miranda Wiggins, and located on the farm now owned by George Bennett, on Yellow Bud creek. Ten children were born by the first wife, who died, and he married Miss Sue McCoy. John R. Rector died January 14, 1878. These were truly pioneers; the advance guard of the brave band who have made the "wilderness to blossom as the rose." Their coming "was in the twilight of the first century of our repuhlic."

Michael Alkire was born in 1771, near Moorfield, Virginia. In 1793 he married Dorothy Phebus, and the following year removed, by flat-boat, down the Kanawha, to Herodsburg, Kentucky, where he remained until 1798; he then came to Ohio. The first two years he lived at, or near, what is now called the Frybeck property, on the plains, and not far from the "Logan elm." In 1800, he purchased, of Colonel Evans, and others, the farm in Deer Creek township, now occupied by his heirs. Here he became a farmer, and engaged extensively in stock raising, and dealing. He died on February 11, 1843. Mrs. Alkire survived him some years, dying May 11, 1854, aged eighty-two years. The children, three of whom were born prior to removal to Ohio, are: John M., Nimrod, Sarah, Nancy, who was born in 1803, was among the first births in the township; married Captain E. Halstead, and is now deceased; William M. who married Mary Alkire, and lives in Deer Creek township; Catharine, Ruanna, James M., and Alexander, who are deceased; and Benjamin F., who has been twice married, and is a widower, and now lives on the home farm, of which he owns over four hundred acres.

Simon, Michael, and Isaac Hornbeck, came from Bath county, Kentucky, to Ohio, not far from the year 1800. They were natives of Virginia. Many descendants of these brothers now live in this township.

David Yates came from Culpepper county, Virginia, to Ohio, locating in Paint Creek, in Ross county, about the year 1800. Here he married Christina Edmiston. About 1806, he removed to Deer Creek township, and located permanently on the farm now owned by his son, John. Mr. Yates was connected with the manufacturing interests of the township from its infancy. He died March 31, 1840. Mrs. Yates survived him several years, dying early in August, 1855. The children were: Thomas Lovell, who married Susanna Saunders, and was recently living in California; John, who married Betsey Blue; Reason, who married Hannah Edmiston; Nancy, who married Joseph Saunders; Elizabeth, who married David Butler; David, who married Nancy Edmiston, (these are deceased); Mary A., who married Arthur Whiteside, is widowed, and now resides at New Holland; Emily, who married William Rector, and is deceased; Joseph, who married Louisa Wiggens, and Joshua O., who married Catharine Whiteside. The two last reside near Manson, Iowa.

Moses Colvin, of Kentucky, settled on the farm now occupied by Jacob J. Myers, in about 1800, and upon this he passed the remaining years of his life.

George and Samuel Phebus, two brothers, from near Dorchester, Maryland, settled in Deer Creek township in 1801. They lived continuously in Deer Creek until their death. A large family of children were left, none of whom now reside in the township.

George Ater, who was a soldier in the Revolution, and disabled while in the service, resided near Fredericktown, Virginia; here his wife died, and, in the spring of 1799, he came to Ohio, settling in Deer Creek township, on the farm now owned by R. Rector. The members of Mr. Ater's family, who came at this time, were: Abraham, who married Charity Eveland, in Virginia; Isaac, who married Elizabeth Smith; Catharine, who married Oswell Thompson; Jacob, who married Nancy Sollars; Polly, who married James Smith; George, who married Elizabeth Watts; Samuel, who married Margaret Hines; Thomas, who married Eliza Brown, and William, who married Margaret Colson. Numerous descendants of this family are now residents of Deer Creek township.

John Baker, whose place of nativity was near Providence, Rhode Island, came to Ohio in 1799, settling on the bank of the Scioto river, on Evan's prairie. In about 1801, he located permanently in Deerfield, Ross county, Ohio, where he died in 1841. His wife survived him some fifteen years. In this family were seven children, two of whom, Joseph and William, settled in Deer Creek township. The former remained here some fifteen years, and removed to Pike county, Illinois. William married Sarah Jackson, and, after a residence of fifteen years upon the farm now occuped by his son, John, removed to Deerfield, where he died, about the year 1865. Mrs. Baker died a year previous. They left but two children: John, who married Mary Parker, and lives on the old farm, and Peter, who married Harriet Harrington, and now lives in Kansas.

Edward Davison, from Bourbon county, Kentucky, settled in Deer Creek township, in 1803. Here the mother died, soon after. Mr. Davison died in August, 1827, aged seventy-seven years. He was a soldier of the Revolution, an Indian-fighter on the "dark and bloody ground" of Kentucky, and an intrepid hunter in the backwoods of Ohio. He was opposed to slavery, and came to Ohio that he might not witness its evil effects. There were seven children in the family, four of whom are now living: Robert, now living in Darke county; John, who lives in Washington county, Iowa; Lydia (Mrs. Cumberford), and William, who married Rachel Ater, and lives on the old homestead.

James Smith came from near Alexandria, Virginia, to Ross county, in 1799. In 1804 he removed to Deer Creek township, living in different locations until 1811, when he purchased a farm, now owned by a son, Alexander (who was born in the home he yet occupies). Here Mr. Smith engaged in farming, which he prosecuted successfully the remainder of his life. He died October 16, 1831. Mrs. Smith survived him many years. The date of her decease was April 26, 1872. Their children numbered seven. Of these, Pency, Elizabeth, Maria, Phebe and Margaret, are deceased. Alexander remains on the old homestead, consisting of two hundred and sixty acres. James married Rebecca Marsh, and lives in Ross county.

John, George, Charles and Thomas Wood, brothers, originally from near Harpers Ferry, Virginia, came to Ohio in about 1805. John and George settled in Chillicothe, where they engaged in merchandising, and amassed comfortable fortunes; they are now deceased. Charles and Thomas settled in Franklin county, where they passed the residue of their lives. Thomas married Elizabeth Ramsey, by whom five children were born; three are yet living—Mary, who lives in Illinois; George, who married Hannah E. Ingham, and resides in Deer Creek township (the owner of sixteen hundred acres of land), and Lewis, who is now in the mines of Colorado. During the war of 1812, Thomas Wood acted as a spy, carried the mails and did various duties connected with the army requiring great bravery. He was quite celebrated as a hunter in the early days.

Gladstone Colston married Polly Voss. He was a native of Maryland, and died there. His widow, with three children, came to Deer Creek, early in its settlement, where she died many years since. Of the children, Henry, the eldest, settled in Ross county; Nancy married, and is now deceased; and Margaret, who married William Ater, still resides in Deer Creek. Josiah Reeves, from near Culpepper Court House, Virginia, emigrated to Deer Creek township in 1808, where he reared a numerous family, none of whom now reside in the township.

Ebenezer Davis, who lived on the west branch of the Potomac river, in Virginia, emigrated to Ohio in 1813, arriving in Deer Creek township in November of that year. During the first years of his settlement he lived on the farm now owned by George Wood. In 1817 he removed to Williamsport village, and opened a hotel, the second one in the township. Mr. Davis became quite prominent in public affairs. In 1848 he removed to Indiana, where he died two years later. Mrs. Davis died in 1846. The family consisted of ten children, but three of whom are now living—Sarah (Mrs. Douglas), who now lives near Danville, Illinois; Ebenezer S., who married Sedalia McFarland, and lives in Williamsport, where he has been postmaster since 1835; and Margaret, who married John L. Barns, and lives in Washington, Fayette county, Ohio.

Jacob Terwilliger came from Ulster county, New York, to Deer Creek in 1815, and located on land now owned by Cyrus Courtright, where he died, June 10, 1828, leaving a wife and one child. The latter became the wife of John W. Wiggins. Mrs. Terwilliger subsequently became the wife of Jeremiah Brown, esq., and is now deceased.

Philip Terwilliger reached Deer Creek the year following his brother's arrival. His selection of land was also on Yellow Bud Creek, where he accumulated a fine property, owning, at the time of his death, one thousand acres of land. He died March 23, 1858, and his wife, Mary, died in 1868. One child was born prior to coming to Ohio—Eliza, now the wife of Isaac Halstead, of Indiana. The following children were born in Ohio: Abram, Sarah, Jacob, David, Catharine, John, and Lewis, all of whom are living except Sarah, who died in Michigan.

James Rose, also from Ulster county, arrived in Deer Creek in June, 1818, where he spent his remaining years, dying September 6, 1861. Mr. Rose was thrice married. The children, all born of the first marriage, were six in number—Levi, James, Sarah, Jonathan, Peter, who was quite a public man, serving as State representative, etc., and Abraham—three of whom are now living.

Henry Grove was born in Virginia, married there, and soon after the close of the war of 1812 settled in Ross county, near the southern line of Deer Creek township. He died in Franklin county. There were six children in the family—John, who married Hannah Lackey, and died on the farm still occupied by his widow; Henry, Polly, William, Abraham, and Sarah, all deceased.

John Lackey, who was a captain in the war of the Revolution, came from Pennsylvania to Ohio in 1813, and located in Ross county, where both himself and wife died. The children were: Reason, Thomas, Ira (deceased), Hannah (Mrs. Grove), Richard, Sanford, Anna (Mrs. J. Henley), Maria (Mrs. John Ritchey), and Susan (Mrs. Kennell).

George Bennett, a native of Winchester, Virginia, married Margaret Perrill, of the same place. Three children were born there—John (deceased), Elizabeth (Mrs. Philip Foresman), and James, who married Matilda Renick, October 14, 1848. His children are George, Mary, and John, and live in Deer Creek. In 1820 George Bennett removed, with his family, to Ohio, making his first halt in Chillicothe, where he remained until 1825, when he located permanently on the farm now owned by his son, William, where he engaged in the stock business, in which he continued actively during the remainder of his life. He died May 31, 1858, and his wife soon followed, dying December 31st, of the same year. The children born in Ohio are: William, who occupies the old farm, Rebecca (deceased), and Helen (Mrs. F. W. Renick). James and William have farms of nearly twelve hundred acres each.

FIRST EVENTS.

The writer has met with very indifferent success in his search for data from which to prepare items for this topic. Among the first deaths in Deer Creek township, was the wife of Edward Davison, which event occurred soon after the family settled in the township, in 1803. The body was interred in the Christian burying-ground at Williamsport. In the fall of 1813 John Redin suffered death by his own hand. His body was rescued from the flames of his cabin, which he had fired previous to taking his life, and his remains were interred in the Christian cemetery. The beautiful cemetery on the west side of Deer creek, near Williamsport, was first occupied in 1875. George Gordy's remains were the first buried there.

A post-office was established at Williamsport in the year 1816. John Williams was commissioned postmaster, but he soon resigned, and was succeeded by Ebenezer Davis, who, in turn, gave way to Ebenezer S. Davis, esq., the present incumbent. The pioneer store was opened by a man named Foresman, in 1815, in a small building on Water street, yet standing, and now owned by A. D. Radcliff. This store closed in perhaps one year, and the village was without a store until 1822, when Joseph G. Dodridge began the mercantile business. The present merchants are: Wesley Davis, M. S. Leiby, John Henson and Ebenezer S. Davis, general merchandise; Dr. G. W. Hurst, drugs; Thomas Henson, groceries; John R. Wilkinson, tinware. The first orchard in the township was planted by P. H. Baker, as early as 1810, on lands now in about the center of Williamsport village. George Reid also planted an orchard about the same time. Many of these trees are now standing upon the lands of E. S. Davis, esq., within the limits of the village. The pioneer hotel was kept by John Wilson. It was located in Williamsport. Ebenezer Davis afterwards kept a house of entertainment for a series of years. John Harmount is the host of the only hotel now in the township. This is situated in Williamsport village.

ORGANIZATION.

It is impossible, at this time, to ascertain the exact date when Deer Creek was erected a township. It was, however, prior to the formation of Pickaway county, and while this territory was attached to Ross county. The earliest record of an election now extant is as follows: "At an election held at the house of Jesse Fizgerald, in Deer Creek township, on the first Monday in April, 1816, John Timmons, John Teverbaugh, and Jacob Funk, were chosen judges, and Thomas Williams and Jonah Rust, clerks of said election." Following is a list of the officers elected: Thomas Williams, John Teverbaugh, and John Timmons, trustees; David Yates, clerk; James Burbridge, treasurer; Simon and Jesse Hornbeck, overseers of the poor; John Mottester and David Crabill, fence-viewers; John Rust, lister; William G. Cantrill and Andrew Motter, constables; Benjamin Freeman, Charles Hays, William B. Baley, Jesse Fitzgerald, Christopher Cardiff, and Moses Colom, supervisors. Among the first justices of the peace were David Yates, Isaac Cade, and Alexander Rowen. On March 3, 1817, the following persons were chosen grand jurors: Isaac Hornbeck, James Burbridge, Benson Goldsberry, William B. Bailey, James Davis, Joseph Hays, Thomas Crabill, Edward Rector, Jeremiah Brown, William Baker, George Alkire, and Alexander Rowen; and the following, who are designated as travis jurors: William Burbridge, Simon Hornbeck, Andrew Motter, Peter Brown, John Littleton, Peter Mouser, John Mills, John Maddux, Jesse Hays, and Moses Colvin. Of all these names, none are living at this time in the township, many are dead, and some, perhaps, living in other localities, while but few have descendants in the township.

The township officers for 1879 are: William Bennett, William C. Ater, and George Betts, trustees: Dr. George W. Hurst, clerk; Dr. T. F. White, treasurer; A. McGath, assessor; Thomas Sweetman and James K. Walston, constables; and Jacob Baughman and Henry McGath, justices of the peace.

WILLIAMSPORT.

This place, which was at one time much greater than the little hamlet of to-day, was platted on February 27, 1818, and the same recorded, on the ninth of March subsequent, by Johnson Hunter, recorder of Pickaway county. The early records cannot now be found, but it is thought the date of its incorporation was in the year 1842. For some years the annual elections were held and the routine business transacted, as required by law. Finally, so much indifference was shown that the elections ceased, by default, and the act of incorporation became virtually extinct. This condition of affairs remained the same until the year 1858, when an election was held for village officers. During the Rebellion no elections were held. July 2, 1866, a third reorganization occurred, when the following officers were elected: James Marshall, mayor; J. D. Andrews, recorder; D. L. Knowles, treasurer; Dr. George W. Hurst, Dr. J. W. Hunsicker, Captain William B. Davis, A. D. Baughman, and A. D. Radcliff, trustees. Following are the names of those who have served as mayor since that period: Jacob Baughman, J. D. Andrews, Dr. G. W. Hurst, and A. D. Radcliff. J. D. Andrews is the present incumbent; T. Henson, treasurer; G. R. Baughman, clerk; Dr. T. C. Tipton, Dr. G. W. Hurst, A. L. Harmount, John Briner, A. J. Walton, and J. R. Wilkinson, members of council.

THE WILLIAMSPORT CORNET BAND

was organized February 5, 1876, with the following members: Captain William B. Davis, leader; W. E. L. Manly, A. L. Harmount, E. Blacker, C. C. Phebus, S. Pickle, J. B. Rose, J. Goody, I. B. Barnes, C. O. Eycke, C. T. Harmount, C. L. Lee, and R. W. Messmore. This band has a fine set of instruments, costing three hundred and twenty-five dollars. The following changes have occurred in the membership since organization: L. Rector, vice C. T. Harmount; D. P. Walston, vice C. L. Lee; and F. Hellagen, vice J. B. Rose.

MINERAL SPRING.

There is a chalybeate spring at Williamsport, the medicinal properties of which are said to be similar to the Delaware spring. Its waters are largely used by the residents within an area of several miles surrounding Williamsport.

CHURCHES.

Soon after a settlement was begun at Williamsport, the cause of Christ obtained a foothold that has continued to grow stronger until the present day. Contemporaneous with the dawning of the present century, occurred the wonderful religious excitement, characterized by various bodily contortions, but generally known as the "jerks." These were, we believe, first seen in the west, at a camp-meeting held at Cain Ridge, Kentucky.

In 1803, or, at least, as early as that, we are informed by Ebenezer S. Davis, from whom we obtained the data for this sketch, Rev. Barton W. Stone came to the infant settlement, and immediately began preaching the word of God in the wilderness. Rev. Mr. Stone was one of the leading spirits in the famous camp-meeting above referred to. The pioneer meetings were held at the house of George Alkire, and the subsequent year, 1804, a church was formed (denominated the New Light and Later Christian church), consisting in part of the following persons: Isaac Cade and wife; John Teverbaugh and wife; George Alkire and wife; Isaac W. Hornback and wife; and Simon Hornback and wife; and from this small beginning has grown a church now having a membership of two hundred and twenty-five persons.

As early as 1810 a hewed log meeting-house was constructed, at, or near, the residence of Dr. T. C. Tipton. In 1816, this building was disposed of, and a small frame church built, located upon ground now occupied by this society as a cemetery. This, a few years later, became too small to accommodate the rapidly increasing congregation, and a larger one was constructed near it. This building was occupied untill 1869, when the present commodious brick church edifice was completed. This building is in size forty by fifty-six feet, and cost complete, four thousand dollars. In is located upon land donated for the purpose, by Ebenezer S. Davis, esq. The trustees for building the church were: C. Hornback, John J. Alkire, C. W. Crabill, B. Radcliffe, and L. Walson. The present church management is: Ebenezer S. Davis and C. Hornback, deacons; E. S. Davis, treasurer; and T. W. Crabill, clerk; Dr. George W. Hurst is superintendent of the Sabbath-school, which has an attendance of one hundred scholars. The following ministers have presided over this church: Revs. Messrs. Stone, Joseph Badger, George Zimmerman, William Kincade, James Hays, Matthew Gardner, James Marom, George Alkire, James Burbridge, Isaac N. Walter, S. Bradford, Joseph Thomas, Daniel Long, John L. Green, Isaac Cade, Benjamin Seevers, John L. Perkins, Enoch Harvey, Thomas Hand, N. Dawson, C. A. Morse, T. A. Brandon, Peter McCullough, William Overterf, B. H. Chrisman, Joel Osgood, A. C. Hanger, and E. W. Humphries.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

The following sketch of this church is prepared by Dr. T. C. Tipton: According to the best information at hand the first class of this society was formed in 1826. Samuel Parrott, having purchased the farm now owned by S. G. Hunsicker, one-half mile east of Williamsport village, soon collected a few people of the Methodist faith together, and at his house held meetings, and soon afterward formed a class, consisting of Samuel Parrot and wife, Mary; Samuel Manley and wife, Ann; George Frame and E. Hunsicker. In 1831, Rev. Adam Poe, preacher in charge of what was then called "Deer Creek circuit," held meetings at the house of Mr. Parrott, who was now appointed class-leader, and John Tiffin, Joseph Hays and Jesse Hays, local preachers, were added to the class, with others whose names are now forgotten. An effort was now made to build a meeting-house. The frame was erected, but never finished, owing to the death of Mr. Parrott. Preaching was now held at the house of Peter Hunsicker and James McFarland alternately. In 1839 another effort was made to build a church, Wesley Roe taking the subscriptions. Joseph Hurst, Lewis Manley and William Summers were appointed trustees, and in due time a framed church edifice, some thirty-five by fifty feet in size, was completed. Its cost was perhaps three thousand dollars, and it was formally dedicated to the service of God, by Rev. Francis Wilson, in 1841. Additional ground was purchased in 1864, and upon this the present substantial brick church edifice was erected, the same season. Its cost was four thousand dollars. Rev. Joseph M. Trimble preached the dedicatory sermon in the winter of 1865–66. In this work Dr. G. W. Hurst was the contractor for the building, and Joseph Hurst, James Marshall, John Cox, Elijah Parrott and Dr. G. W. Hurst, trustees. In 1871 a neat parsonage was constructed, at a cost of three thousand dollars. Scioto circuit (from which Williamsport was detached) was formed in 1799; Deer Creek circuit was formed from a part of Scioto circuit in 1808; New Holland circuit was formed from Deer Creek circuit in 1854, and Williamsport was separated from New Holland circuit in 1866. The following pastors have been in charge of the circuit since its formation: 1866, Rev. David Smith; 1867, Dr. W. F. Hughey, who served three years, during which period an extensive revival occurred, and two hundred and eighty-two names were added to the membership; 1870, Rev. B. F. Thomas, now of Groveport, Ohio; 1872, Rev. F. S. Davis, now in the Cincinnati conference; 1874, Rev. David Mann, now at Lewis Center, Ohio; 1875, Dr. T. G. Ross, now in Kansas; 1876, Rev. H. L. Whitehead, now of Stanton, Ohio. In 1878 the present pastor, Rev. George W. Lott, was assigned to this circuit. During the winter of 1878–79 an extensive revival occurred, Mrs. L. O. Robinson, an evangelist, from Greencastle, Indiana, assisting the pastor. Two hundred names were added to the church membership, as the result of this meeting. The present trustees are Dr. T. C. Tipton, S. W. Dunlap, James Bennett, George Betts, H. L. Rector and Samuel G. Hunsicker. George C. Hays is the present efficient superintendent of the Methodist Episcopal Sabbath-school. The number of scholars enrolled is one hundred and seventy-six. Since the organization of the Methodist church in this section, in 1799, the following pastors have served in the work here: 1808, Benjamin Lakin, John Crain; 1809, John Collins, Wood Lloyd; 1810, Francis Travis; 1811, Ralph Lotspeich, J. Harris; 1812, R. Cloud, Charles Waddle; 1813, Samuel Parks, Alexander Cummins; 1814, H. B. Bascom; 1815, Isaac Quinn, Ledosa Baker; 1816, Walter Griffith, Isaac Pavly; 1817, Samuel Glaze; 1818, Shaderick Ruark, R. W. Finley; 1819, William Swayze; 1820, John Brown; 1821, William Stephens, A. Kinnear; 1822, Andrew McClain, I. C. Hunter; 1823, William Simmons; 1824, Zach Connell, J. F. Wells; 1825, James Collard, Nathan Walker; 1826, Jacob Delay, G. W. Young; 1827, John Stewart, John Ferrell; 1828, A. Sellers; 1829, Francis Wilson, J. T. Donahow; 1832, John H. Power, J. Gurley; 1833, David Lewis, Joseph A. Reader; 1834, C. C. Lybrand; 1835, Edward Estel; 1836, James Armstrong, Henry Wharton; 1837, W. L. Morrow, F. H. Jennings; 1838, Wesley Roe; 1839, Robert Chaney, Wesley Roe, J. F. Conroy; 1840, Elijah H. Field, W. M. D. Ryon; 1841, B. A. Cassett; 1842, David Reed, Philip Nation; 1843, Zack Wharton, J. D. Webb; 1844, Alexander Mehany; 1845, B. L. Jefferson; 1846, J. W. Lock; 1847, J. G. Dimmitt; 1848, William Sutton; 1849, Alexander Nelson, J. Laws; 1850, D. H. Sargent; 1851, Samuel Middleton; 1852, David Smith, H. F. Green, W. A. Prettyman; 1853, J. F. Williams, L. F. Drake; 1855, T. H. Phillip; 1857, H. T. Magill; 1858, W. C. Holleday; 1859, William Morris; 1860, J. Q. Lakin; 1861, J. W. Clark, T. G. Ross; 1862, Nath Westerman; 1863, I. B. Brodesick; 1864, E. H. Dixon. The remainder, to the present, are given in the sketch of Williamsport church.

MOUNT PLEASANT METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, from data furnished by Newton Rector. The first class of this society was formed by Jacob Terwilliger, in the year 1826, under the administration of Rev. Jacob Delay. It was composed of the following persons: Thomas and Abigail Emery, Jacob and Elizabeth Terwilliger, Henry and Elizabeth Rector, James, Jonathan and Lucy Rose, Philip, Sarah Ann and Mary Wiggins, John and Sarah Tiffin, Mariah Van Wagoner and Amy Kidney. Thomas Emery was the first class leader. There was preaching each alternate week, at the house of Henry Rector, who lived on land now owned by Newton Rector, and class meetings were held on the Sabbath at the house of Jacob Terwilliger, who lived on the farm owned by Cyrus Courtright. In 1838 a small frame meeting-house was built. This occupied the spot where now stands the commodious brick church edifice of the society. This first building was, in size, twenty-eight by thirty-two feet. It was built by subscription, and cost something over six hundred dollars. The trustees, or building committe, were James Rose, Jeremiah Brown, Henry Rector, Philip Wiggins, John Rector, Peter Rose, Jonathan Rose, John W. Wiggins and John W. Dallas. The building was completed, and in June, 1839, it was dedicated by Rev. A. M. Lorain. During the the winter of 1848-9, a great revival occurred, under the preaching of Rev. Alexander Nelson and James Laws, and many were added to the church membership. The present church edifice was completed in 1859, and dedicated by Rev. T. H. Phillips. The cost of the structure was five thousand dollars. Following are the names of the building committee: John R. Rector, Levi Allen and John Wiggins. This society has been supplied by the ministers of the circuit, whose names are given in the sketch of Williamsport church. A Sabbath school was formed in the early days of this church, which has proved a valuable auxiliary to the christian work.

Pleasant Grove chapel was dedicated in August, 1849. There was at this time a Protestant Methodist organization. After a time the society ceased to be, and at present there is no regular service held here.

SCHOOLS.

The first school of Deer Creek township, of which we have any definite knowledge, commenced in a little log house standing on or near the site of E. S. Davis' present residence in the village of Williamsport, in the summer of 1818. The teacher's name was White, and his scholars were quite numerous, being some twenty-five in number. Among these were Charles Wilson and a sister, and Margaret Davis and her brother, Ebenezer S., to whom the writer would express his thanks for valuable aid in the collection of general data for the history of this township.

Williamsport village school district was formed April 27, 1874, at an election held two days previous. Dr. T. C. Tipton, A. D. Radcliff, W. B. Davis, S. G. Hunsicker, Dr. George W. Hurst, and A. D. Rector were elected directors. The present school building was constructed during the ensuing summer, being completed in October. The cost of this structure, including real estate and furniture, was four thousand dollars. The school comprises two departments, primary and grammar. The total enrollment of pupils in the district is one hundred and thirty-three. Following are the names of the teachers in each department since its formation: Grammar, Anna M. Leiby, F. S. Rarey, P. R. Eycke, D. W. Kelley, W. J. Reynolds, and G. W. Lott; primary, Mento Harmount, Flora S. Rarey, Mrs. P. R. Eycke, Anna Norris, Emma G. Stoker, and Anna M. Leiby. The officers of this district for 1879 are: A. D. Radcliff, president; W. B. Davis, clerk; M. Welton, treasurer; Dr. George W. Hurst, Dr. T. F. White, and A. J. Walston, directors.

SOCIETIES.

Williamsport village has been noted for its incessant war upon the liquor traffic, and, of course, the Sons of Temperance and Good Templars have, at different periods, had extensive and effective organizations in the township. They have now ceased their labors. The oldest of the societies now in existence is Alpha Grange, No. 59, Patrons of Husbandry, whose charter bears date June 3, 1873. The following are the charter members: E. J. Strong, N. R. Strong, Lewis Terwilliger, E. L. Hall, A. Hibbons, M. Rector, M. F. Rector, N. Rector, L. J. Rector, S. R. Rector, M. L. Rector, W. Bolin, G. B. Rector, Belle F. Rector, A. D. Rector, Martha Rector, D. Terwilliger, E. Terwilliger, S. M. Yates, W. S. Rector, M. Rector, Benjamin Little, Mary Little, J. R. Hulse, J. R. Rector, J. A. Rector, W. A. Flowers, J. Pugh, H. C. Palacher, and Cyrus Courtright. On May 22, 1875, it was consolidated with Deer Creek Grange, No. 449, which was organized January 27, 1874, with the following charter members: C. O. Eycke, Philip Eycke, J. J. Myers, Mary A. Myers, Wesley Work, Catharine Work, J. W. Rector, William Girton, Susan Girton, R. W. Eycke, S. W. Dunlap, B. W. Harris, T. W. Crabill, John Silver, Mary M. Crabill, J. B. Watson, Thomas Furguson, Mary E. Dunlap, B. F. Hornbeck, Mary Harris, Cyrus Hornbeck, William I. Wood, Lizzie Allen, Joseph Borts, David J. Cox, D. C. Phebus, S. H. Phebus. I. C. Hornbeck, sr., W. H. Hays, Wesley Hays. First officers: J. J. Myers, master; B. W. Harris, overseer; C. Hornbeck, lecturer; P. Eycke, steward; B. F. Hornbeck, assistant steward; T. W. Crabill, chaplain; S. W. Dunlap, treasurer; C. O. Eycke, secretary; William I. Wood, gate-keeper; Catharine Work, ceres; Mary A. Myers, pomona; Mary E. Dunlay, flora; M. Crabill, assistant stewardess. Meetings are held on the fourth Saturday in each month, and Thursday night before the second Saturday in each month. The total membership is now sixty-eight. Officers for 1879: J. J. Myers, master; J. W. Ater, overseer; Lizzie Allen, lecturer; William E. Rose, steward; S. R. Rector, assistant steward; E. L. Hall, chaplain; Z. Ater, treasurer; D. Mater, secretary; R. B. Yates, gate-keeper: Mary Rose, ceres; Annie Ater, pomona; Ella Wolfe, flora; Mary A. Myers, assistant stewardess.

HEBER LODGE, NO. 501, F. AND A. MASONS.

The charter of this lodge is dated October 21, 1875, and bears upon its face the following names: William B. Davis, Henry Clarke, John A. Alkire, Palmer Lowe, Benjamin Linville, John J. Myers, James D. Finnell and Clinton L. Lee. Its first officers were W. B. Davis, W. M.; H. Clarke, S. W.; J. J. Alkire, J. W.; J. D. Finnel, secretary; J. J. Myers, treasurer; P. Lowe, S. D.; B. Linville, J. D.; C. L. Lee, tyler. The lodge organized and met in a small room over Dr. George W. Hurst's drug store. In May, 1876, the lodge had completed and first occupied its present spacious hall. This is in the second story of the Masonic building, at Williamsport, erected at a cost of fifteen hundred dollars. The present membership is thirty-five. Stated communications on Tuesday evenings, on or before the full moon. Officers for 1879: Dr. T. F. White, W. M.; R. Wolfe, S. W.; J. W. Ater, J. W.; C. C. Phebus, secretary; J. J. Myers, treasurer; R. E. Harmount, S. D.; M. Compton, S. H. Phebus and W. B. Davis, stewards; W. R. Davis, tyler.

PHYSICIANS.

Perhaps no village in Pickaway county, with a population equal to that of Williamsport, has been blessed, or cursed, as the case may be, with as great a number of doctors. Early in its history, Dr. M. Brown located here. He accquired an extensive practice here and in the surrounding country, and his ability was above the average of practitioners of that day. After a term of years, he removed to Circleville, and is now president of the First National bank, of that city. Following him were Drs. Perkins, Thrall, Rush, Herriman, Cassett, Timmons, Ecord, Martin, Lewis, Black and Smith, of the "old school," and Drs. Zimmerman, Gould, Halstead, Radcliff, Judy, and Hunsicker, of the eclectic school. Many of these were practitioners of more than ordinary ability, some of whom died here, while others removed to fields of, perhaps, greater usefulness.

There are, at present, three practicing physicians in the township, viz.: T. C. Tipton, M. D., who graduated at the Starling medical college, Columbus, Ohio, in the class of 1852 and '53. He married Miss Miranda Loomis, of Central College, Ohio, and located in Williamsport, in January, 1855. Dr. Tipton was in the army during the years 1862–5, as assistant surgeon of the One Hundred and Thirteenth regiment Ohio volunteer infantry. He returned home, at the close of the war, and has since enjoyed a large and lucrative practice. George W. Hurst, M. D., graduated at the Eclectic college of medicine, at Cincinnati, in 1856, and located here soon after. He married Catharine Terwilliger, and, aside from his practice, conducts a drug store and an apiary. T. F. White, M. D., is also a graduate of Starling medical college, at Columbus, Ohio, receiving his diploma at the session of 1863–4. He entered the army as assistant surgeon of the Sixty-eighth regiment Ohio volunteer infantry, in the fall of 1863, and served till the close of the war. His wife was Miss Anna Nichols. He located in Williamsport in 1867.

Of dentists who have practiced in Williamsport, there are: Dr. Scott, now of Lancaster; Dr. Peasely, now of Fayette county, Ohio, and Dr. James R. McCollister, who has long since retired from practice, but who still resides here.

INDUSTRIAL PURSUITS.

Great inconvenience was experienced by the pioneer settlers everywhere for the want of means by which to convert their grain into a condition suitable for bread-making. Foremost in the appliances for that purpose, we find the "stump mortar," a description of which is given elsewhere. Following this, was the hand-mill. This was a slow and tedious means of preparing one's "daily bread;" still it was an improvement on its predecessor. Next came the grist-mill, rude and imperfect, 'tis true, as compared to the mills of to-day; yet its advent was a long stride in advance of anything preceding it. The pioneer grist-mill in Deer Creek township was built by Pennell H. Baker, in 1812. Its location was on the north side of the present "pike," and its cumbrous machinery was propelled by the waters of Deer creek. About the same time a saw-mill was constructed near the grist-mill. These mills were destroyed by fire some ten years later. The saw-mill was rebuilt by John Reynolds, and the grist-mill by John McFarland, but both eventually went to decay. David Yates built a grist-mill, the second in the township, in 1814. This occupied the site of the mill now owned by A. T. Foster. The present mill was built by Daniel and Benjamin Haynes, but a few years since.

The present grist-mill, at Williamsport, was erected for a distillery, in about 1836, by a man named Laramore. It was in operation some three years as a distillery, and then converted into a grist-mill. It is now owned by George Wood and Moses Welton.

David Yates put in operation the first distillery in the township. The date was early, perhaps 1815; the location, on Deer creek, near the site of Foster's grist-mill. The manufacture of whiskey was at this time a very lucrative vocation, and it was continued many years, while the owner waxed rich from the avails. David Hanson built a distillery on the opposite side of the stream from Yates', on the farm now owned by James Bennett. This was in the early years of the settlement.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

THOMAS CORWIN TIPTON, M. D.,

of Williamsport, Deer Creek township, Pickaway county, Ohio, is a son of Thomas S. and Elizabeth Tipton, and was born at Pleasant Ridge farm, near Harrisburgh, Pleasant township, Franklin county, Ohio, on September 10, 1827. He attended the neighborhood schools until his education had reached a point beyond which they could not afford him instruction, and then, in 1844, went to Delaware and attended the Ohio Wesleyan university; he was obliged to pay his own way, and did so by teaching in various district schools. Thus, creditably but with difficulty, he worked his way for five years, and, being eager to learn, and applying himself closely to study as only those can who so dearly buy what many, who have superior advantages, scorn, he acquired a good, thorough, general education. But he had an ambition beyond this, and a desire to lead a professional life. Disadvantages were again in his way, but he overcame them. He was unable at once to begin, as he would have desired, a course in some medical college, but, while gaining a subsistence by teaching, he devoted his spare time to reading and study in his brother's office, at Darbyville. He continued in this way for several years, and, at length, was able to go to Columbus, where he had enlarged opportunities.

T. C. Tipton

RESIDENCE OF DAVID R. YATES, DEER CREEK TP., PICKAWAY CO., O.

He studied there under Dr. R. L. Howard, and entered the Starling medical college. He graduated from this excellent institution February 22, 1852, receiving, in addition to his diploma, the unanimous vote of approval of the faculty. After his graduation Dr. Tipton returned to Darbyville and went into practice as a partner of his brother. Some time after that he removed to Williamsport, his present residence, and established himself in a lucrative practice, which has been uninterrupted except by his absence during the war, and three years thereafter. In 1862 the doctor went into the army as assistant surgeon of the One Hundred and Thirteenth regiment of Ohio volunteer infantry, and remained in that capacity in the service until the close of the war, most of the time being, by the order of Secretary Stanton, detached from his regiment, discharging hospital duty and serving upon the board of examiners of applicants for enlistment or discharge. Upon the close of the war the subject of our sketch resolved to try his fortune professionally in Groveport, Franklin county; he remained there only about three years, and then removed to his old residence, Williamsport.

Dr. Tipton, as man and physician, is held in the highest esteem by his fellow-citizens of the village and neighborhood, and most deservedly, for the same conscientiousness and application to duty, for which he is noted in his practice of medicine, characterizes him in all his social and business affairs. He is generally regarded as one of the most thoroughly cutlivated practitioners in Pickaway county; is held in high repute by his professional brethren and by the people of Deer Creek, and the western part of the county, as is evidenced by his very successful practice among them. He is a man of large general information, and a careful, conservative thinker. He is not, and has never been, a politician or place-seeker, but takes a considerable interest in, and is a close observer of, political movements. His vote is cast for the success or the principles represented and supported by the Republican party.

His religious affiliation is with the Methodist Episcopal denomination, and he has been, for a long term of years, one of the stewards of the church at Williamsport.

The doctor is a practical temperance man in his views and a total abstinence man in his habit. He has never tasted liquor and seldom prescribes it.

Dr. Tipton was married to Miranda, daughter of Horace and Jannett Loomis, of Blendon township, Franklin county, Ohio, March 7, 1855. The have two children living, and have been bereaved by the death of one—their first-born, Lizzie—who was born December 16, 1855, and died September 22, 1866. The children remaining are: Alice, born November 18, 1857, and Thomas H., born October 24, 1869.

THE YATES FAMILY.

David Yates was born in Culpepper county, Virginia, September 23, 1774. Soon after 1800, he emigrated to Ross county, Ohio, and settled near South Salem, where he was married, about 1803, to Christine Eberson. Two children were born to them while they lived in Ross county—Lovell, born January 23, 1804; and John, born December 26, 1805. In 1807 they moved to Deer Creek township, Pickaway county, where were born Reazon, December 10, 1807; Nancy, February 17, 1310; Elizabeth, February 12, 1812; David, April 10, 1815; Mary Ann, October 9, 1817; Emeline, March 31, 1820; Mahlon, May 3, 1822; Amos, July 15, 1823; Joseph, April 25, 1825; and Joshua Osburn, October 12, 1827.

Soon after arriving in Deer Creek township, Mr Yates built a saw and grist-mill, and a still-house, on Deer creek, near the site of the present grist-mill, This was the first water mill in the township, and was built by the labor of his own hands, he being a millwright. He even hewed the logs of which the building was constructed. After building his mill property, he cleared land, and planted one of the first, if not the first orchard, in the neighborhood.

During the war of 1812 he became a soldier, and received a commission as an officer, in which capacity he served.

Both himself and his wife were zealous members of the Methodist church, and people who had not an enemy in the community in which they lived, winning the respect and confidence of all. He died March 30, 1840, and his wife died some years later, about 1856. He was the first justice of the peace in Deer Creek township.

John Yates, the second son of David Yates, was born December 26, 1805. He was married in 1828, to Elizabeth Blue, in Deer Creek township, by whom he had eleven children: David R., Emily, Marcus L., DeWitt C., William, John, Francis Marian, Socrates, Miranda, Roland B., and Townsend, all of whom lived to become heads of families. Mr. Yates commenced life with nothing but his own hands with which to carve his way in the world, but by hard work and the exercise of a shrewd business capacity, he accumulated a large property, owning, at one time, some thirteen hundred acres of land. He was a large dealer in stock, sometimes making money and sometimes losing, in his ventures. He was a whole-souled, generous-hearted man, and became a favorite in his neighborhood. He was elected justice of the peace in 1835, and held the office many years. He also served as county commissioner. Before his death, he gave each of his children one hundred acres of land, and reserved a farm, on which his widow still lives.

David R. Yates was married October 25, 1859, to Nancy Brown, of Deer Creek township, who was born March 4, 1836, and died May 4, 1877. Their children are Mary E., Benjamin Floyd, Ballard, and Tabitha N. Mr. Yates bought of his father two hundred and twenty-seven acres of land, receiving a credit on it of two thousand, three hundred dollars, as his portion of the undivided estate. He has since added to his property, until, at the present time, he is possessed of four hundred and sixty-six acres in Deer Creek township, and eighty-five and one-half in Madison county. He has served his township three times as assessor, and has declined to run for other offices in the gift of the people. He was nominated, August 2, 1879, on the Democratic ticket, as State representative from Pickaway county.

A representation of his house appears in this connection.

WASHINGTON.

Washington lies east of Circleville, and along the eastern line of the county, with Walnut township adjoining on the north, and Pickaway on the south. Its surface is quite rolling, except in the southern part, where it is comparatively level. The principal water course is Hargus creek, which rises in the northeast part of the township, flows southwest, and unites with the Scioto, west of Circleville. Scippo creek flows through a part of sections twenty-five and thirty-six. Besides these, there are several other smaller streams, of not sufficient importance to require description. The soil of Washington is principally a mixture of gravel and sand, with a smaller proportion of low, or good corn lands, than are found in some of the other townships of the county. The native varieties of timber did not differ materially from those of neighboring townships, being chiefly oak, of all kinds, ash, beech, maple, hard and soft, walnut, hickory, butternut, hackberry and elm. The township is highly improved, the farms being generally smaller than those of other townships, and containing, in most cases, good dwellings and barns.

SETTLEMENT.

We date the settlement of the township from the arrival of John Anderson, in 1797. He came from Pennsylvania, accompanied by his wife and ten children. John, his son, came out before, and selected a location on Hargus creek, in section ten, and when the land was opened for entry, took up about six hundred and forty acres, in sections ten and three. When the family came, they settled where John had located. The descendants of the family are now widely scattered, with the exception of the children of Bethuel, one of the sons of the pioneer Anderson, most of whom reside in this county. Bethuel Anderson was born June 6, 1790, and married Mary Moore, whose parents were among the earliest pioneers of Deer Creek township, Fairfield county. For eleven years after his marriage, Bethuel Anderson occupied the farm of his wife's father, in Deer Creek, when he moved to the old homestead, on Hargus creek. He was a soldier in the war of 1812, serving as sergeant, and was afterwards a lieutenant in the State militia. He died, October 1, 1858, and his wife August 17, 1869. They had a family of four sons and seven daughters. Milton was killed in Washington Territory, December, 1863, by a water-spout, which swept away the custom house, of which he was an officer, and John was murdered at his residence, in Missouri, August 25, 1875, by three desperadoes, whose object was robbery. The surviving children are: Elizabeth, widow of Levi Johnson, residing in Indiana; Maria, widow of Joseph Heise, in this township; Zeruia, wife of John N. Anderson, in Iowa; Isabel, wife of Martin Wells, and Mary A., widow of Joel Huzzy in this township; Joanna, wife of Joseph Myers, in Perry county, Ohio; Louisa, wife of John Albright, in Walnut township, this county, and Harvey K., in Kansas.

David Culberson, a stepson of John Anderson, came out with the family, and subsequently married Margaret Rush and settled where the widow Parker now lives. He was a Methodist local preacher, and some of the earliest religious meetings were held at his cabin; he officiated at many of the pioneer funerals in this and other townships in the county; he finally removed to the Raccoon hills.

A man by the name of Zeimmer, a native of Germany, came, with his family, from Maryland to this township, in 1799, and entered one-half of section twenty-seven, on which they settled. The family consisted of the parents and seven children. In 1812 the parents, one daughter, and youngest son, Philip, removed to Richland county, where, a short time afterward, the father, mother, and daughter, were massacred by the Indians. An account of their terrible fate is given in Howe's "Ohio Historical Collections," as follows, the name, however, being given as anglicized—Seymour:

"In September, 1812, shortly after the breaking out of the late war with Great Britain, two block-houses were built in Mansfield: one stood about six rods west of the site of the court house; and the other a rod or two north. The first was built by a company commanded by Captain Shaeffer, from Fairfield county, and the other by the company of Colonel Charles Williams, of Coshocton. A garrison was stationed at the place until after the battle of the Thames. At the commencement of hostilities there was a settlement of friendly Indians, of the Delaware tribe, at a place called Greentown, about twelve miles southeast of Mansfield, within the present township of Green. It was a village consisting of some sixty cabins, with a council house about sixty feet long, twenty-five wide, one story in height, and built of posts and clapboarded. The village contained several hundred persons. As a measure of safety they were collected, in August, 1812, and sent to some place in the western part of the State, under protection of the government. They were first brought to Mansfield and placed under guard, near where the tanyard now is, on the run.

"While there, a young Indian and squaw came up to the block-house, with a request to the chaplain, Rev. James Smith, of Mount Vernon, to marry them after the manner of the whites. In the absence of the guard, who had come up to witness the ceremony, an old Indian and his daughter, aged about twelve years, who were from Indiana, took advantage of the circumstance and escaped. Two spies from Coshocton, named Morrison and McCulloch, met them near the run, about a mile northwest of Mansfield, on what is now the farm of E. P. Sturges. As the commanding office, Colonel Kratzer, had given orders to shoot all Indians found out of the bounds of the place, under an impression that all such must be hostile, Morrison, on discovering them, shot the father through the breast. He fell, mortally wounded; then springing up, ran about two hundred yards, and fell to rise no more. The girl escaped. The men returned and gave the information. A party of twelve men were ordered out, half of whom were under Sergeant John C. Gilkinson, now of Mansfield. The men flanked on each side of the run. As Gilkinson came up he found the fallen Indian on the north north side of the run, and at every breath he drew, blood flowed through the bullet hole in his chest. Morrison next came up, and called to McCulloch to come and take revenge. Gilkison then asked the Indian who he was. He replied, 'A friend.' McCulloch, who, by this time, had joined them, exclaimed, as he drew his tomahawk, 'D—n you! I'll make a friend of you!' and aimed a blow at his head, but it glanced and was not mortal. At this he placed one foot on the neck of the prostrate Indian, and, drawing out his tomahawk, with another blow buried it in his brains. The poor fellow gave one quiver, and then all was over. Gilkison had in vain endeavored to prevent this inhuman deed, and now requested McCulloch to bury the Indian. 'D—n him; no!' was the answer; 'they killed two or three brothers of mine, and never buried them.' The second day following the Indian was buried; but it was so slightly done that his ribs were seen projecting above ground for two or three years after.

"This McCulloch continued an Indian fighter until his death. He made it a rule to kill every Indian he met, whether friend or foe. Mr. Gilkison saw him some time after, on his way to Sandusky, dressed like an Indian. To his question, 'Where are you going?' he replied, 'To get more revenge!'

"There was living at this time on the Black fork of the Mohican, about half a mile west of where Petersburgh now is, a Mr. Martin Ruffner. Having removed his family for safety, no person was with him in his cabin, excepting a bound boy. About two miles southeast, stood the cabin of the Seymours. This family consisted of the parents—both very old people—a maiden daughter, Catharine, and her brother, Philip, who was a bachelor.

"One evening Mr. Ruffner sent out the lad to the creek bottom to bring home the cows, when he discovered two Indians. They called to him, saying that they would not harm him, but wished to speak to him. Having ascertained from him that the Seymours were at home, they left, and he hurried back and told Ruffner of the circumstance, upon which he took down his rifle, and started for Seymour's. He arrived there, and was advising young Seymour to go to the cabin of a Mr. Copus, and get old Mr. Copus and his son to come up and help to take the Indians prisoners, when the latter were seen approaching. Upon this young Seymour passed out of the back door and hurried to Copus', while the Indians entered the front door, with their rifles in their hand. The Seymours received them with an apparent cordiality, and the daughter spread the table for them. The Indians, however, did not appear to be inclined to eat, but soon arose and commenced the attack. Ruffner, who was a powerful man, made a desperate resistance. He clubbed his rifle, and broke the stock to pieces; but he fell before superior numbers, and was afterwards found dead and scalped, in the yard, with two rifle balls through him, and several fingers cut off by a tomahawk. The old people and daughter were found tomahawked, and scalped, in the house. In an hour or so after dark, young Seymour returned with Mr. Copus and son, making their way through the woods by the light of a hickory bark torch. Approaching the cabin, they found all dark and silent within. Young Seymour attempted to open the door, when it flew back. Reaching forward, he touched the corpse of the old man, and exclaimed, in tones of anguish, 'Here is the blood of my poor father!' Before they reached the place, they heard the Indians whistling on their powder chargers, upon which they put out the light, and were not molested."

The sons, George, Henry, Frederick, and Abraham, all settled in this county, and George and Abraham remained here until their death. Jacob, son of Abraham Zeimmer, now lives in Walnut township, aged nearly seventy-one.

John Rager, who first located on the Pickaway plains, came to Washington about 1800. Subsequently, he entered, in connection with his son-in-law, Nicholas Miller, and a man by the name of Valentine, three-fourths of section thirty-three. Rager was a great hunter, and was in the forest, with his gun, almost constantly. He killed a number of bear, and a great many deer and wild turkeys. It is said he would kill, sometimes in a single day, five or six deer. It was his custom to keep from two to three hundred hogs, which derived their subsistence from the abundant mast which the forest furnished. He never raised any grain for them, and one winter, which was unusually severe, about one-half of them died. The rest he wintered through on venison. His son, John, would follow him with a horse and sled, and take home the deer as his father killed them. Rager finally, when eighty years old, went to Vinton county, where game was more plenty. He lived to be nearly one hundred years old.

Jacob Greenough, one of the earliest settlers in the township, was also a squatter on the plains, in Pickaway township. From thence he moved to Fairfield county, but the land on which he located being entered soon after, he came to Washington and entered the southeast quarter of section twenty-three, which he occupied until his death. Three of his children are known to be living, to-wit: Jacob, at Stoutsville, Fairfield county, aged nearly ninety; Andrew, in Indiana, and Philip, in Illinois.

Nicholas Miller was an early settler where the residence of the late Jacob Hitler now stands. He was a blacksmith, and had a shop there. Mrs. Miller was a daughter of John Rager. Four of their children are now living, one of whom is Mrs. George Try, of Circleville. Nicholas Miller's estate was the first administered upon in Pickaway county.

David Liest came to Washington as early as 1805, and entered the southwest quarter of section twenty-three, which, a year afterwards, he sold to his brother, Andrew, on his arrival from Pennsylvania, David then locating a mile further west. John D. Liest, his son, is a resident of the township.

George Pontius, sr., his wife, Catharine, and five of their seven children, together with their son-in-law, Peter Row, and his family, came from Center county, Pennsylvania, in the spring of 1808, They came by wagon, and were four weeks on the road, during which it rained every day, except three. Mr. Pontius located on the northwest quarter of section twenty-two, where Rufus Brobst now lives, and gave each of his children a quarter section of land. On the twenty-fifth of August, 1810, his wife died, and about two years afterward he married again, his second wife surviving him. His children, who were all bo n of his first wife, are as follows, named in the order of their age: Conrad, Betsey, George, Samuel, Daniel, Catharine and Margaret. Conrad came into the township at a very early date, making the journey on foot; he remained two years, boarding with the family of John Anderson, and returned to Pennsylvania. In 1806, two years before the rest of the family came, he and his brother George, with their wives, came out with a four-horse team and wagon. Culverson gave George Pontius the use of a cabin until he could build one, which he did shortly afterward, on the location now occupied by Daniel Haas. Afterwards, he built, on the same site, a brick house, which was the first in the township. David, his son, now resides about a mile south of the old homestead.

Conrad settled where Ezekiel Morris now resides, his farm adjoining that of his brother George. Many years after, he removed to Piqua, Ohio, where he died. Betsey was the wife of Peter Row. Samuel settled where John Knight now lives. Daniel occupied, until his death, the old homestead. His son, Daniel, is a well-known citizen of Circleville township. Catharine married Adam Martin, and first located on the place now occupied by Amos Groce, and, afterwards, where Samuel Bowman resides.

He died there in 1849. Mrs. Martin, aged eighty-six, November 5, 1879, now resides in Walnut, with her son, Jacob. She is the only surviving member of the family. Margaret became the wife of Hector Curts.

Peter Row located on the northeast quarter of section twenty-two. He kept a cabin for the accommodation of immigrants, and many of them found in it a place of temporary shelter. Mr. Row was a potter by trade, and followed it the greater part of his life. By selling pork, corn, and other necessaries, together with his trade, he got his start in the new country; he received for pork only from one cent to a cent and a half per pound, and a proportionate price for grain. Mr. Row died in 1849, and six of his children are now living, of whom Mrs. Andrew Leist, Samuel, and George, reside in this township. Mrs. Myers and Mrs. Rambow live in Illinois, and David, the oldest brother, in Union county, Ohio.

THE FIRST ROAD

opened in the township was the old Lancaster road, or Westfall road, as it was originally called. Along this road most of the early settlers located. One of the first was Christopher Earnest, who settled on the southwest quarter of section fourteen, in 1806. The farm is now owned by Jacob J. Stout.

George Hoffman and his wife Mary (Harpster) came from Union county, Pennsylvania, the same year, and settled on the southeast quarter of the same section. Their ten children were born after their settlement. Four—Peter, John, George, and Mrs. Samuel Winstead—live in this township, and the rest in the west. Peter, now in his seventy-first year, married Elizabeth Leist, and first settled where their son, Jacob, now lives. He removed to his present location in 1855. John located where he now lives in 1835. His wife, Mary Ann Easter, died in 1861. George, who occupies the homestead, married, for his first wife, a daughter of Abraham Neff, formerly of Fairfield county. She died many years ago, and he subsequently married Elizabeth, daughter of Andrew Leist, with whom he now lives.

John Harmon came from Pennsylvania in 1806, with his family, consisting of his wife—Dorothy Gift—and five children. He settled on section twenty-five, where he died about 1834, his wife surviving him a few years. Their children were: John, who was an early settler in Salt Creek township; Catharine, who married Abraham Martz; Jacob, Samuel, and George, former residents of this township. Samuel was killed in 1819, at the raising of the log house of George Leist—a log rolling on him. George Harmon, who occupied the homestead after the death of his father, married Elizabeth Surface. He died in May, 1853, aged sixty-three years; and his wife in April, 1876, eighty years of age. They had but two children—twin daughters—who are still living, viz.: Mary, widow of Joseph Mills, in Williams county, and Elizabeth, widow of Obediah Gessells, who died July 15, 1874. Mrs. Gessells occupies the place on which her grandfather settled in 1806.

Andrew Leist moved into the township about this time, and purchased of his brother, David, the southwest quarter of section twenty-three, which David had entered the year before. Andrew died here in 1851. He was the father of twelve children, three of whom died young. Four are now living. John A. and Amos A. are among the leading farmers of this township, and the other two live in Wyandot county.

William Bowman and family arrived from Shenandoah county, Virginia, in 1810, and lived for five years in the northwest part of Fairfield county. At the expiration of that time he came to Pickaway county and purchased, in Washington township, the farm now occupied by Ezekiel Morris, then occupied by Conrad Pontius. He died here, October 16, 1823. He was the father of fourteen children, six of whom are living. Joseph, who lives in Walnut, aged seventy-six, made a trip to New Orleans, from Circleville, in 1823, on a flat-boat. The boat was fourteen feet wide and about seventy feet long, and was in charge of Barnard Prebble.

Henry Dreisbach came from Pennsylvania with his brothers in 1811, being then seventeen years old, and made his home with his brother Martin, in Ross county. He learned the carpenter's trade of Joseph Foust. On August 30, 1817, he married Mary Stauffer, and settled where his son, Edward, now lives, in section twenty-four, Washington township. He died in 1875. Mrs. Dreisbach died in 1850. They had ten children, of whom four are living.

Leonard Warner, from Berks county, Pennsylvania, settled where Silas Young now lives, northeast quarter of section fourteen, in 1812. About fifteen years after his settlement there, he died. There are six of the children now living: Jonathan and Andrew, in this township; Jacob and Henry, in Indiana, and Mrs. Christy and Mrs. Dumm, in Clear Creek township, Fairfield county.

George Wertman came to Ohio from Pennsylvania, in 1814, with his step-father, Andrew Hines, and his family, who settled in Clear Creek, Fairfield county. Wertman was then a lad of some ten years of age. He learned the trade of potter, serving an apprenticeship of five years, but he never followed the business to any extent. The first purchase of land made by him was in Madison township. This he sold, two years afterward, and then came to Washington and rented, for a few years, the farm which he subsequently bought, and on which he still resides. In 1827, he married Susanna Leist, daughter of David Leist. She died in 1873. Mr. Wertman is now aged seventy-four.

George Heise came from Pennsylvania, in 1818, driving the team of Mahlon Yetter and family, who settled where the late John Parks resided. Mr. Heise was then in his eighteenth year, and went to work by the month. In April, 1821, he married Betsey Hane, and continued to work around until 1833, when he purchased one hundred acres in the southeast quarter of section three, where he has since resided. His old log house, which he first began housekeeping in, on the banks of Hargus creek, is still standing. His first wife only lived about two years after their marriage, and he married, May 20, 1826, Sarah Smith, by whom he has had twelve children, six boys and six girls, of whom eight are living. Mr.

Heise is now in his seventy-ninth year, and Mrs. Heise in her seventy-fourth.

Thomas Wells, a native of Maryland, came to Pickaway county, in 1818. In 1820 he was united in marriage to Margaret Fulk, and settled on a farm in the northeast part of the township, which still remans in the family. He died at the residence of Jonas Shellhammer, in East Ringgold, aged nearly eighty-eight. He had four children, three of whom are living. Martin Wells, who married a daughter of Bethuel Anderson, lives in Washington; and Isaac, and Mrs. Jonas Shellhammer, in Walnut township.

This same year, George Myers and family emigrated to Ohio, from Berks county, Pennsylvania, and settled in Fairfield county. A daughter, Anna, became the wife of John Stout, who came to Fairfield with his parents at an early date. They were married in 1820, and after living for a short time in Fairfield, removed to Washington, where Mrs. Stout still lives. A portion of the log house into which they moved so long ago, is still standing near her present brick residence. Mr. Stout died in 1864. He was the father of thirteen children, of whom ten survive, but are widely scattered. John and his family live with his mother on the old homestead.

Francis Dedo was the first settler where Peter Hoffman now lives. His cabin—a double log—stood on the hill near the road, just west of where Mr. Hoffman's residence now stands. He finally sold to Peter Moyer, and removed to Sandusky.

John Clark was the first settler in section two, and his location was where R. Huffer now lives. Henry Sackreider was an early settler in section one, living near the county line.

George Wise settled at an early date where the widow of Andrew Leist now lives, and finally removed from the township. A man by the name of Apple first lived where Isaac Stout now lives.

John Gray, a native of Philadelphia, with his wife and one child, removed to Muskingum county, Ohio, in 1825. In 1829 he came to this county, settling in Walnut township, on one hundred and twelve acres, in the southwest part of the township. In 1847 he sold out, and purchased and settled in the northeast quarter of section two, Washington township. Mr. King and his wife now reside with their son-in-law, Daniel Haas.

EARLY SCHOOLS.

The first school attended by the children of the pioneers of Washington township, was kept in Clear Creek township, Fairfield county, by a teacher by the name of Hump. The school-house was a very rude structure, with stick chimney and fireplace, the back of which was made of hard-heads. The first school within the township was kept in the old cabin of George Hoffman, and Samuel Gensell was one of the earliest teachers. The cabin was afterwards moved about a mile and a half farther west, and fitted up for a school-house. A school was kept, at an early date, in a log house on the farm then owned by Jacob Greenough. A man by the name of Horn taught the first school. In 1835 or 1836 the township was divided into six school districts, the same that it now contains.

RELIGIOUS INTERESTS.

Religious meetings were held in the township several years before any church organization was effected. Meetings were held at an early date in the log barn of George Hoffman, in section fourteen. The first church organized was a German Reformed and Lutheran society, called Zion's church. It was formed in 1808 or 1809, by a preacher by the name of Foster. He continued to preach for some time, and was followed by Jacob Leist, who officiated as its minister for about fifty years. Since Mr. Leist, Revs. Messrs. Gost, Martin, Herring, and Schuman, have preached for the society. The first meeting house was built soon after the church was organized. It was a two-story log house, but was afterwards torn down and rebuilt as one-story.

ST. PAUL'S CHURCH, of the Evangelical Association, was organized, as nearly as can be ascertained, about fifty years ago. They held their meetings at the house of John Moyer and at other dwellings, until the erection of a church building, in 1849 or 1850. It was a frame, and stood a little south of the present brick church, which was erected, in 1870, at a cost of something over thirty-one hundred dollars. Among the earliest preachers of the church were Charles Hammer and Joseph Long. The present pastor is C. M. Reineholt, and A. Evans, his assistant. The church has a Sabbath-school, under the superintendency of Edward Dreisbach.

THE PONTIUS UNITED BRETHREN CHRUCH

was organized about the year 1830, at the house of Daniel Pontius, and the meetings were held there for a number of years. The church building was erected in 1848. The question of its location excited some interest among the members, who were about equally divided on two proposed sites, the one chosen, and one in the west part of the township, on the farm now owned by the widow Barnhart. The matter was decided by the vote of the chairman of the meeting called to consider it. The ground on which the church was built was donated by Daniel Pontius. Peter Johnson was the first class leader, which position is now filled by Wesley Leist. The membership is now about thirty.

THE UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH,

in the south part of the township, known as the Morris church, was organized in about 1842, with seventy-five members. The organization was the result of an extensive revival held in the church just before its completion, during the labors of Rev. William Fisher, who was then on the circuit. A class of about a dozen members, in another portion of the township, called the Arnhart class, soon after united with it. The church now numbers about forty members. Rev. George Devens is pastor, and John S. Morris, leader.

BETHANY UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH.

This class was first formed in 1838 or '39 at the house of John May, who then lived on the farm now owned by Jacob Martin, Rev. William McCabe officiating in its organization. The meetings were first held at Mr. May's, and subsequently at the Evangelical church, on the south line of Walnut township, until the erection of Bethany church, in the winter of 1874. The building cost about fourteen hundred dollars, and was dedicated by Bishop Weaver. The present membership of the society is about twenty-seven, with Jacob Markwood as leader. The pastor is Rev. Mr. Waggoner.

BURIAL PLACES.

The first burying ground in the township was the Zion's church graveyard, laid out as early as 1809. The first burial in it was that of a child of Andrew Leist. There are now four other cemeteries in the township, one in connection with each church.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

JACOB HITLER,

who died at his residence in Washington township, Pickaway county, Ohio, August 11, 1879, had resided in the territory now constituting Pickaway county, for a period of eighty consecutive years. His parents, George and Susannah Hitler, were among the earliest pioneers of the county. His father was a native of Maryland, and was born May 15, 1763. When a boy, he came with his parents to Franklin county, Pennsylvania, and there subsequently found his wife in the person of Susannah Gay, daughter of John Gay, of London, England. He removed with his family, then consisting of his wife and two small children, to Somerset county, Pennsylvania, and located in what was called "the glades." In April, 1799, he emigrated to Ohio. The mother and four children, with the household goods, came down the Ohio river on a flat-boat, to the mouth of the Scioto, where they were met by the father, who came through by land with a large number of horses. From Portsmouth the journey was made to this county by team and wagon, the goods being sent up the Scioto in a keel-boat. Mr. Hitler's first location was on the lower plains, in Pickaway township. In 1804, he entered one hundred and sixty acres in the west part of section thirty-three, Washington township, erecting his house in the southwest part, where he resided until his death, April 2, 1818. His wife survived him thirty years, dying September 16, 1848, at the age of nearly seventy-six.

Jacob was the third child, and was born during the residence of his parents in Somerset county, Pennsylvania, December 5, 1796. His boyhood was spent, like that of most of the sons of the pioneers, in the hard work upon the farm, incident to a new country. Shortly after his father's death, he and his brother, George, bought of William Gougar a quarter section of land, adjoining on the north the farm now owned by Mrs. Abraham Hitler, for which they paid twenty-three dollars per acre. He there made the beginning of his successful and busy life. Wheat was then worth seventy-five cents per bushel, but it soon after commenced to decline in price, and went down to twenty-five cents. Having but a few hundred dollars apiece, the brothers found it impossible to pay for their farm by raising grain and selling it at the then current price, and so they concluded to manufacture it into flour and ship it to New Orleans.

Then commenced their flat-boating experience to that city, which continued for eleven years, the first trip being made by Jacob Hitler, in 1819. The enterprise proved a success, the flour bringing a price which amounted for the grain to more than double what it would have sold for at home. The boats were constructed to carry from four to five hundred barrels of flour. They cost about one hundred and twenty dollars apiece, and were disposed of at New Orleans for whatever they would bring—sometimes only a few dollars. Mr. Hitler made five trips to New Orleans, the first two in 1819 and 1820, and after that, alternating with his brother, George. The first trip he returned from New Orleans to this county on foot, making the journey in twenty-two days, the same time required for a steamboat to come from New Orleans to Louisville. Mr. Hitler's prominent characteristics were strict integrity, unusual soundness of judgment and foresight, great industry and a fixedness of purpose which rendered successful everything he undertook. He acquired a fine property, owning at the time of his decease nearly two thousand acres of land, all of it lying in Pickaway county. He was elected a commissioner of this county in October, 1858, and served for the term of three years. He had, however, but little inclination for public office. In 1825 he was united in marriage to Sarah Gougar, who came to Pickaway county with her parents, in 1806. Mrs. Hitler died several years ago. To them were born the following children: George, September 28, 1825; Daniel, November 7, 1827; Susan, April, 1830; Nelson, January 24, 1833; Caroline, June 17, 1836; Jacob, no record; Ellen, February 4, 1843. George and Nelson occupy the homestead; Daniel lives in Pickaway township, this county; Susan is the wife of Lewis Lutz, and resides in Kansas; Caroline died young, and Jacob in infancy; Ellen is the wife of Evan Phillips, of Pickaway township.

Jacob Kistler

Edward Dresbach Eliza A. Dresbach

of Washington township, Pickaway county, Ohio, is the second son and eighth descendant of Henry Dresbach and his wife, Mary Stauffer, who were, respectively, of Northumberland (now Union) and Berks counties, Pennsylvania. Henry Dresbach was born November 22, 1794, and was a son of Jacob Dresbach and his wife Magdalene Buchs. Tracing the family farther back we see that Jacob was the eldest son of Martin Dresbach, who was born in 1717 in the earldom of Witgenstein, Germany, and marrying Anna Eve Hoffman, emigrated to this country and settled in Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, in 1746.

Henry Dresbach, the father of the subject of this sketch, came to Ohio in 1811, and after living one year in Ross county, removed to Salt Creek township, where he resided for a time with his brother George. At an early date he took up the farm in Washington township, where his son Edward now resides, and there remained until his death. He was a soldier in the war of 1812, and after his return from service entered actively into the labor incident to the life of a pioneer, cleared up his farm, and made upon it many valuable improvements. He began with little, had few advantages, but accomplished much. He was industrious, energetic, frugal, and, as a natural result, was successful. His farming was profitable, and his business affairs generally resulted favorably, so that, although not becoming a rich man, he yet accumulated more than a competency. Politically, he was a Democrat.

Henry Dresbach was a man of sterling moral worth, and one of those citizens who, by labors and example, benefitted the neighborhood in which he passed his life. He was a religious man, too, in practice as well as in theory. In his earlier years he was a member of the church of the United Brethren, but afterwards became connected with the Evangelical Association.

Mr. Dresbach and his wife, Mary Stauffer, were joined in wedlock March 30, 1817. The wife was born in 1796, and died in 1850. The husband survived her twenty-five years, and died June 9, 1875, upon the farm where he had resided three score years. These pioneers were the parents of eight daughters and two sons, viz.: Esther, born January 13, 1818, now the wife of Joseph Meisse, of Fairfield county; Henry, born July 12, 1819, died July 13, the same year; Eliza, born December 25, 1820, died November 29, 1832; Mary, born March 23, 1829, married Abraham Miesse, and, afterward, Mr. Raudabaugh; died September 11, 1862; Elizabeth, born November 10, 1824, died August 29, 1850; Angeline (Mrs. Daniel Miesse), born December 19, 1826, died June 9, 1878; Josephine (wife of Dr. J. Weist, of Jay county, Indiana), born February 9, 1828; Edward, born September 17, 1829; Louisa, born May 29, 1833, wife of John Switzer, of Fairfield county; Joannah, born May 6, 1837, died February 11, 1840.

Edward Dresbach was brought up as a farmer, and had the limited advantages of the home schools. He is one of the representative men and substantial citizens of Washington township. On the twenty-eighth of February 1852, he was married to Eliza Ann, daughter of David and Lydia (Bear) Heffner, of Washington township, born, respectively, November 3, 1807, and July 11, 1810. Mrs. Dresbach was born April 19, 1832. Her grand-parents, Abraham and Catharine Heffner, came from Berks county, Pennsylvania, to Salt Creek township at an early date. Both she and Mr. Dresbach are members of the Evangelical Association, the wife having joined in 1849, and the husband in 1857.

MONROE.

PHYSICAL FEATURES.

This township is bounded on the north by the townships of Darby and Muhlenburg, south by Perry and Deer Creek, east by Muhlenburg and Jackson, and west by Pleasant, Madison, and Marion townships, of Fayette county. Its surface features are similar to those presented in the surrounding townships: generally level, except along the streams. The soil is varied. It is for the most part clay, and well adapted to the growing of wheat and corn. The township is traversed from north to south by several streams of water. Clark's run, in the west part, heads near the north line of the township, and flows in an almost due south direction. Van Buskirk and Mud runs flow a southeasterly direction, and both empty into Deer creek. These streams are not of importance, so far as water power is concerned.

SETTLEMENT.

The following sketches of pioneer settlers are prepared from personal interviews. The writer has been unable to ascertain to whom belongs the honor of having been the first, or pioneer, settler in Monroe township.

The Hays family (for mention of whom see Perry township) were among the first settlers on Deer creek, in the southern part of the township.

Peter Van Buskirk, who married Ruth Rhodes, removed from Maryland to Chillicothe, in 1799. Then but a few straggling log cabins occupied the site of that now populous city, and the red man held almost undisputed possession of the soil. After one year's residence in Ross county, Mr. Van Buskirk removed to what is now Pickaway county, locating on the bank of Deer creek, in Monroe township. By some he is regarded as the pioneer settler in Monroe township. The farm upon which he then made a commencement is now owned by Samuel Dunlap. Here Mr. Van Buskirk died, April 9, 1836, and his wife died on the tenth of November, 1841. Mr. Van Buskirk erected, in early times, a grist-mill and distillery. At the time of his death he was an extensive land owner. The family consisted of eight children, of whom only one is now living: Mary, who married Jacob Gayman, now lives in Delaware county, Indiana. The names of the dead (some of whom became prominent in the affairs of the church or State) are: Lewis, Isaac, Samuel, John, Daniel, Abigail, and Sally.

Charles Longberry came from Pennsylvania, locating in Monroe township in 1800. He was of English birth, and his wife was Mary Van Buskirk. He died in 1837, and his wife in September, 1856. The family consisted of twelve children, but two of whom are now living—Margaret, who married Seth Hatfield, and Anthony, who married Leah Littleton, all residents of Monroe township at this time.

Christopher Cardiff came from Maryland to Deer Creek township in 1806. His wife's name was M. Gordey. He eventually located in Monroe township, where he passed the remaining years of his life. There were several children in the family, two of whom (Noah and Christopher) now live in Monroe township. Noah, who has been four times married, now occupies the old homestead. Christopher has been twice married; his present wife was Anna Bolen.

Benjamin Hill was a native of Maryland, and came from Carroll's Manor, in that State, to near Chillicothe, in 1807. There were numerous children in the family, but one of whom located in Pickaway county. He was a soldier in the war of 1812. He married Kitura Voadley, and, in 1822, settled some two miles southeast of New Holland village, in Perry township, where he died on September 6, 1842, and his wife in November, 1855. The children were: William, who died in the United States' army, in 1843; Sarah A., Elizabeth, Samuel, Mahala, and John F. Samuel only lives in Monroe township. He married Ally Ann Porter, has a grocery store, and is postmaster, having been appointed when the office was established, in 1855.

Sebastian Southward came to Ohio from Winchester, Virginia, in the fall of 1808, and during the winter he remained in Ross county. The subsequent spring he located permanently in Pike county, where he died in the year 1835. The wife died in 1864. Her maiden name was Mary Guy. There were six children in the family, only two of whom are now living—Henry, who married Catharine Nickson, and lives in Wyandot county, Ohio, and Pleasant, who located in Pickaway county in 1823. He has been thrice married. His present wife was Abigail Adkins.

David Maddux married Elizabeth Lingo, and came from Maryland to Ohio in 1809, and located in Ross county. Mrs. Maddux died in 1852, and her husband in 1859. Of the ten children composing this family but three are now alive—William, who resides in Ross county; David M., who married Tomsy Ann Wilson, and lives in Illinois; and Collins, whose present wife was Miss Rachel Dunham; he lives in Monroe township, where he has served as justice of the peace for many years.

John D. Hatfield lived on the north shore of Maryland, and came to Ross county in 1810, where he remained until 1829, when he settled permanently in Monroe township. Mrs. Hatfield died December 14, 1825, and Mr. Hatfield married Maria Baker. He died April 15, 1845, and his widow still survives. Eight children were borne by the first wife, two of whom only are now living in Monroe township—Seth, who married Margaret Longberry; and John W., who married Susanna Frazier. The children of the second marriage numbered nine, none of whom live in Pickaway county.

In about 1811, three brothers, Jeremiah, Josiah, and John Thomas, came from near Harper's Ferry, Virgina, to Ohio, and located near Chillicothe. In 1815 they settled in Monroe township. Jeremiah married Eleanor Norris. His farm was on Deer Creek, and is still owned by his heirs. The children were: William, who married Elizabeth Norris (two sons, Jackson and William H., live in Monroe); John, Leonard, and Richard. (For a more extended sketch of the Thomas family see the history of Perry township.) Benjamin Norris and family came from the same point and at the same period as the above. They located eventually in Monroe township.

John Merrell married Milly Short in Delaware, and came to Ohio early in the settlement of the central counties. He first located in Fayette county, and after a time removed to near Dayton, Ohio, where he died of cholera in 1831; age, fifty-five years. The wife died soon after; age, fifty-two. There were five sons and two daughters of the family; these but one lives in Monroe township, Jacob, whose present wife was Sarah Adkins, and who has ten children living.

Samuel R. Dawson was born in Virginia, but removed to Kentucky with his parents when but a lad. His father was killed, it is thought, by the Indians. Samuel R. married Dorotha Alkire, and in 1814 located in Monroe township, on land now owned by Isaac Collins and John McCafferty. Here he died, June 12, 1846. His widow died March 31, 1876. The children numbered nine, five of whom are now living. James and Perry (the latter of whom married Mary M. Humphry,) live in Monroe township; Mary, who married B. F. Parker, and Caroline, who married Major C. Long, live in Nebraska. Olivia, who married E. S. McClintock lives in Kansas.

Stanton Adkins, a single man, came from Wycomico county, Maryland, to Ross county, in 1816. He married Anna Timmons, by whom fourteen children were born. After some eighteen years' residence in Ross county a removal was made and a permanent settlement effected in Darby township, Pickaway county. Here the wife died, and Mr. Adkins married Rachel Ann Grindle, who is still living. The date of Mr. Adkins' decease was June 5, 1879. Eight children by the first and four by the second marriage are now living: George, who married Louisa Walston; Sarah, who married Jacob Merrill; Miranda, who married Jacob Williams; Theodocia, Roxana, Ezra and Mahala who live in Monroe township; Rodney, who married Lovena Eskridge; Stanton, who married Lucy Glewer; and Elizabeth, who married Henry Bailey, and live in Illinois; Mary A., who married Van Cressup, and lives in Wyandot county, Ohio. David was a soldier in the Forty-fifth regiment Ohio volunteer infantry. He was prisoner for thirteen months in Libby, Danville, and the Court of Death, at Andersonville. He returned home at the close of the war, broken in health, and soon died.

George Rowe was a soldier of the war in 1812, and in 1816 came to the then wilderness of Pickaway county. He purchased nearly one thousand acres of land in Monroe and Muhlenburg townships. His wife was Nancy Coleman. Mr. Rowe died July 20, 1850. Mrs. Rowe died December 8, 1868. The children born prior to coming to Ohio were: Silas A., Absolom, and John, who are deceased; and Lydia, who married Joseph Ingland and lives near Pontiac, Michigan. Of the children born subsequent to removing to Ohio: Mahala, married William Francis and lives a widow on the old farm; and Matilda, is deceased.

John Porter, George Richey and John Foster, with families, came from Pennsylvania to Monroe township in about 1817. They located in the southwest part of the township. Of the Porter family but one child remains: Aly, now the wife of Samuel Hill. The Richey family are represented by a son: Andrew, who lives near the old homestead. None of the Foster family now reside in the township.

Milburn Smith was an early settler. John R. Robison, a native of South Carolina, came to Clark county, married there, Mariette Edmiston, and in 1828, settled in Madison county, Ohio, where he died, December 26, 1876. Mrs. Robison died, April 22, 1848. Of the nine children composing the family, one only lives in Pickaway county—Thomas P., who married Ellen Sawyer, and resides in Monroe township. He is the owner of a large amount of real estate, and is one of the public men of the township. William Brooks, of Jefferson county, Virginia, settled in Deer Creek township, in 1830, and died there. One of the children lives in Monroe township—Absalom, who married Martha J. Francis.

John G. Grindle, of Maryland, located in Monroe township, in 1831. His wife was Ellen Wheeler. After a residence of several years in Pickaway county, the family removed to Union county, Ohio, where the mother died in 1858. Mr. Grindle died August 22, 1862. The children, who were all born prior to locating in Ohio, numbered ten; but two now live in Pickaway county—Louisa, who married Benjamin Henman, andlives in Muhlenburgh; and Rachel Ann, the widow of Stanton Adkins, who lives in Monroe.

William Riggin located in Monroe township, on the farm now occupied by Joseph Hays, in 1832. He was from Delaware. His wife was Esther Ann Lowe. She died in the fall of 1834, and Mr. Riggin returned east, and again married. He eventually removed to Illinois, where he died in 1874. Of the eight children which composed this family, four are now alive—Isaac, whose present wife was Corlinda Maddux, lives in Columbus; Jeremiah J., who has been twice married, lives in Madison township, Fayette county, Ohio (present wife, Mary J. Davis); Charles and Emeline are both married, and now live in Illinois.

Wilson Murphy and family, then consisting of a wife (Nancy) and seven children, came from Maryland, about 1830, and settled on Paint creek, in Ross county, where he resided until 1835, when he located, permanently, in Monroe township, where he died November 15, 1872.

Of the children, we learn that James, William, Wilson, jr., and J. W., now reside in Illinois; Thomas lives in Monroe township; Rachel A., died soon after settlement in Monroe; and Mary (Mrs. Timmons) resides in Kansas; Martha J. (Mrs. Justice), who was born in Ohio, now lives in the State of Indiana.

William C. Williams, whose father was one of the pioneers in Ross county, located in Monroe township, in 1836, and still resides there. His wife was Hetty Davis, by whom three children were born. The eldest, Mary, is deceased; Andrew G. and Cornelius W., now live in Monroe township.

Rev. James Marshall, who was a native of Virginia, came from Pennsylvania to Muhlenburg township, in 1843. Five years later he came to Monroe township, where he died, April 9, 1871. Mrs. Marshall died on March 3, 1879. There were eight children, three only of whom are now living in the county—E. M., who is married, and lives in Darby township; as does Mary (Mrs. John Mitchell); David H., who married Margaret Busick, and lives in Monroe township.

CHURCHES.

THE HEBRON METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH,

situated in the southwest part of the township, was formed soon after the settlement, which was in the twilight of the present century, and was composed, in part, of the following persons: John Porter and wife, Severen Maddux and wife, Mrs. John Foster, Mrs. Catharine Richey, Mrs. Eleanor Thomas, several of the Hays and Reeves families, and others, whose names are forgotten. Meetings were held in the log dwellings of the settlers for a time, and subsequently, in the little log school-house, near Foster's. Revs. Joseph Hays and William Morrow were perhaps the first circuit preachers on this charge, which was attached to Deer Creek circuit. For a list of ministers see sketch of Methodist Episcopal church at Williamsport, in another part of this volume.

A Sunday-school was formed in the old log school-house, and this is still kept up during the summer season. The present meeting-house was built as early as 1838, and is, without doubt, the first church edifice built in Monroe township.

CLARK'S RUN CHRISTIAN CHAPEL.

This religious society was formed early. In 1822, meetings were held in a small log building, put up for school purposes, and standing on the site of the cabin now occupied by Mrs. Marion Van Buskirk. In 1844, a hewed-log meeting-house was erected. This stood on the site of the present church, on lands donated for the purpose by Claris Hornbeck. In this log structure, such rapid advancement was made, that a larger building became necessary, and in 1868, the present substantial and commodious church edifice was erected. Among the early members were John and Sophia Van Buskirk, and numerous children; Benjamin Corkwell and wife; John and Abigail Thomas, and several children; the Rowlens, and many others. For complete list of pastors, see the Christian church in Williamsport, which was the first organized in this part of Ohio.

The church at Clark's run had, in its prosperous day, over one hundred members, with a respectable Sabbath-school, but, owing largely to deaths and removals, it has now lost its former prestige. Regular services were long since discontinued.

GREENLAND (FORMERLY TIMMONS) METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

The first class was formed here under the ministry of Revs. Philip Nation and Joshua Boucher, of the London circuit, in about 1834. Meetings were held in private houses until the erection of the log church, called, by common consent, the "Timmons meeting-house." In 1853 a framed meeting-house was constructed, and the present name substituted. Among the members of the first class were: Benjamin Maddux (who was first leader), wife and several children, Jesse Pritchard and wife, Wilson Murphy and wife, Kendall Long and wife, Elijah Hatfield and wife, John Barker and wife, Joshua Leasonbee, and Mrs. Elizabeth Timmons, who donated the land upon which the first meeting-house was erected. Among the names of ministers, the following are remembered: E. Webster, William Morrow, N. Hugh, John W. Still, George Fait, M. Wolfe, C. B. Warrington, T. Hurd, S. Maddux, T. Hall, W. Browning, J. Young, D. Smith, J. Martin, J. Q. Lakin, F. F. Lewis, J. Laws, A. M. Alexander, S. Rankin, D. Mann, and A. R. Miller, who is the present incumbent. In the division of the circuit, this charge was assigned to Mt. Sterling. The present membership is seventy-two. The class-leaders are Leaving Corkwell and Arthur Hatfield. Isaac Clifton, Thomas Wheeler, George Corkwell, Asa Crabb, Jackson Dick, Millard Davis, and John W. Hatfield are the trustees. A Sunday-school was organized about 1860. This has now some one hundred children in attendance. Abner Morton is its superintendent.

PLEASANT GROVE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

In 1849, Rev. James Marshall held meetings at the house of John C. Berry, where a class was formed, composed, in part, of the following persons: John C. Berry, wife, and daughter, Rebecca, John Hines and wife, James Steele and wife, Mrs. Mary Thrasher, Allen Larry, H. M. Thrasher, and Mary Cardiff. During the season of 1852, a meeting-house was erected here, near the school house, at a cost of eight hundred dollars. In the fall of 1871 this was removed to near the "Four Points," where it has materially increased its membership. It was formerly attached to London, but is now a part of Mt. Sterling circuit. Soon after its formation, a Sunday-school was formed. This still continues, with H. J. Ingman as superintendent, who also leads the class. The present trustees are: G. W. Adkins, R. A. Busick, J. M. and Robert Abernethy, and Samuel Winfaugh.

THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, near Pleasant Southward's, was formed by Rev. Caleb Morse, in 1864, and was composed of the following persons: Pleasant Southward and wife, John Southward and wife, James Forest and wife, and Fleming Cardiff. Meetings were held at the houses of Pleasant and John Southward. In 1866 the present church edifice was com-

STANTON ADKINS

was born January 24, 1789, in Wyconico county, Maryland, from whence he emigrated to Ohio in 1816. He first settled in Ross county, where he was married, June 10, 1819, to Anna Timmons. She was born June 3, 1804. Soon after marriage they moved into Darby township, where Mrs. Adkins died, leaving children as follows: Elijah, born August 25, 1820; Garrison, born April 14, 1822; Elizabeth, born October 6, 1823; Rhodney, born August 24, 1825; Sarah, born February 17, 1827; Mary Ann, born November 19, 1828; Stanton, born June 8, 1830; Charlotte, born March 5, 1832; Miranda P., born January 13, 1834; George W., born October 31, 1835; David C., born January 21, 1839.

After the death of his first wife, Mr. Adkins married Rachel Ann Grindle, in 1847. They had: Noah W., born August 6, 1847; Cannon, born January 19, 1849; Harriet, born November 9, 1850; Youdoshe, born December 13, 1852; Roxana, born July 16, 1855; Mahala, born April 17, 1859; Ezra, born April 1, 1861.

Mr. Adkins was the father of twenty-one children, of whom, at this time, eight by his first wife, and four by his second are living. Four of his sons served as soldiers during the war of the Rebellion—David in the Forty-fifth Ohio infantry; he was taken prisoner and confined at Danville and Andersonville, where he was finally exchanged in 1864, and died at Annapolis, Maryland, when on his way home. Noah was also in the Forty-fifth infantry, where he served three years. He enlisted before he was fifteen years of age, and during his term of service contracted disease from which he died March 5, 1869, at the age of twenty-two years. Stanton and Rhodney enlisted in Illinois regiments, and both lived to return to their families, after three years of hard service, in which Rhodney received honorable scars.

When Stanton Adkins came to Ohio he was a poor man, but by dint of hard labor and judicious management he accumulated a considerable property, owning, at his death, over seven hundred acres of land in Darby and Monroe townships. He was a worthy member of the Methodist church in Darby township, as is his wife, who survives him, and several other members of his family. He was always true to his pledged word, no matter what sacrifice might be required. For the last ten years of his life he had very poor health. His death occurred June 5, 1879, at the age of ninety years, four months and ten days.

pleted, and cost thirteen hundred dollars. A Sunday-school was organized contemporaneous with the church, and now holds its sessions regularly during the summer months. P. Clairage is its present superintendent. The present church membership is seventy. Among the names of ministers, the following are mentioned: Revs. —— Powers, Caleb Thomas, R. L. Harvey, —— Shelt, and Riley, John Southward, Benjamin Briley, S. Stone, and Benjamin Sievers. The church is attached to Deer Creek conference.

EARLY EVENTS.

The pioneer post-office of Monroe township was established at the Five Points in the year 1851, with John Long postmaster. The successors to the position are: John Fissel, G. W. Bodwell, E. S. McClintock, William H. Rowlen, and John H. Beeson, the latter being the present incumbent. William Leach, in 1849, became the founder, and sole owner, of the first store in the township. He opened a small stock of general merchandise, in the building now occupied by John H. Beeson for the same purpose. Some few years later, M. Timmons opened another store, at the same point, in the building now occupied by C. Clifton. The classic spot known as the "Five Points," has not been blessed with hotels, mills, manufactories, physicians or lawyers, and the dwellers therein should assuredly be healthful and peaceful, as they doubtless are.

INDUSTRIAL PURSUITS.

In the early settlement, Peter Van Buskirk constructed, upon the small stream now bearing his name, a saw-mill, and one run of stone, for grinding corn, was soon added. All traces of these pioneer enterprises have long since disappeared. John H. Maddux erected a horse-mill, for grinding corn, on the turnpike, near where Jackson Thomas now lives.

John Parker and Kendall Long built a saw-mill, also, on Van Buskirk's run, quite early. This was subsequently purchased by James and Perry Dawson, and rebuit by them. It has, at the present writing, entirely vanished.

ORGANIZATION.

The records of the various townships of Pickaway county have been very imperfectly kept, or at least great negligence shown in their preservation, so that it is now quite impossible to give accurate dates of organization, or names of early officers; consequently, the writer is unable to ascertain the date when Monroe became a separate township. The officers for 1879 are: Alfred Crawford, M. J. Tootle, Henry Dennis, trustees; John H. Beeson, clerk; D. D. Hewitt, treasurer; A. B. Hughes, assessor; J. F. Robinson and William J. Porter, constables; C. Maddux and D. H. Marshall, justices of the peace. Mr. Marshall is also attorney-at-law.

The present board of education is: Samuel W. Dunlap, B. Adkins, James Larrey, Joseph Willoughby, S. P. Merrill, J. M. O'Neal, D. Robison, A. A. Hatfield, Samuel Winfaugh, Jackson Thomas, and W. H. Fulton. We have endeavored to have the orthography of the names correct, and trust they will be found so.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

REV. JOHN VAN BUSKIRK.

Rev. John Van Buskirk was born in Alleghany county, Maryland, November 19, 1795. His father, Peter Van Buskirk, emigrated to Ohio about 1799, bringing his family with him. They remained in Chillicothe one year, at which time he purchased land near Williamsport, and conducted a milling business at that place.

John Van Buskirk, as a boy, had no opportunities for obtaining a school education, but learned to read while at home. He was married, February 8, 1821, to Sophia Seward, who was born in Virginia, July 8, 1799. Soon after marriage he was converted, and though he did not immediately unite with a church, he preached the gospel as he found it in the Bible, throughout the neighborhood, in private houses, and where ever opportunity was offered. His conversion occurred under the preaching of Rev. Matthew Gardner, and he joined the Christian church at Williamsport, August 8, 1823. At his conversion he was strongly opposed by his father, who had no sympathy with the christian religion; but by prayer he was enabled to come off conqueror.

After his marriage he attended school one term, which was the extent of his school education. He was a man of strong common sense, and he applied this to every thing in life, making himself what he was—a self-made man. His desire was to do all the good in the world that he could, and he followed out this desire throughout his life. Though never a salaried pastor, he was ordained a regular minister in the Christian church, and was always zealous in the cause of christianity, laboring earnestly for the conversion of sinners. His church was the broad field of the world, and he preached in private houses and in school-houses, always producing a powerful impression on the minds of his hearers.

Mrs. Van Buskirk was a woman of strong convictions, but never had the benefit of an education. She filled a useful sphere, however, and was beloved by all with whom she came in contact for the fine qualities of her mind and heart. She was a true and consistent christian woman, a kind and loving mother, and a good wife to the husband of her choice. She always cherished the welfare of the church, and was very benevolent, giving to the needy as they required, and assisting in the building of the chapel in Monroe township to the amount of one hundred and seventy dollars. Rev. John Van Buskirk gave three hundred and fifty dollars to the same object. He died September 15, 1874, aged nearly seventy-nine years. Mrs. Van Buskirk died January 10, 1868, aged sixty-nine years, six months, and ten days.

Their children were: Caroline, born June 18, 1822, who married John Wood, July 5, 1840, and now lives in Iowa; Diantha, born October 12, 1824, who was married, August 23, 1846, to Samuel Rowlen, and died in Monroe township, January 20, 1849; Peter, born May 15, 1826, who married Rebecca Wood, December 15, 1847, and died in Monroe, October 15, 1873; Rhoda, born June 2, 1831, who married William Bennett in August, 1845, and died in Monroe, March 22, 1874; Sarah, born August 28, 1833, who married Hiram Russell, February 3, 1857, and now lives in Delaware county, Indiana; Orlando, born June 6, 1829, who was married in August, 1856, to Elizabeth Betts, and died in Clarksburg, Pickaway county, January 11, 1858; Francis Marion, born September 25, 1838, who married Diana T. Hedges, and died, September 27, 1865, in Monroe township; Mary, born March 26, 1836, who was married, September 20, 1868, to Adam G. C. Bailey, and now lives in Mt. Sterling, Madison county; and William H. H., born May 3, 1842, who died November 2, 1865.

PERRY.

In the collection of data for the following history, the writer has labored under many disadvantages, not the least of which was an utter indifference on the part of many to aid in the matter. The writer has gleaned, from apparently reliable sources, and if errors occur, he cannot be responsible for them. Perry township is situated in the southwest corner of Pickaway county, and is bounded as follows: North, by Monroe township; south, by the townships of Concord and Deerfield, Ross county; east, by Deer Creek township; and west, by Marion and Wayne townships, Fayette county.

The surface features are in the main, level, the only exception being in the extreme northern part. Flowing from west to east, along, and in fact, forming, the northern boundary, is Deer creek, the only stream of any considerable dimensions in the township. Immediately adjacent to this the surface is broken, and traversed by numerous ravines. The bottom lands in this locality are quite extensive, and extremely fertile, producing great quantities of grain, especially corn. The soil in other portions of the township is a black loam, better adapted to the growing of corn than any other grains. The other streams are Hay run, and its tributaries, in the southeast part of the township, and Hamilton run, which flows through the village of New Holland, and thence from the township, near the southwest corner.

SETTLEMENT.

It is said that the pioneer settler in Perry township was James Wilson, who came from Kentucky, locating upon the farm now owned by Elias Ater. The date was prior to the dawning of the present century. His family consisted of a wife and nine children. The duration of his stay in the township was brief. He removed westward.

Benjamin Evans, of Maryland, married Mary Lewis, and in the year 1798, emigrated to Ohio. His location was in Deerfield township, Ross county. Here he passed the remaining years of his life, engaged in farming. His death occurred July 5, 1846. Mrs. Evans deceased in March, 1857. There were twelve children in the family, three only of whom are now living—Ephraim, who married Catharine Cochran; John, who has been twice married (his present wife was Amanda Leby), resides in Perry township; Sarah, who married Cornelius Ecord, and now has a home in Kansas.

John Hoskins was a native of Virginia. His wife was Elizabeth Davis. He located in Ross county before the beginning of the present century. A few years later he settled in Perry township, on the farm now owned by a grandson (Samuel Hoskins), and here he died; not, however, until he had brought the farm to a profitable state of cultivation. The children were: William, who married Mary Knight, and lives at present in Illinois; Thomas, who married Eliza Wilson, died in Perry (Samuel, a son, married Martha Tarbille, and also lives in Perry); Job R., John, Seth, Adam, Nancy, Susan, and Mary A., are deceased; Joseph, who married Sarah McKnight, lives in Missouri; and Caroline, who married John Welsh, and lives in Illinois.

Holmes Tarbille was among the first settlers in this portion of the township. He died many years since. One son only lives, at this time, in the township. James, who married Frances Tanquarry, and lives on Hay run.

Peter Mouser was one of the first settlers in the north part of the township. He came from Rumley, Virginia, as early as 1800, and lived in Ross county, on Deer creek until 1804, when he settled in Perry township. Here he acquired an extensive estate, owning, at his death in 1872, over two thousand acres of land. The children were: John, who married Margaret Porter, (deceased), a son of whom lives in Perry; Elizabeth (deceased); Jacob (deceased); William, who married Nancy Mace; he is the only one now living in the township; Catharine, who married Peter Carder, and now lives in Fayette county, Ohio; and Mary and Eliza, who are deceased.

John Timmons came from Virginia at the same date of Mr. Mouser, and settled near him. He had a number of children, none of whom are now living here. Levi Hays, who became prominent in the public affairs of Pickaway county, and who has many descendants now living in both Perry and Monroe townships, was a native of Montgomery county, Maryland. He there married Eleanor Harris in 1806. He removed with his family, then consisting of a wife and nine children, to Ohio; for perhaps one year he remained in Hocking county, and then located permanently in Monroe township, this county, where he passed the remaining years of his life. The children were: Joseph, who became a minister of the Methodist Episcopal church, and who married Mariam Walker; Charles, who married Margaret Harris; Norris, who married Sarah Hurst; Samuel, who married Jemima Rittenhouse; Jesse, who married Elizabeth Hurst; Nancy, who married Samuel Reeves; Mary, who married Thomas Edmondson; Rachel, who married Isaac Davis; and Eleanor, who married George Wilcox, not one of whom are now living. Levi Hays died possessed of nearly thirteen hundred acres of land, which is now occupied by descendants.

Josiah Reeves, who lived on the James river, in Culpepper county, Virginia, where he married Elizabeth Davis, came to Ohio in 1806, locating just over in Ross county. Here they died. The children of this couple are: Pensey, who married John Blue; Anna, who was twice married; Samuel, who married Ann W. Hays (a son, Owen T., still lives in Perry); Thomas, who was twice married; Jane, Owen T., Mary, Josias, Jared, and James M., all deceased.

Owen T. Reeves, the grandson above referred to, has been twice married, his present wife is Tacy Amanda Hall.

Zadoc Lewis came from Worcester county, Maryland, to Ohio in the spring of 1806. He lived some seven years near Clarksburg, in Ross county, and then removed to Perry township, locating upon the farm now owned by Milton Lewis. Here he died, February 28, 1835. Mrs. Lewis died August 3, 1846. The children were: Solomon, who married Nancy Gray; Peter, who married Hettie Evans; Milley, who married John Cole; Zadoc, who married Mary Webb, are deceased; Walter, who married Mary Lewis, lives at Atlanta; Noah, who married Mary Hopkins, now lives at New Holland, and with him an aged sister, Margaret (Aunt Peggy).

John Thomas and wife (Melinda Smith) were born near Harper's Ferry, Virginia; the former in 1781, and the latter in 1782. In the fall of 1807, Mr. Thomas located near Chillicothe, Ross county, where he resided until 1810, when he removed to Pickaway county, and, in connection with a brother, Jeremiah, purchased a tract of land near where is now situated the Clark's run schoolhouse, now occupied by Mrs. Sarah Timmons. The family resided here until the fall of 1852. The wife having died previously [May 19, 1850], Mr. Thomas came to live with a son, Samuel P., in Perry township, where he died, May 5, 1855. The children born of this couple numbered twelve: Mary Ann, Jeremiah, Ann, Joseph, William, Eliza, Julia Ann, Samuel P., Melinda, Maria, Harriet S., and Harrison. Only one now lives in Perry township: Samuel P., who married Sarah E. Hays. She died April 10, 1839, leaving two children: Miriam H. (Mrs. Joseph Hays), and Sarah E. (deceased). Mr. Thomas' present wife was Elizabeth Dick, by whom seven children were born: Charles H., James A., Zilpha A., William M., Samuel M. (deceased), Elizabeth A., and Vienna J. Samuel P. Thomas was a Whig, and is now a staunch Republican, possessed of those sterling qualities which are considered essential to promotion to places of trust or emolument. Since 1855 he has been, almost continuously, a justice of the peace.

Jesse Britton, whose place of nativity was Reading, Pennsylvania, came to Ohio from Richmond, Virginia, in 1807, locating in Perry township. His first wife was Anna Gibson, by whom five children were born: Joseph, Letitia, Jesse, Abigail, and Elizabeth (Mrs. Dunlap). Mr. Britton's second wife was Susan Nolin. The following named children were born of this marriage: Louisa, Nancy, Hiram, Margaret, Susan, Cynthia, Harrison, Amanda, and Clarence. Jesse Britton died about the year 1838, and his wife some two years later. The children are nearly all deceased.

William Porter married Margaret McClintock, in Ireland, and emigrated to America near the beginning of the present century. He first located in Pennsylvania, where several children were born. In 1810, he removed to Ohio, locating in Perry township, where his wife died in August, 1846, and he some years later. Of the children, Noble was the only one who passed his days here. This son married Elizabeth Hale, by whom eleven children were born. Of these, Margaret J., Mary A., Permena C., John M., Joseph H., David R., and Charles W., are now living. Noble, another son, died for the flag, in the Union army, in the late rebellion. David R. and Charles W. were also in the army. Noble Porter, sr., was a prominent man in his township. He died, May 29, 1876, and his aged widow survives him.

William Sawyer, of Irish birth, married Elizabeth Smith, who lived near Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. In the year 1810 he settled in Fayette county, where he died, September 23, 1852. Mrs. Sawyer is still living in Perry township, at the advanced age of ninety-five years. The children numbered eleven, but one of whom lives in Pickaway county: Sarah, who married David T. English, and now resides near Hay run.

John English was twice married, the second time to Nancy Donaldson, of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. He came to Ohio before the war of 1812, and purchased six hundred acres of land in the southern portion of Perry township, upon which he settled. His was a numerous family, only two of whom now live in the township: David T., who married Sarah Sawyer, and Mary (Mrs. J. R. Hoskins).

John Bennett, of Delaware, in 1812, settled in Perry township, his first purchase being a piece of land now owned by Jesse Withcott. To this he added, until, at the time of his death, he was the owner of five hundred acres. Mr. Bennett died in 1860, and his wife, August 17, 1877. The children are: Nancy (deceased), Mary (Mrs. Timmons), Samuel (deceased), Caleb, who lives in Madison county, Ohio, Jane (Mrs. Rosaboam), John W., who married Joanna Carney, and lives in Perry township, and William, whose present wife was Mary Maddux, and who lives in Madison county. This family now owns a large amount of land, and are extensive farmers.

Hezekiah Brown, from near Winchester, Virginia, came to Ohio, a single man, in 1812. He remained one year in Perry township, and then returned to Virginia. Some five years later he settled permanently in Fayette county, Ohio, where he married Mary Williams, who is still living. Mr. Brown died January 28, 1875. There were eleven children in the family, six of whom are now living, and one, William, who married Juliet Ann Timmons, lives in Perry township.

Mrs. Margaret Wahn came to Pickaway county in 1830. Mrs. William Brown is her only living child.

Jonathan Taylor, of Washington county, Pennsylvania, came to Ohio, in 1814, where he remained, perhaps, one year, and then returned to Pennsylvania, where he resided until 1841, in the fall of which year he located in Monroe township, where he yet resides. Mrs. Taylor died, December 31, 1869. Of the children, one lives in Perry township, Francis Marion, who married Ellen King. The remainder are: Phillip, Sarah, Caleb, Jonathan (who married Mary A. Bennett, and lives in Monroe township), and Ann, who married Abraham Longerbone; both live in Monroe township.

John Hale married Mary Hays, and lived near Harper's Ferry, Virginia, where the following children were born: Shepard, Margaret, Sarah, John, Elizabeth (Mrs. Noble Porter), Mary, Thomas, and Nancy. At, or near, the close of the war of 1812, the family settled in Deer Creek township, Ross county, where the parents died, the mother May 15, 1833, and the father some few years later.

James Dunlap, grandfather of Robert B., Jesse, and Mrs. Dr. Wilson, who now reside near New Holland village, was of Irish birth, and came to America prior to the war of the Revolution. He settled at Richmond, Virginia, where he married Rebecca Blackburn, and where were born a numerous family. Early in the present century the family removed to Ohio, locating near Chillicothe, then a mere hamlet of, perhaps, half a dozen cabins. John Dunlap, son of the above, married Elizabeth Britton, and, in 1818, located in Perry township. Here Mrs. Dunlap died, April 13, 1854, and her husband, May 21, 1857. Their children were: Abigail, who married James Brown, is now widowed, and lives principally in Perry township; Robert B. has been twice married—his present wife was Mary McCrea; Elizabeth, who married William Mahoffiin, deceased; James, who married Mary Wilson, was killed in a well; Letitia, married Dr. James F. Wilson; Harriet, who married Noble Hubbell, deceased; Lorana, who married Alexander McCoy, and lives in Ross county; Joseph, who married Anna Turner, deceased; Jesse, who married Harriet J. McComb, and John, who married Hattie Brown, now resides in Woodhull, Illinois.

Isaac Gray, Josiah Lewis, and Barzilla Costin Atkin, all of Worcester county, Maryland, came to Ohio, locating in Perry township, in May, 1818. Mr. Gray settled on land now occupied by Joseph Kirkpatrick, and died on the farm now owned by his son Jesse, in about 1859. Mrs. Gray died in 1864. The children were: Benjamin (now deceased); Jesse, who married Nancy Beekman, and lives in Perry; they have ten children living—one died in the army; Nancy, Unettie, and Percy, who are deceased; Elizabeth, who married George W. Gooley, and now lives in New Holland.

Joseph Collins, a native of Delaware, settled in Ross county, in about 1790, where he died in about 1816. His wife was Clara Timmons. John M., son of the above-named, married Eunice Timmons, and located in Perry township, in March, 1819, upon the farm now occupied by his son, Joshua H. Joshua located in Monroe township, as did Elizabeth, who married Joseph Timmons. Isaac settled in Monroe. Andrew, who married Elizabeth Timmons, lives at Atlanta; and Hester, who married Salathel Timmons, lives in Perry township.

Isaac Brown, of Virginia, came to Perry early in its settlement, and with him came a widowed mother and brothers and sisters. He married Lavina Michaels, by whom two children were borne—Eleanor, (Mrs. J. H. Collins), and Thomas, now deceased.

Philip Michael was another early settler.

Jacob Gooley, who was originally from London county, Virginia, settled in Perry township in 1827. His wife was Margaret Shively. Two of the children now reside in the township—Catharine (Mrs. Daniel Lewis), and George W., who lives in New Holland village.

Moses Konns came from Virginia to Ohio in 1836, and tarried, for perhaps one year, in Ross county, and then removed to Perry township and purchased the property he now occupies. His first wife was Lucretia Timmons, who died November 18, 1856, and his present wife, whom he married December 3, 1870, was Comfort Wapels. His children are: Millie A., Mary E., Virginia (deceased), Sarah, Stephen, Lafayette, Wesley, and Moses.

Elias Ater, who is a descendant of William Ater, of Deer Creek township, married Permelia Davis, by whom were borne the following children: Mary, who married Harrison Plummer; Gideon, who married Miss Hoskins; Catharine, who married Samuel Gaver; Allen, and Stephen D.

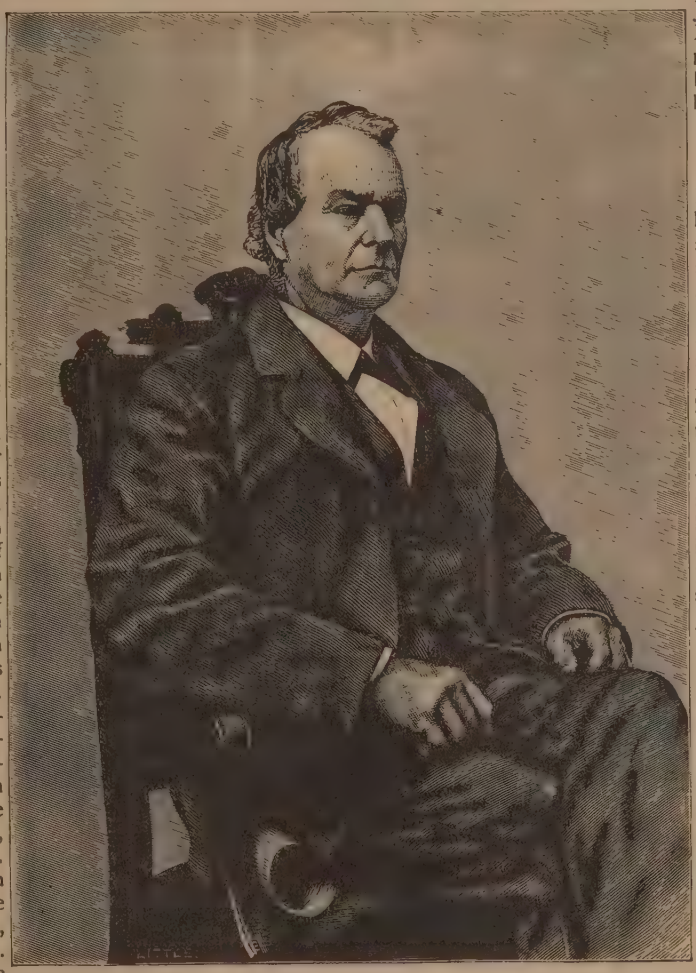
Many names of early settlers are recalled: Reuben Lloyd, Jacob and Samuel Hasselton, Joseph McClintock, Isaac Vincent, James Cochran, William Penniwell, Reuben Simpson, Frederick Funk, John Struvey, James and Abram Kirkpatrick, George Tollman, and Abraham Tanquarry.

EARLY EVENTS.

The writer collected a number of items for this section, but as he is unable to satisfy himself in relation to their reliability, they are, for the most part, omitted. The first house in New Holland village was built by a man named Fleming, and stood near the site of the present flouring mill of Messrs. Hanley & Bro.. George W. Gooley says the first brick block in the village was built by George Bohrer, and stood where is now the McCafferty block. The date of its erection was not far from 1840. Andrew Motter constructed a log house on the site of the present Union house, at an early date. Mot-

THE THOMAS FAMILY.

John Thomas was born near Harper's Ferry, Virginia, in 1781. In 1799 he was married to Melinda Smith, of the same place. They emigrated to Ohio in the fall of 1807, and settled in Ross county, about four miles from Chillicothe, on land at that time owned by Nathaniel Willis. Here they remained until March, 1810, when they removed to Monroe township, Pickaway county. He bought one hundred and sixty acres of land on Clark's Run, and built a log cabin before bringing his family. This log cabin was their home until 1818, when he built a hewed log cabin, which, in 1834, he weather-boarded. Here they lived and died; he on May 5, 1855, and his wife in March, 1850. Their children were, Mary Ann, born August 4, 1800. She married John Hornbeck. He died, and she married Rev. Mr. Adkinson, who also died. She died in August, 1866. Jeremiah was born December 16, 1801. He married Nancy Leach, and died in Madison county, in the winter of 1862. Ann was born October 24, 1803. She died when about three years of age. Joseph was born June 17, 1805. He married Elizabeth Kemp, and died in 1871. William was born April 7, 1807. He married Eliza Goddard, and lives in Tippecanoe county, Indiana. Eliza was born March 1, 1809. She married Robert Leach, and died in 1877. Julia Ann was born April 5, 1812. She married Joseph Young, and died in Illinois. Samuel P. was born February 14, 1814 He married Sarah Hays January 19, 1836. She died April 10, 1839, and he married Elizabeth Dick November 11, 1844. He lives in Perry township. Melinda was born March 25, 1816. She married Oliver Bostwick, and lives in Madison county. Maria was born May, 28, 1819. She married Jesse Reeves, and died in Illinois. Harriet was born February 9, 1823. She married John Harrison, and lives in Clinton county, Ohio. Harrison was born March 25, 1826, and married Ann Reeves. She died in Moultrie county, Illinois, and he moved to Lafayette county, Indiana, and married Mrs. Henderson. Samuel P. Thomas was first married to Sarah Hays in 1836. By her he had two children, Miriam H., born November 13, 1836. She married Joseph Hays, in June, 1857, and now lives in the south part of Monroe township. Sarah E. was born November 23, 1838. She married Alexander Gillinwaters, and died in Fayette county, in August, 1870. Mrs. Thomas died April 10, 1839, and Mr. Thomas married Elizabeth Dick on November 11, 1841. She is the mother of seven children. Charles Harrison, born January 7, 1843, married Josie Derbyshire, October 1, 1873. He lives in Perry township, near Conover's mills. He served in the army three years. James Austin, born March 8, 1845, is a merchant in New Holland. William M., born November 11, 1851, married Carrie Bundy in October, 1874, and lives in New Holland. Samuel Millard, born September 29, 1854, died April 21, 1877. Elizabeth A., born December 22, 1856, married William A. Welsh, December 25, 1878, who lives in New Holland, where he pratices law. Vienna J., born June 17, 1859, remains at home with her father and mother. Mrs. Thomas, his present wife, is an invalid, having been prostrated with a stroke of paralysis in January, 1879, since which time she has been confined to the house. Squire Thomas lived in Monroe township, where he was born, until after the death of his first wife, when he bought property in Darby township, and lived there until 1850. He then sold and bought property in Perry township, where he has since lived. He was elected justice of the peace in 1855, and served with perfect satisfaction until 1870, when he was obliged to decline a nomination on account of the sickness of his son. In 1875 he was again elected to the same office, which he still retains. He ran on the Republican ticket for probate judge in the fall of 1878, without hope of election, in a strong Democratic county. His name was presented at the Republican county convention of 1877, as a candidate for State representation, but he refused to allow his name to be used. He is a prominent man in his township, and of careful business habits. That he has held the office of justice for nearly twenty years is proof that the people have confidence in him, and are satisfied with his administration of the office.



S. P. Thomas

ter was a tailor, and after a few years sold the property, when it was converted into a hotel. The first postmaster was, undoubtedly, N. R. Ferguson; the present is Milton Bartholomew. At the railroad station, called Atlanta, a post-office is kept by O. Donnohoe. This is of recent date. Charles Green was, doubtless, the pioneer merchant in New Holland, and his place of business was on the corner now occupied by Evans Shipley. Green sold groceries and whiskey, and entertained travelers. The building was subsequently burned. George Bohrer also opened a store here on an opposite corner.

ORGANIZATION.

The territory as at present embraced within the boundary lines of Perry township, was originally a part of the township of Deer Creek. It was detached, and created a separate township, between the years 1818 and 1828, but the writer has been unable to ascertain the date, either in the records of the township, or of the county.

The officers for 1879, are: Elias Ater, Andrew Harrison, and Daniel Lewis, trustees (the last of whom has been an incumbent of the office, without intermission, for twenty years); W. A. Welsh, clerk; Daniel R. Porter, treasurer; J. G. A. Donnohoe, assessor; Samuel McGath, and H. M. Williams, constables: S. P. Thomas, and Benjamin Tanquary, justices of the peace. There are seven supervisors of roads and highways, and six school districts, aside from the village district. Following is the township board of education: David Gray, William J. Grimes, Jefferson Brooks, J. W. Kirkpatrick, Ezra Shaeffer, and Allen Mouser. The notaries public are; Thomas C. Bennett, J. W. Mark, and W. A. Welsh, who is also an attorney at law.

CHURCHES.

This department is mainly written from personal interviews with early settlers. Possibly, in some cases, memory was treacherous as relates to dates, but the writer believes the sketches are, as a whole, correct.

CEDAR GROVE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

Early in the settlement of this portion of the township a class was formed here composed of the following persons: John Bennett and wife, Isaac Jones and wife, John and Peter Cook and their wives, William Bailey and wife, William Loveland and wife, George Graham and wife, and Jonathan Motter and wife. Meetings were held at the dwellings of John Cook and other early settlers, until about 1814, when a small log meeting house was built. This stood on, or near, the site now occupied by the framed church edifice of the society, which was dedicated January 8, 1849. We were unable to ascertain its cost, or definite data regarding it. The membership at present is seventy-nine. The attendance at Sunday-school is an average of sixty children. Riley Collins is superintendent. Of the church management, Edward Harriman is class-leader, and William Grimes, J. H. Noble, J. W. Bennett, G. W. May, D. L. Dunden, and Jesse Withcott, trustees. For list of ministers, see New Holland Methodist Episcopal church.

THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH OF NEW HOLLAND was organized, as we are informed, by George W. Gooley, as early as the year 1825. No early records can be found. Samuel Hosselton and wife (Mary), Jacob Hosselton and wife, George Bohrer, wife and daughter Lorana, Andrew Motter and wife, Mrs. Lindsay and daughter Nancy, and others, to the number of perhaps twelve, composed the first class, of which Samuel Hosselton was leader. Services, prior to 1825, were held by Rev. F. A. Wilson, at the houses of George Bohrer and others, and next in the little log building, then standing where is now the school-building in the village. In about 1827, a small framed church was constructed upon the site of the present Methodist church edifice. This did duty until 1867, when the present building was erected. Its cost was twenty-five hundred dollars. The trustees at that time were: Smith Chaffin, Jacob Hosselton, Samuel Hosselton, J. Lewis, and George W. Gooley. The present ones are: D. A. Whiteside, R. B. Dunlap, B. F. Timmons, H. T. Gooley, Smith Chaffin, Frank M. Grimes, and T. M. Withcott. The parsonage trustees are: David Tarbille, J. W. Kirkpatrick, W. J., F. M., and J. W. Grimes. The present membership is one hundred and twenty-four. The leaders of this class are J. Wesley Grimes and T. M. Withcott. J. W. Evans, John W., and J. Wesley Grimes, stewards; T. M. Withcott, superintendent of Sunday-school, at which there is an attendance of one hundred scholars.

The ministers who have presided over the numerous churches of New Holland circuit, since the year 1808, are given in connection with Williamsport church, in Deer Creek township. In the year 1866, a division was made, since when the following divines have presided: 1868, Rev. J. Y. Rusk; 1870, W. W. Martin; 1872, N. L. Jones; 1873, A. C. Kelley; 1877, George W. Burns, and 1878, J. D. Wakefield, the present efficient pastor, whose gentlemanly courtesy the writer wishes to acknowledge.

HAY RUN CHURCH

was formed in 1835 (so says Samuel Hoskins). Among its first members were: John Hoskins and wife, John Devoss and wife, Abram Tarbille and wife, James Tarbille and wife, Mattie and Mary Tarbille, Thomas Hoskins and wife, Job R. Hoskins and wife, Josiah Hoskins and wife, John English and wife, John Snider and wife, and Zadoc Lewis and wife. The house of John English was occupied for religious worship until the building of the old meeting-house, which occurred a few years later. This rude log structure served the uses of the congregation until 1852, when the present meeting-house was erected. It occupies the site of the first one, and cost nearly seven hundred dollars. It was dedicated October 9, 1852. The trustees were: Alexander Reed, George Hosselton, James and David Tarbille, Alfred Houser, John Shipley, Thomas, Job R., and Samuel Hoskins. The present trustees are: Samuel Hoskins, James and David Tarbille, John F. Barrett; O. Donnehoe, leader; S. Hoskins and O. Donnehoe, stewards. A Sunday-school was formed soon after the organization of the church, and has now an attendance of some fifty scholars. Charles Hughes is its present superintendent. The church membership now numbers forty-five. [See sketch of New Holland Methodist Episcopal church for pastors' names].

LOCUST GROVE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

This class was organized, in 1841, at the house of Noble Porter, and was composed, in part, of the following persons: Ephraim Evans and wife, Mary Leby, Thomas Vincent and wife, Peter Ecord and wife, Noble Porter and wife, John Evans and wife, Jacob Gooley and wife, and Mrs. Margaret Porter. Noble Porter was appointed leader of this class, and the subsequent growth of this charge was due, mainly, to his efforts. The ground upon which stands the church edifice of the society, erected in 1842, was donated by him. This charge has been attached to New Holland circuit from its formation. There are at present seventy-three members in regular connection, and ninety on probation. The Sabbath-school is under the superintendency of David R. Porter, and has an enrollment of one hundred and ten scholars. The present church officers are: John W. Kirkpatrick, leader; J. M. Porter, Daniel Lewis, J. W. and A. W. Kirkpatrick, William Darby, and F. M. Vincent, trustees.

DUBLIN HILL METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

In the year 1858, a class of Protestant Methodists was formed at this point, and regular preaching conducted for a few years. Eventually, however, meetings ceased, and the church went out of existence. In November, 1874, Rev. John L. Reeder, of the Methodist Episcopal denomination, began a series of meetings at the school-house, the result of which was the formation of a class, composed of the following persons: Owen T. Reeves and wife, Peter Lewis and wife, George and Bruce Hays, William and Isaac Hamilton, Mary, Alma, and Roxanna Bostwick, and others. Owen T. Reeves was chosen leader, and Peter Lewis, assistant. A Sunday-school was formed at that time, of which Peter Lewis was elected superintendent, and who still continues as such. There are, at present, fifty children in attendance. During the season of 1878, the present church edifice was constructed. It is a neat brick building, in size thirty-six by forty-eight feet, and cost complete sixteen hundred and eighty dollars. It was dedicated by Rev. I. F. King, of Columbus, January 15, 1879. The present membership of this church is twenty-six. The trustees are: Owen T. Reeves, Peter Lewis, Harrison Plummer, Wesley and Wesley W. Hays, William Bostwick, and Ezra Shafer. Stewards: Wesley Hays, and Harrison Plummer.

THE DISCIPLE CHURCH OF NEW HOLLAND.

The first preaching at this place by ministers of this denomination, was in the fall of 1854, by evangelists, who labored under the supervision of the missionary society of the southwestern district. The first public profession of faith was made in March following, but it was not until the spring of 1857, that a church was formally organized. This consisted of the following persons: G. C. Gamble, John Highland, A. G. Wood, Roxalene Johnson (Mrs. R. Cook), Sarah A. Johnson (Mrs. S. A. Bates), W. Elizabeth Johnson, S. D. Johnson, Abigail Wood, Matilda Highland, John Leasure, Sally Leasure, James Leasure, Bettie Wood, Sarah Johnson, Henry Bryant, Maria Bryant, Melinda Matthews, Margaret Matthews, Eliza Matthews, Jane Matthews, Samuel Matthews, and Mary A. Hess. The church organization was completed by appointing S. Matthews, elder; John Highland, A. G. Wood, and Silas D. Johnson, deacons. Services were held at the house at T. Hess, for a time. The present church edifice of this society was built in 1853. The ministers who have resided here permanently, are: Revs. Messrs Samuel Matthews, J. C. Irvin, and George Van Pelt, who is the present pastor. The membership of the church numbers one hundred and eighty. The church officers are: J. A. Highland, Henry Bryant, and George H. Matson, elders; S. D. Johnson, B. Holcomb, J. C. Vlerebome, and E. Parker, deacons; J. T. Johnson, clerk; J. H. Highland and G. H. Matson, are superintendents of Sabbath-school, on which the attendance is seventy-five.

THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF NEW HOLLAND

was formed May 12, 1863. The following were the constituent members: Mrs. Dr. Wilson, Alexander McCoy, wife, and three daughters, Mrs. Thomas Cook, James Wallace and wife, Isaac Beecher, Samuel Collins and wife, S. S. Miller and wife, George Vlerebome, Nathaniel Timmons, Thomas Bennett, Mrs. Burnham, and Maria McCrea. A subscription was immediately circulated by the pastor in charge, Rev. Samuel Cruthers, with a view to raising funds with which to provide a church edifice. The old Methodist Episcopal meeting-house was purchased, removed to its present site, which was donated by John Boggs, and refitted. It was completed in 1867, The officers were: Alexander McCoy, elder; N. Timmons, George Vlerebome, and James Wallace, trustees. The ministers of this church were: Rev. Samuel Cruthers, S. S. Miller, and H. W. Guthrie, who remained some four years. When he left the charge there was a membership of thirty. Since then only occasional preaching has been had.

SCHOOLS.

In this department the writer has been unable to ascertain where or by whom the first school in the township was taught. A term of school was taught at or near Locust Grove church, as early as 1818, by Andrew Bascom. It commenced in a little log building standing on land now owned by Joseph Porter. Among the scholars at this school were Noble, Joseph, and Clinton Porter, and several sisters; Walter and Noah Lewis, and many others. It was quite numerously attended. William Clark taught a second term in the same building soon after. George W. Gooley remembers a school that was taught in New Holland village by Rev. F. A. Wilson as early as 1828. Among the families represented were Kirkpatricks, Bohrers, Greens, and Lindseys.

New Holland village school district was organized contemporaneous with the incorporation of the villiage itself. No early records can now be found, and the following is furnished by George W. Gooley from memory: The first school subsequent to 1835 was held in a building occupying the site of the present Methodist Episcopal church. In about 1848 a school-building was constructed on the Ferguson property, south of the town. The present building was erected during the seasons of 1854 and 1855, at a cost of fifteen hundred dollars. The school comprises two departments, primary and grammar. The board of education for 1879 are: N. R. Timmons, B. F. Timmons, John W. Grimes, George A. Haney, George H. Matson, and Dr. John B. May, who is clerk.

NEW HOLLAND.

The plat of this village, which is recorded in book B. of Picaway county records, was acknowledged before Alexander Rowen, justice of the peace, on September 2, 1818. The following is the description:

"Flemingsburgh, situated in Deer Creek township, on the east bank of Hamilton's run, a branch of the north fork of Paint creek, on land of Reese Young, the northerly part of Godhill Levely's survey of two hundred acres, No. 4138; on land of Levin Ross, easterly part of a survey of Codwallader Wallace, No. ——; and on land of Wilkins Ogburn, surveyed for him on a military warrant, No. 3057; on the right hand fork of the north fork of Paint creek."

What induced the changing of the name to the one the village now bears, or the date when it took place, is not now known.

The act of incorporation was passed March 9, 1835, and section one reads:

* * * "That so much of the township of Perry, in the county of Pickaway, as is included within the bounds of the town plat of the town of New Holland, in the said county of Pickaway, as the said town plat now stands on record in the office of the recorder of said county, and eighty rods east, west, north and south of said town plat, and such plats of additions to said town as may hereafter be recorded, be, and the same are hereby created into, and constituted a town corporate, by the name of the town of New Holland."

The village records show that early in the year 1836, the following were the village officials: Rev. F. A. Wilson, mayor; D. Blue, Jacob Hosselton, Reuben Lloyd, Alexander Cochran, trustees. The officers for 1879 are: E. W. Timmons, mayor; J. B. Parker, recorder; J. W. Mark, treasurer; Eden Parker, T. M. Withcott, George Meyer, J. D. McCoy, Lewis Benz, and Theodore Mark, council. This village has no public buildings, or fire department, and no natural advantages. It is a shipping point for large quantities of grain.

The business interests here are as follows: dry goods, Charles McCafferty, C. B. Eggleston, and Jones & O'Conner; drugs and notions, J. W. Marks, N. H. Jones; groceries and hardware, H. T. Gooley & Bro., Vlerebome & Co.; clothing, boots and shoes, James A. Thomas; furniture and undertaking, Holcomb & Kennedy; millinery, E. A. Burnham; harness, J. Atkins; wagon manufacture, George E. Meyers; hotel, J. Al. Miller.

SOCIETIES.

Numerous societies in the interest of temperance have, from time to time, had an existence in New Holland village, and their need is, to a stranger, painfully apparent now. A lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows was instituted here some years since, and flourished for a time. This, too, has ceased its work.

NEW HOLLAND LODGE, NO. 392, F. AND A. M.,

was formed in 1867, its charter having been issued in June, of that year. Following are the constituent members: M. V. Rawlins, J. H. Yeoman, Abram Vlerebome, B. Timmons, W. J. Cochran, A. S. Holloway, J. D. Orahood, J. G. W. Donohoe, G. W. Gooley, Dr. J. F. Wilson, J. H. Folks, Samuel Hughs, and E. H. Dixon. The first officers were: M. V. Rawlins, W. M.; J. H. Yeoman, S. W.; A. Vlerebome, J. W.; B. Timmons, treasurer; W. J. Cochran, secretary; A. S. Holloway, S. D.; J. D. Orahood, J. D.; J. G. W. Donohoe, tyler. The regular communications of this body are on the Thursday evening of each month previous to the full moon. The present membership [July, 1879] is sixty-seven. Financially, the lodge is in a highly prosperous condition. The officers for 1879 are: Dr. John W. May, W. M.; J. C. Brown, S. W.; Marion Strope, J. W.; J. C. McCrea, secretary; T. J. Cook, treasurer; S. McGath, S. D.; G. H. Hughs, J. D.; J. D. Sampson, tyler.

PHYSICIANS.

James F. Wilson, was the first physician who located permanently in Perry township. He was born in Buckskin township, Ross county, Ohio, October 5, 1808; read medicine with Dr. Robbins, of Greenfield, and was granted a diploma by the county society. In 1832, he located in New Holland village, and, five years later, married Miss Letitia Dunlap. In 1841, he attended lectures, and graduated at the Ohio medical college, of Cincinnati. Returning to New Holland, he soon acquired an extensive practice, which was continned until his death, January 21, 1875. Dr. Wilson was a prominent member of the Masonic order, having attained the higher degrees. His funeral obsequies were conducted under the auspices of the fraternity. His widow is still living near New Holland village. But one child blessed their union, John Milton, late United States consul to Germany, who is now traveling in Europe, and, on his return home, goes to Panama, as consul.

The second physician was Aaron Harriman, who had previously practiced at Williamsport. The date of his coming was not far from 1840, and his death occurred in 1850.

Henry Timmons read medicine with Dr. Wilson, graduated at the Sixth street medical college, Cincinnati, and located in New Holland, where he married Miss Sarah Ferguson, and continued the practice of his profession until his death, August 22, 1855. His widow contracted a second marriage, and now resides in Kansas. Of the children, who numbered seven, but two, Edward W. and Nathaniel R., now remain in the township.

Henry Judy, graduated at the Cincinnati Eclectic medical college, March 6, 1850, locating in New Holland the following July, where he still continues in practice. His wife was Susan Carder.

Newton Reeves located in New Holland in the fall of 1850. He married Sarah Daugherty, and, after her death, married Mary Houser. He continued to practice here for some years. Dr. Reeves was a graduate of the Ohio medical college. He is now deceased.

Benjamin R. Davis, graduated at the Cincinnatti Eclectic college in 1859, and located in New Holland, July 9th, of the following year, and is still practicing here. In September, 1860, he married Miss Margaret Elder.

John B. May graduated at the Cincinnati college of medicine and surgery, in 1872. He married Mary M. Holter, and in March, 1874, located in New Holland, where he yet resides.

John W. May, was born in Rockingham county, North Carolina, and read law with Dr. James H. May, graduating in Jefferson medical college, Pennsylvania. Elizabeth Wilson, his first wife, died in March, 1867, and the following summer he removed to Bourneville, Ohio. March 13, 1876, he located in New Holland. His present wife was Mary F. Jaggers. Dr. May is prominent in Masonry.

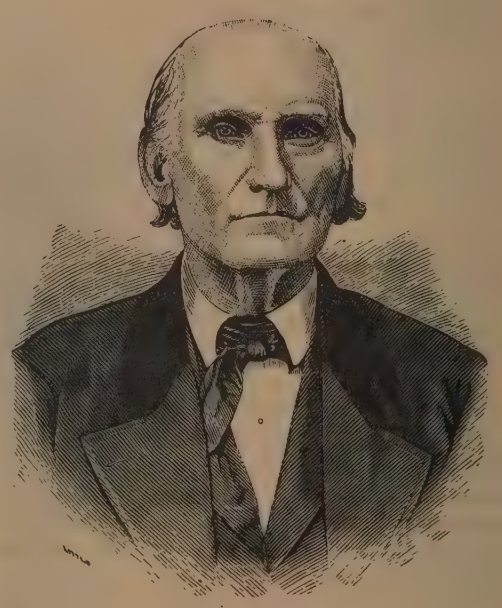
INDUSTRIAL PURSUITS.

In the infancy of the settlement along Deer creek, as early as 1805 (it is thought by William Mouser), a rude grist-mill was constructed by Isaiah Pancost. This was located in the northwest corner of Perry township. It was a small affair, yet sufficient for the needs of the then sparsely settled region. In after years it was rebuilt, and still later, converted into a woolen factory by a son of the original builder, Samuel Pancost. This property is now owned by A. S. Mowry. As early as 1812 a man named Baker built a second grist-mill on Deer creek, and also a saw-mill near it. These mills have been several times rebuilt, and are now owned by H. Crownover. John D. Penniwell had a carding mill on Hamilton run quite early in the settlement of New Holland. The steam grist-mill in New Holland village was built by N. R. Ferguson, in 1853, at a cost of fourteen thousand five hundred dollars. It has three run of stones, which are propelled by a double engine of seventy-five horse power. The present firm — Messrs. George A. Haney & Bro. — came in possession of the property in the spring of 1874, having purchased the same for seven thousand dollars. These gentlemen have since constructed an elevator, and made other needed improvements. The whole amount invested at this time is ten thousand dollars. The mill does both custom and merchant grinding. In relation to the grain interest, during nine months of 1878 this firm shelled and shipped seventy-two thousand bushels of corn. The present season, to August 1st, the shipments of wheat alone aggregate thirty-two thousand bushels. Vlerebome & Co. constructed the first grain elevator at New Holland, in 1876. Previous to this, however, the firm were quite extensive operators in grain, the senior partner having engaged in the grain trade at this point in the year 1863. During the year 1878 this firm shipped an aggregate of three hundred thousand bushels of grain. The shipments during the present season, to August 1st, are one hundred and thirty-five thousand bushels. Mr. Vlerebome is also the owner of a coal mine in Muskingum county, and is an extensive dealer in that useful article.

The second elevator at New Holland was that of the Haney brothers, already mentioned. The next, and by far the largest elevator here, was built by Charles McCafferty, in the spring of 1878. Its cost, with real estate, was four thousand dollars, and its shelling and loading capacity is four hundred bushels per hour. The shipments for the year 1878 were one hundred and twenty-five thousand bushels; and to August 1, 1879, seventy-five thousand bushels. To show the importance of New Holland as a shipping point, we give the totals: 1878, four hundred and ninety-seven thousand bushels; to August 1, 1879, two hundred and forty-two thousand bushels.

New Holland village did not arrive to the dignity of having a newspaper until 1877, in August of which year, A. M. Vaughn issued the first number of the New Holland Review. This was an eight-page five-column sheet, published on the patent plan, and was independent in politics. The paper ceased publication in May, 1879, and the editor has removed to "other fields and pastures rare," we trust.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.



Jesse Hays

THE HAYS FAMILY.

Levi Hays was born in Maryland, October 1, 1752. In December, 1778, he was married to Eleanor Harris. In 1805 they emigrated to Ohio, and settled on Rush creek, in Fairfield county, where they remained one year. In 1806, they removed to Perry township, Mr. Hays making a purchase of thirteen hundred acres of land of the Fitzgerald survey, in Perry and Monroe townships. They had five sons and four daughters: Joseph, Charles, Norris, Samuel, Jesse, Nancy, Mary, Rachel, and Ellen. The land owned by him was divided, in as equitable a manner as possible, among his children. His death occurred on the tenth of February, 1825.

James F. Wilson M.D.

Jesse Hays was born in Montgomery county, Maryland, April 9, 1791, and came to Ohio with his father's family, eventually settling in Perry township, in 1806. He received from his father one hundred and seventy-seven acres of land in Perry and Monroe townships, on both sides of Deer creek. July 27, 1820, he married Betsey Hurst. She was born in Dorchester county, Maryland, November 17, 1801. They had children, as follows: Ann W., born June 27, 1821. She has been married several times, and lives a widow in Illinois. Eleanor R. A., born April 15, 1823, married James Carney, and lives in Ross county. Levi, born December 20, 1824—died in 1825. Joseph H. was born June 15, 1826, and married Miriam H. Thomas, June 18, 1857. They live on a part of his father's farm, in Monroe township. Miriam W. was born March 1, 1825, and died July 9, 1841. Sarah was born February 5, 1830. She married Richard W. Betts, and now lives in Moultrie county, Illinois. Elizabeth was born December 13, 1831, and died on the old homestead, about 1847. Jessie Lee was born August 22, 1835, and died October 2, 1835. Martha Ann was born September 27, 1836. She married John E. Bradley, and now lives in Moultrie county, Illinois. Wesley H. was born August 4, 1838, and married Mary F. Gephart. She died, April 16, 1874, and he married Hannah W. Hays, January 19, 1876. By his first wife he had three children—Emma Alice, Charles W., and Mary F.—and by his second wife, has Jesse McIlvain and Cynthia Kirk.

Joseph H. and Mariam H. Hays have had eleven children: Samuel, Jesse, Lee, Brunette, Charles W., Zilpha Ann, George W., and Cora. Three died in infancy.

Jesse Hays, sr., and his wife were both constituent members of the Methodist church from their early life. Soon after he was twenty-one, he became an exhorter, and continued as such until his death, September 17, 1872. His wife died December 11, 1841. He was a soldier in the war of 1812, and marched to the relief of Fort Meigs.

Wesley H. Hays was in the Seventy-third Ohio infantry four years. At the expiration of his first term of service, he re-enlisted in the field, and was wounded at the second Bull Run battle, and again at Resaca, Georgia.

THE MOUSER FAMILY.

Peter Mouser was born in Virginia, where he married Christine Huffman. They emigrated to Ohio, in 1798, and settled below Chillicothe, where they remained one year. They then moved to the south part of Deer Creek township, and settled on Deer creek, where they remained two years, when they again moved to Perry township, and located on land now owned by his son, William Mouser. Peter Mouser died in 1872, aged ninety-three years. His wife died about 1855, aged seventy-five years. Their children were: John, who married Margaret Porter; she died in Ross county, and he went to Illinois, to live with his children, and died there; Elizabeth, who married Rezon King, and died in Monroe township; Jacob P., who married Mary Ann Beatty, and moved to Illinois, where he died; William, who married Nancy Mace, and lives in Perry township; Catharine, who married Peter Carter, and lives in Fayette county, a widow; Mary, who married Owen T. Reeves, and died in Perry township; Eliza, who married Josiah Reeves, and died in Perry township.

William Mouser was born October 1, 1807, and was married October 1, 1844, to Nancy Mace, who was born September 26, 1819. After marriage they lived on his father's place one year, when they moved to the farm they now occupy. Mr. Mouser had a start in life from his father's estate, receiving two hundred acres of land. By hard work and economy he added to it, until he now owns five hundred and fifty acres of land. In 1875 they built their present substantial and comfortable home, a representation of which, accompanied by portraits of himself and wife, are inserted in connection with this sketch.

JAMES F. WILSON, M. D.

A long, honorable and useful career was that of the late Dr. James F. Wilson, of New Holland, Perry township, Pickaway county, and his name is revered by a wide circle of friends. His face was familiar to almost every inhabitant of the western part of Pickaway, and the eastern part of Fayette counties, and there are thousands who can testify to his professional thoroughness and ability, and to his intrinsic worth as a man. His was a character that won universal respect by its simple dignity, earnestness, firmness and unvarying integrity. Not a member of any church, he was yet strongly imbued with the faith of christianity, and his daily life put in practice those principles which are its teachings. He was a liberal supporter of the church, too, and noted for the charity he bestowed on other objects in many directions, being a kind friend to the poor and distressed. One of the most noble of his acts of charity, and one of the strongest indications of his large-hearted patriotism, was during the war. Many of the men who enlisted in the companies, which where afterward assigned to the Ninetieth and One Hundred and Fourteenth regiments Ohio volunteer infantry, were indebted to him for professional services. To all such he gave receipted bills, and to all of the members of these two companies, and to other soldiers who went into the war from the vicinity of his home, the doctor made promises which he faith-fully fulfilled—to give their families his services free of charge.

James F. Wilson was the son of John and Mary Wilson, who emigrated from Kentucky to Ross county, Ohio, about the year 1802. He was born near Chillicothe, October 5, 1808, and his early years were spent upon the home farm. At the age of twenty-one years he went to Greenfield, Highland county, and there began the study of medicine, under the direction of Dr. Daniel Robbins.

He was, finally, after long and careful reading, granted a diploma by the medical society of the district, and upon thus being authorized to practice his profession, immediately removed to New Holland, of which place he was the first resident physician. Although possessing a fair medical education, he was not satisfied, and so after four years' practice, during which time he saved from his accumulated means the sum nesessary to pay his expenses, he entered the Ohio medical college, of Cincinnati. He graduated from this institution with a good record, and returned to New Holland, resuming his practice, and following it all the rest of his life. His ride was a large one, and his practice as successful and lucrative as the county could bestow. His professional reputation became firmly established early in his career, and he took rank with the best physicians in the county, and was frequently called upon to spare time from his professional duties in the immediate neighborhood, to attend councils of physicians in localities at a considerable distance. Dr. Wilson had an enviable reputation as a surgeon, as well as a physician, being regarded as one of the best in this part of the state. He was for a time during the war located at camp Chase, and in his capacity as surgeon, his services were of great value.

He bought, in 1850, a fine farm, just over the line in Fayette county, and in the western part of New Holland village, which was cleared and improved under his direction, and transformed from wild woodland into a beautiful agricultural tract. In 1868 he removed to the house he had provided upon this farm—the tasteful home where his widow yet resides. Dr. Wilson was for the last twenty years of his life afflicted with heart disease, and he died of this malady January 21, 1875, leaving a wife and one son. Mrs. Wilson's maiden name was Letitia Dunlap, and she was the daughter of James and Elizabeth Dunlap, of Ross county. She was born May 24, 1816, and married August 31, 1837.

The only son and child of James F. and Letitia Wilson is John M., one of Ohio's men of ability and distinction. He was born September 19, 1838. In his sixteenth year he attended Antioch college, and remained there four years under the instruction of the famous Horace Mann. After President Mann's death, young Wilson entered Union college, at Schenectady, New York, where he graduated with the class of 1862. He read law at Columbus with the Hon. Chauncey N. Olds, and was admitted to the bar of the supreme court of Ohio in 1864, and commenced the practice of his profession the same year at Cincinnati, as the senior member of the firm of Wilson & Champion. He represented Hamilton county two years—in 1871, and in 1873—in the legislature, and in the latter year, at the expiration of his term, was appointed by Pesident Grant as consul to Bremen.

He remained there, as the representative of the United States, two and one half years, and was then appointed to the consulship at Hamburgh, where he remained until July 1, 1879. He is at present consul general to the Columbian States of South America, and is located at Panama.

He married December, 25, 1866, Carrie R. Turpin, of Newton, Hamilton county, Ohio.

WAYNE.

Wayne is one of the original townships in Pickaway county. Its lands are of the class known as "Virginia military," and its location is as follows: Bounded on the the north by the township of Jackson, south by Deerfield and Union townships, Ross county, east by Pickaway and Circleville, and west by Deer Creek.

The surface is generally of a level character, except along the course of the streams, where it is rolling. The soil is variable, consisting of sand, gravel, and clay, and, for the most part, well adapted to the raising of wheat and grass. Quite a proportion of the lands are held in large tracts, by a few owners, which greatly retards the growth of the township in population.

The area of Wayne township is nearly seven miles, north and south, and from three to six miles east and west, containing nearly twenty-six square miles of territory. It was named after the celebrated Indian fighter, General Anthony Wayne.

STREAMS.

The largest and most important of these is the Scioto river, which flows along the township line, dividing it from Pickaway and Circleville townships, and forming its eastern boundary. Plum creek, next in size, enters the township from the north, about one mile from the northwest corner, and flowing a general southeasterly direction, empties its waters into the Scioto river at Westfall. Yellow Bud creek flows across the southwest corner of the township, while Wolf creek has its rise at, or near, the southwest corner.

The Ohio canal, once an important line of transportation, passes through Wayne township, along the shore of the Scioto river.

SETTLEMENT.

Wayne township began settlement in the summer of 1798. By far the greater number of these pioneers, or their descendants, are no longer here. We have, by personal interviews, obtained the names of the settlers, and, where possible, sketches, in brief, of their lives. Much of the data is from William Fleming, esq. Following are the names: William King, Andrew Dueks (who removed with his family to Sandusky, Erie county, several years since), William Oliphant, Thomas McDonald (who was a minister, of the Methodist faith), Balithe Lynch, Huldah Smith, James Quick, John McFadden, Cloudesbury Warren, Daniel and Powell Lane, Abraham Leonard, James and William Curry, John Crull, David Evans, Derickson Waples, Fielding and William Atchison, Isaac Williams, John and George M. Peters, Josiah Bivens, Isaac, John, and Joseph Pancake, Daniel Whitsell, John Chipman, Philip McNemar, John Bond, Samuel Orison, Isaac Bowen, John Hubbard, Pritchard Mills, Stephen and Arterbridge Horsey, Abraham Stipp (who owned the John Jordon survey), Thomas and Henry Bowdell, Jacob Thorp (who was a Baptist minister), Samuel Smith, James, David and John Lisk, Robert and William Campbell, Aaron Sullevan, William Foresman, Prentiss Park, Dr. Potts, Theophilus Williams.

William King was a native of Pennsylvania, and early in life emigrated to Bourbon county, Kentucky, where he married Sarah Green, with whom he came to Ohio, in November, 1798, locating at Westfall, among the Indians, who, at that time, were congregated in this locality to the number of many thousands. Mr. King and wife were of Quaker ancestry, and had no difficulty with their red-skinned neighbors. In after years, when public convenience required it, he established a ferry at Westfall. Mrs. King died in 1833, and he some three years later. They were both buried in the graveyard at Westfall, these being the first interments in Wayne township.

There were five children in the family: George, Jemima, Caleb, Sarah, and Abram. The first of these married, and located at Joliet, Illinois. Subsequently he started to join a son in California, but died before reaching there, and was buried at sea. Jemima became the wife of Titus Dungan, and resided in Wayne township during the remainder of her life. Mr. Dungan died February 23, 1855, and his widow died June 23, 1875, and both sleep upon the farm their labor cultivated. Of their children, who numbered nine, but two are now living: Elizabeth M. (Mrs. Wilson), and George, at present clerk and justice of the peace of Wayne township. Caleb King located in Fountain county, Indiana, and is now deceased. Sarah, who located at the same place, is also deceased, and Abram died, single, in Wayne.

John Dungan, who was born near Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, removed to Loudon county, Virginia. He married Mary Titus, and removed to Wayne township in the fall of the year 1802, locating on Yellow Bud creek, on the farm still occupied by his descendants. Here he died, March 21, 1834. Mrs. Dungan died August 13, 1855. The children of this couple were: William, Rebecca, John, Margaret, Titus, and Patterson, all now deceased. James Thompson located in Wayne township, about the same date with Mrs. Dungan. He was from Hampton county, Virginia. After coming to Ohio he married Margaret Kirkendall, and soon after bought the farm still occupied by his son, Jacob W. James Thompson was fortunate in life and acquired a large quantity of land, owning at his death some twenty-two hundred acres. His first wife died May 11, 1820, and he married Martha Hall; both are now deceased. Their children numbered three: Mary Ann, Jacob W., and Betsey.

Fergus Moor, by birth an Irishman, came to America prior to the war of the Revolution, and immediately enlisted with the Americans. He fought some five years. After the close of the war he located in Pennsylvania, where he married, and removed to Bourbon county, Kentucky. In 1798 he located in Chillicothe. It is said that he laid the first shingle roof in that now stirring little city, using wood pins to fasten the shingles in place. While here he purchased some hundred acres of land in Wayne township, at and surrounding the village of Westfall, and in 1802 moved on to the property. He built a hewed log house on the old road leading from Franklinton to Chillicothe, and for many years kept a private house of entertainment. He died April 20, 1816, aged 55 years. His wife died January 22, 1825. The children were six in number. Elizabeth, the youngest, beeame the wife of John Fleming.

John Metzger came from Pennsylvania to Ohio soon after 1800. He located in Washington township, Pickaway county, on the farm now owned by the heirs of Mr. Richardson. He remained here a few years, eventually removing to Allen county, Indiana, where he and his wife died. The children were: Salome, Benjamin (the descendants of this son are all who now remain in the county), Leaih, Elizabeth, and Andrew.

Henry Kirkendall, of South Branch, Virginia, came into the Scioto valley in 1798 or 1799, locating on Evans prairie, here his wife died and he married Mrs. Elizabeth Homer. He died in Deerfield township, Ross county, in November, 1818. His wife died in 1857. There were twelve children in the family, all of whom are now deceased, except John, who lives in Wayne township, where he owns about two thousand acres of land; Archibald, who lives in Indiana; and Polly, who married Jacob Blocker, and resides in Jackson township.

William Owens, of Montgomery county, Maryland, married Mary Ann McAter, and emigrated to Ohio. He arrived in Jackson township, December 24, 1815, and located on the farm now owned by the heirs of Nelson Franklin. Here he lived until about 1830, when he removed to the farm in Wayne township now occupied by his son, Samuel. The father died here in July, 1833, and Mrs. Owens about twelve years later. The family consisted of but two children—Samuel M., born August 8, 1808, who married Eliza Sullivan, and Mary A., who married Samuel Campbell, and is now deceased.

Jacob McCollister, who was originally from Maryland, came to Pickaway county in the spring of 1817, locating in Jackson township, near the Hall mills, on Darby creek. The greater portion of the remaining years of his life were spent there. He died in April, 1839, and his wife in August, 1857. The children of this couple were: Anna (Mrs. Henry Sly), John, Eliza, Polly, who died in infancy; William, who married Nancy Smith, and who lives in Circleville; Nelson, who married Elizabeth Thompson, and lives in Wayne township; Sarah (deceased); Margaret (Mrs. James Sapp); Maria (Mrs. Jacob C. Murphy), and Robert, who married Mary Griffey and lives in Jackson township.

John Fleming, who was a soldier of the war of 1812, came from Berkeley county, Virginia, to Wayne township, at an early date. He was then unmarried, and came in company with an elder brother (Henry) and family. Henry located in Champaign county, while John remained at Westfall. February 22, 1808, he married Elizabeth Moor, and settled on a portion of the Moor estate. This was added to until, at his death, which occurred July 24, 1844, he owned about six hundred acres of land. Mrs. Fleming died May 1, 1866. The family consisted of William, who married Elizabeth Sullivan, and now resides near the old farm; Alexander, Fergus, Hannah, Mary, Elizabeth, Sarah, John, Cynthia, Minerva, and Robert.

Thomas Wiggins located in Wayne township in 1812, where he died in 1825. His wife afterward became the wife of James Rose, and died, December 23, 1849. The children were five in number, three of whom were born in Wayne township.

Francis and Catharine (Gross) May, descendants of whom now reside in Wayne township, were natives of Maryland, and it was in that State that Francis May died. Of the children — Charles, Magdalena, John, Mary, Michael, George, and Elizabeth—we learn as follows: Michael came to Circleville as early as 1818, from Loudon county, Virginia. He was a carpenter, and pursued his vocation in the village about four years, then returned to Maryland. In 1827 he returned, with his mother and several brothers and sisters, to Circleville, where he married Lydia Raymond, and passed the remainder of his life. Mary married George Fink, and located in Muskingum county, in 1823 or 1824, where Fink died, and his widow lives in Illinois. Charles and John located in Walnut township. Magdalena lives in Topeka, Kansas. Catharine died in Hancock county, this State. George married Jane Boyd, and has resided in Circleville until this time. He is now engaged in merchandising. Elizabeth married and moved to Hancock county, where she died.

J. W. Brown, a native of Hampshire county, Virginia, came to Ohio in 1826, locating first in Perry county, and from thence going to Ross county, where he remained until the spring of 1862, when he removed to Wayne township, Pickaway county, where he is extensively engaged in farming. His wife was Sarah Coleman, an Ohio woman. Seven children of this marriage are yet living.

John Darby came from Delaware to Ross county, in 1845. He married Martha J. Williams, and now lives on Yellow Bud creek, in Wayne township.

Clement Thomas, of Dorchester county, Maryland, located in Belmont county, Ohio, in 1829. In 1838 he removed to Ross county, and in the fall of 1839 settled permanently in Wayne township, where he died in April, 1845. There were nine children in the family, one only of whom lives in Wayne: Josiah, who married Julia Maddux, and lives two miles north of Yellow Bud creek, on the Columbus and Chillicothe road.

Christopher Warner, of German birth, settled in Chillicothe in 1834. David, a son, married Rachel Merritt, and now lives in Wayne township.

George Barthelmess, a native of Germany, emigrated to America, in 1851. For the first ten years he worked in different localities in Pickaway county. In 1861 he married Barbara Bach, and in 1877 purchased the farm of two hundred and thirty-five acres, now occupied by his widow. He died March 24, 1879, aged forty-four, leaving the following children: William, Charley, Sarah, Rosie, Jacob, and George—all living at home.

ORGANIZATION.

Wayne township was formed prior to the erection of Pickaway county. The early records, as recorded by the township clerk, were, a few years since, destroyed by fire. The writer was fortunate in procuring what appears to be the first book used by the township treasurer. It bears date July 9, 1805. During a period of five years subsequent to this date the names of the following persons appear: John Fleming, Philden Atchison and Isaac Dumonds, trustees; James Moor, Clerk; Thomas White, treasurer; John Renick and William Seabourn, overseers of the poor; and Philip McNemar, constable. It is said that William King was the first justice of the peace in the township. The officers for 1879 are as follows: William Foresman, Andrew Metzger, and Samuel Eymon, trustees; George Dungan, clerk; William Fleming, treasurer (he was elected to this office April 3, 1843, and has held the position continuously until the present); W. A. Hall, assessor; A. T. Tootle and George Dungan, justices of the peace; J. B. Reynolds and W. A. Hall, constables, and five supervisors of roads and highways.

FIRST EVENTS.

The first white child born in Wayne township, was a son to William and Sarah Green King. Caleb, who grew to manhood, married, and removed to Fountain county, Indiana. He became one of the leading citizens of that county, and died a few years since. The first death was that of Thompson. This occurred early in the settlement at Westfall, and his body was interred in the burying-ground near there. The first brick building in the township was erected by Samuel Smith. Its location was near the present residence of Mrs. S. C. Huffman. Gersham M. Peters was the pioneer merchant, he having opened a small stock of goods at Westfall, quite early in the settlement. It does not appear this was a profitable investment; at least he soon went out of business. Two or three small stores have since then had a brief existence at the same point. In about 1820 or '21, General John Morgan opened a hotel at Westfall. It was of short duration. Wayne township was without a post-office until the establishment of mail service on the C. & M. V. division of the P., C. & St. L.

railroad, when Dr. George W. Hurst was commissioned postmaster. The office was called Wayne station. It was discontinued in 1858, since which time the township has been without an office.

CHURCHES.

The first religious worship conducted in Wayne township was at the house of John Hubbard, at an early date, by ministers of the Methodist denomination, among whom were Revs. Samuel Parker, Henry B. Bascom, and Charles Wattle. A class was formed here, which was composed in part of the following persons; Pritchard Mills, who was its leader; Mary Mills, his wife; John Hubbard and wife, Anna, Thomas White and his wife, Amy; Thomas Wiggins, and Lucinda, his wife; and Thomas Bondell. In. 1830, a frame building, in size some thirty by fifty feet, was built for church purposes. Its location was on the farm of John Hubbard, now owned by Mrs. Samuel Eymon, and in this meetings were held until the completion of the Union chapel, in 1860.

The Union society was organized May 6, 1855. It was under the pastorate of Rev. Zachariah Wharton, of the Williamsport circuit. Following are the names of the members comprising this class: David and Elizabeth Terwilliger, William, Sarah, and Julia Knowles, Jacob H. and Elizabeth Schryver, Mary A., Tacy A., Mary E., Amelia, and Edward L. Hall, Margaret and Elizabeth McCollister, and Dr. George W. and Catharine Hurst. David Terwilliger was chosen leader of the class, and has continued to occupy this office until the present time. The society met in the William Hall school-house until the building of the present church edifice, on the fourteenth of January, 1859. The following were trustees: William Knowles, David Terwilliger, M. J. Alkire, J. H. Schryver, and E. L. Hall, who went to work, energetically, to raise money and build a house of worship. The result is the beautiful edifice known as the Union chapel, which was completed, and dedicated to the service of God, by Rev. Mr. Felton, on the first of January, 1860. The land upon which it stands was donated for the purpose by William Knowles. This edifice is, in size, thirty-six by forty-six feet, and cost, entire, sixteen hundred dollars.

This class now numbers thirty members. The leaders are David Terwilliger and Robert Thompson. The superintendent of the Sabbath-school is T. C. Lisk, at which there is an average attendance of fifty scholars. The date of its formation is prior to that of the church. The ministers who have had charge of this flock are given in connection with the Williamsport church.

A Baptist society was formed at the school-house in district number three, by Rev. Mr. Drake and Jacob Thorp, in 1818. Prior to this, meetings were held at the house of Andrew Dueks, who, with Mary Morris, Daniel Whitsell, and others, whose names are forgotten, formed this society. Meetings were kept up several years.

SCHOOLS.

The first school in Wayne township was taught in the summer of 1814, by an individual named Hunt. It was held in a five cornered log building, standing on the farm now owned by William Fleming, esq. This seat of learning was without a floor; the children using for seats the timbers intended for the support of the floor. If a back was desired to the seat it was furnished by the occupant. The following list of the pupils at this school is furnished by William Fleming, esq., who is the only one of all the number now living in the township: William Fleming, Lydia and Henry Mills, Thomas and Mary Hubbard, Thomas Kitchen, Vine James, John Berry, Perry, Thomas, and Jane Oliphant, Polly and Thomas Moor, Daniel and George Williams, John and Edward Park, John and Samuel Whitsell, Nancy and Elizabeth Horsey, William and Frank Layton, and Thomas Bivens.

In the spring of the year 1817, the matter of building a school-house assumed tangible shape; a sufficient sum was subscribed, and the subsequent summer witnessed the erection of the pioneer school-house. This was a frame structure, the "siding" of which was split into the proper thickness, and shaved smooth. This house when completed was quite a commodious and comfortable affair, and was occupied until 1860, when having become unsafe by the action of time, it was torn down and the present brick school building, known as the Westfall in district number three, erected on the site. The township is now divided into five school districts, four of which are now provided with substantial brick school-houses.

PHYSICIANS.

The pioneer disciple of Esculapius, in this township, was Dr. Potts; the date of whose coming was as early as 1800. He located at Westfall, and is spoken of as a practitioner of more than average ability and success. Dr. Potts died after several years, and his successor was Prentiss Park, who came in about 1820. He died soon after settlement, and Wayne township has since been without a resident physician.

INDUSTRIAL PURSUITS.

The earliest manufactory in Wayne township, of which we have accurate information, was a distillery. It was of logs, and was located on the Horsey farm, now owned by the heirs of C. Barthelmess. Abraham Stipp, then an extensive land owner in this section, was the owner and operator, and the date of its construction was very early. This ceased operations, and in 1808 Stephen Horsey purchased the building, and converted it to other uses. In about 1810, a man named Hamilton, put in operation a second distillery. This, like its predecessor, was short lived. John Fleming built the third distillery in Wayne. This was in 1828. It location was on the farm now owned by John Kirkendall. It was in being perhaps fifteen years. Not a vestage of either of these "institutions" now remains. In 1867, Messrs. Steeley & Morris erected a large brick building, on the Renick farm, adjoining the canal, and commenced the manufacture of whiskey. It was a losing undertaking from the beginning, and three years later ceased operations. In 1827 or '28, a man named Sanford, from Chillicothe, erected and put in operation a small carding establishment, on the canal, near the present residence of John Kirkendall. A few years later William Fleming purchased the property. He put in looms and other machinery necessary for the manufacture of cloth. Not long afterwards it was destroyed by fire. The first grist-mill of which we have knowledge, was built at a very early date. It was situated on the Chillicothe road, and was primitive indeed; the motive power being horses, and its labors were confined to the grinding of coarse feed. In 1817 or '18, Henry Nevill built a large flouring mill on the Scioto, near where the State dam now is. This was quite an extensive establishment, having four run of stone, and quite complete machinery for that day. It was discontinued at the date the State constructed its works here. The flouring-mill now owned by William Foresman & Brother, is one of the oldest in the county. It has been greatly improved by the present owners, who have erected a grain elevator in connection. This firm deals largely in grain.

WESTFALL.

The settlement of Wayne township was begun at this point, and but two other townships, within the limits of Pickaway county, were settled at an earlier date. The lands here, and adjacent, having fallen into the hands of Abel Westfall, he caused a town to be laid out, and gave it his name. This territory was then within the limits of Hamilton county, and the plat of the village was recorded at Cincinnati. Westfall was, for some time, considered the rival of Chillicothe, but the location proving to be unhealthy, its growth was stinted, and, little by little, the town went to decay. It was here that the celebrated Mingo chief, Logan, sought refuge, with his tribe, when, in 1774, he was driven from his home in western Virginia, by the troops of Lord Dunmore. The village was then called Chil-i-coth-e, the Indian name for town. It was here that Logan delivered to the messenger of Dunmore that celebrated speech, rendered immortal in Jefferson's "Notes on Virginia." Dunmore was encamped, with his troops, at Camp Charlotte, on Scippo creek, some seven miles east of Westfall. This messenger was sent to invite the chiefs to his camp, to negotiate terms of peace. Logan refused to go, but sent the speech instead. [See general history.] A treaty was concluded, at this time, however, which terminated Lord Dunmore's war, and his troops made no further advances. At this time there were vast numbers of Indians settled in and about Westfall, and on Pickaway plains. Of Westfall, nothing is left to mark the hallowed spot, once famous as the home of Logan, "the friend of the white man," and the very theater of the act which has imparted imperishable renown. The very desolation which now broods over the place, seems to "mourn for Logan." What food for contemplation does this historic spot afford! Who that visits it does not recall the events, so thrilling in interest, that marked the career of the justly celebrated Logan?—Logan, who was the white man's best friend, but who, in obedience to the voice of causative revenge, became the white man's deadliest foe.

A short distance south of Westfall, another village was platted. This was named Montgomery, but we are unable to learn that any considerable settlement was made there.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

S. M. OWENS.

William Owens emigrated from Montgomery county, Maryland, to Ohio, in 1815, and settled in Jackson township, about three and a half miles north of Circleville. He did not become a land owner until some five or six years after his settlement, when he purchased a small tract of land, which he improved. He was married in Maryland, to Massy Ann McAtee, and had two children when he came to Ohio. They were S. M. Owens and Mary A. Owens. William Owens died in 1832. His widow survived him, living until 1841.

S. M. Owens was born in Montgomery county, Maryland, August 21, 1808, and came to Ohio with his father and mother in 1815. His boyhood life was filled with no startling incidents, but he did his share of pioneer work, and suffered the same privations and hardships that all had to undergo in that early day. His school education was necessarily very limited, and was obtained by walking five miles through the wilderness to the nearest school-house, often frightened by the wild animals that frequented the forests. As he became old enough to do the hard work of the pioneer, he labored where he could obtain work and pay, which was but small in those days.

In 1831 he was married in Wayne township, to Miss Eliza Sullivan, and made his home with his father until his death, in 1832, when he took sole charge of his farm of one hundred and thirty-seven acres, of which his sister inherited one-half. He purchased her interest, both himself and wife laboring hard to improve and add to their little farm in raising grain and stock. They gradually accumulated property—slowly at first, but surely—until, at the present time, he has a large landed estate of more than one thousand acres.

In due time children were born to them, which added to their cares, as well as their comforts. They had thirteen children, ten of whom lived to maturity, and all but one of whom married. Death has thinned their number, but they have loving remembrance in the grand-children they have left behind them. On his seventy-first birthday, he had thirty-eight grandchildren, and two great-grandchildren, a large number of whom gathered around him at this anniversary, in August, 1879. Of his children, all but one—a daughter, who lives in Butler county, Kansas—settled in Pickaway county. Mrs. Owens died April 6, 1876, at the age of sixty-eight years. She proved to him a faithful and loving sharer in all the hardships, cares and trials of life, administering the affairs of the household, and caring for the children who were born to them, in such a loving and gentle manner that they rise and call her memory blessed. She was a consistent member of the Methodist Episcopal church, and her life proved to all about her that she lived up to the profession she had made. Words alone cannot do justice to the memory of this most estimable, kind and loving wife and mother, and the true and faithful friend of all with whom she came in contact.

THE DUNGAN FAMILY.

John Dungan was a native of Ireland. He came to this country when quite small, and lived in Loudoun county, Virginia, where he married Mary Titus, by whom he had eight children. In 1802 he emigrated to Ohio, and settled on a tract of one thousand acres in the southern part of Wayne township, on Yellow Bud creek. For this tract he exchanged one hundred acres of land in Virginia. The family came in wagons and with pack-horses. The children were: William, Titus, Rebecca, Margaret, John, Jane, Nancy, and Patterson. Mr. Dungan divided his farm among his children, after they became of age and married, giving to each one hundred acres. To Titus he gave the homestead, consisting of one hundred and thirty-six acres, on condition that he should care for his mother during her lifetime.

Titus Dungan married Jemima King, a daughter of William King, who settled in Wayne township, at Westfall, in 1798, and was the first justice of the peace in the township. She was born in 1796. After marriage they occupied the old homestead, until his death, which occurred in February, 1855, at the age of sixty years. During his lifetime he held the office of township trustee nearly twenty years, and was often solicited to accept a nomination on the county ticket, but invariably declined, believing his duty to be at his home. Their children were: William King, who was born October 3, 1817; he married, and lived in the township until his death, October 17, 1847; Mary Ann was born August 27, 1819; she married John Kirkendall, and died April 5, 1864; John was born September 27, 1821, died May 2, 1841; Sarah J. was born February 10, 1824, married Dr. Lewis Clarke, and died September 28, 1845, leaving one child; Francis was born July 2, 1826, and died August 6, 1828; Samuel Jefferson was born January 10, 1829, and died June 28, 1854; Harriet was born March 3, 1831, married Henry Gearhart, and died October 16, 1853; Elizabeth Nancy was born December 27, 1833, married Jacob Wilson, and lives in the township, a widow; George was born September 6, 1839, was married to Hannah Ettie Grove, March 11, 1862. She died December 28, 1864, leaving one child, Mary Florence. He married Harriet Blackburn, September 3, 1867, by whom he has had five children, three of whom are living. Hannah Ettie, John Titus, Jemima King, George Francis, and William Allen, were the fruit of the second union. John T. and George F. died when quite small.

George Dungan has two hundred and thirty-two acres in the farm on which he lives, which is located near Yellow Bud station, on the Cincinnati and Muskingum Valley railroad. He has three hundred and thirty-six acres in the home farm, located in the south part of the township. He has held the offices of infirmary director, township trustee, clerk and justice of the peace.

An engraving, representing his present place of residence, as well as the old homestead, accompanies this sketch of the Dungan family.

SCIOTO.

At the time of the organization of Pickaway county, January 12, 1810, Scioto township formed a part of Franklin county, extending west and south to Darby creek, and bounded on the east by the Scioto river. At a later date Jackson township was formed, Scioto contributing a portion of its territory. In 1830 another considerable portion was appropriated to it from Muhlenberg.

This township is now about seven miles long and from four to seven miles broad, and contains about forty-two square miles. In 1830 it had four hundred and sixty-two inhabitants, and in 1870 it had one thousand five hundred and forty-five. Having no prairie land, and being covered with a heavy growth of timber, and its territory mostly owned in large tracts by non-residents for many years, its settlement has been tardy. A few settlers came in at an early date and located along the Scioto river, where some of the land has been under cultivation many years. In later years these large tracts of land have been divided and cut into farms of moderate size. Its early settlers were mostly from Virginia and western Pennsylvania.

On October 14, 1878, the western boundary of Scioto was extended to Darby creek, so as to include all the territory north of Muhlenberg to the Franklin county line and east of Darby creek. This makes Scioto one of the largest, if not the largest, township in the county.

The officers for 1879 are: M. V. Beavers, L. Gochenour, Cyrus Pursell, trustees; William C. Lerch, clerk; Eli Harsh, treasurer; James W. Durrett, Thomas Beavers, James M. Johnson, justices of the peace; John H. Robison and Stephen Boyd, constables; Jacob Pursell, assesor.

In 1856 a building was purchased by the township for use as a town house for the purpose of holding elections, and for any other uses needed. This was used several years. In 1871 the township and corporation bought a lot and erected a substantial brick building at Commercial Point, for township and corporation purposes. The first story was built by them, and the second was built by the Masonic fraternity, for use as a lodge hall. In 1874 the lower hall was rented, at certain stated times, to the Good Templars' society, for use in holding their meetings.

ANCIENT WORKS.

There are still to be found in Scioto many evidences of the work of the ancient and lost race called the Mound Builders. On the bluffs above the river are still to be traced earthworks, built in such a form and position as would indicate that they were used as places of defence. Some have been obliterated by the work of the settlers of the country, who have plowed them down and dug them away in building roads. Besides these earthworks, there are still to be seen a number of mounds built by this strange people, for what purpose the people of to-day know not. The record of their works is lost, yet no one can look on these monuments without feelings of awe, and regret that more cannot be known concerning their construction and purpose.

EARLY EVENTS.

In 1807 or 1808 a ferry was established near the Bloomfield bridge, for the convenience of persons who were obliged to cross to the mill at that point. Crampton built a mill on the east bank of the Scioto about 1808. Nathan Rawlins was one of the first justices of the peace. He lived on the Franklinton pike, in the northeast part of the township, and kept his docket on a hewed log in his house, below the joist on which the upper floor was laid. Perkins, McGinnis, and Jack Stinson were among the early school teachers. William Herbert taught school about 1814, in a log school-house on the Edward Williams' tract. Dr. Hoge preached in the neighborhood about 1814. He was a Presbyterian minister. The first blacksmith was Jacob Fishel, who was working in about 1811, on the Franklinton pike, near Edward Williams' land. The first brick-kiln was burned by Robert Seeds, for the purpose of building a house, about 1815 or 1816. In 1829 William Harlor came, and has burned many kilns since that time. Dr. Revnaugh was the first settled physician in Scioto. He came to Genoa about 1842.

Dr. Jaynes came about the same time, and taught school for a few years, when he commenced the practice of medicine. The first store was started by Wiley H. Beckett, in 1844, in Genoa. The first saw-mill was built on a run on the Edward Williams' farm, quite early, probably about 1808. A stillhouse was built by William Hartman, about 1830, near Bloomfield bridge. One was built at an earlier date on Edward Williams' land, but at what date and by whom cannot now be ascertained. Dr. Burrell, of Bloomfield, was an early physician, and was employed by all in that vicinity. Previous to his settlement Drs. Turney and Parsons came from Columbus, when called. The early grist mills were Gundy's, on the Scioto, and Thompson's and Kepler's, on Darby creek.

SETTLEMENT.

The settlers of this township, from the earliest date until within the past twenty years, came to a heavily wooded country, and while to the first settlers belongs the credit of being the bearers of the heaviest burdens in cleaning and preparing homes in the wilderness, in the face of discouragement and sickness, those who followed them had an almost equal share in the privations of a frontier life. Those who came later could profit by the experience of their predecessors, and had the consolation of knowing that they were not entirely alone in the boundless forest, surrounded by howling woolves, screaming panthers, and the less dangerous denizens of the forest. Though their nearest neighbors were perhaps a mile or two distant, there was a feeling almost of kinship existing between them. The class distinctions that now exist between the rich and poor, in many parts of the county, were then unknown. The poor settler in the meanest cabin, was on an equality with his neighbor who owned hundreds of acres, and the kindest feelings existed everywhere. Among the very earliest settlers of Scioto townships, were Captain Eleazer Williamson, John and Thomas Thompson, William Ballard, the Fitzgeralds, Wests, Williams, Widener, and others. Captain Eleazer Williamson was a soldier during the Revolutionary war. Before that time he accompanied General Braddock in his campaign against the French and Indians, and was a participant in the battle in which Braddock was defeated and killed. He commanded a company under Colonel Crawford in his campaign against the Indians in 1782. When the attack was made he was ordered to retreat with the rest of the command, but instead of doing so, with his company held the ground until evening, when he withdrew. He has the credit of being the only officer who brought his company out of the battle. He came to near Chillicothe about 1800, and moved to Scioto about 1808, and bought a farm a short distance below the present village of Commercial Point, then an unbroken wilderness. His purchase was a part of the Taggart & McLaughlin survey. He married Miss McConnell before coming to Ohio. By her he raised ten children: David, Joseph, Eleazer, John, William, Mary, Lydia, Martha, Ruhamah, and Margaret. David went to Illinois; John to Indiana; Eleazer died in Preble county; John died at Dayton; William went to Iowa; Mary married Robert Steele, of Ross county; Lydia married John May; Martha married Thomas Fitzgerald, and went to Iowa; Ruhama married Robert Gibson, and died on the old homestead, in 1876; Margaret married Thomas Cummings, and lives in Missouri. She is the only one of the children now living. Captain Williamson died in 1838, aged eighty-five. His wife died about 1825.

Thomas Thompson came to Chillicothe some time before the year 1800. Some time before he came his father was killed in Pennsylvania by an Indian. When in Chillicothe, the same Indian, while drunken, boasted of the deed, and taunted young Thompson with a description of the scalping of his father. Thompson became so enraged that he seized a handspike and dashed the Indian's brains out at a blow. He was arrested and placed under guard to prevent his falling into the hands of the remaining Indians, but watched his opportunity, and escaped from the guard, who fired several shots at him, being careful not to hit him. He was secreted by friends for several weeks, until it was safe to leave the country, when he returned to Pennsylvania, where he married Martha Myers. In 1800 he returned to Ohio, and settled in Scioto township, on the McMahon survey, now owned by B. F. Walker, near the farm now owned by E. W. Gibson. One child was born to them before coming to Ohio, and afterwards the family increased to eleven children. Four of them are now living in this vicinity. Thomas has a farm of one hundred and ninety-two acres, near the Bloomfield bridge; William lives on the Blake farm, half a mile north of Thomas; James lives three miles north of Commercial Point; Margaret (now Mrs. James Welsh), lives about three miles north of Commercial Point. Mr. Thompson died April 6, 1852, aged eighty-five years. His wife died September 3, 1854, aged sixty-nine years.

John Thompson came at the same time as his brother, Thomas, in 1800. He was also a soldier of the Revolutianary war. His father was murdered by an Indian, and he became so much embittered against the red men that he lost no opportunity to shoot one. He never boasted of his deeds, but it is tradition that many fell before his unerring rifle. One cold morning, in the late fall, he was watching for deer at a lick, half a mile west of Commercial Point. His neighbor, William Ballard, was also hunting at the same place, and suffering from the cold, built a fire. While stooping over the blaze Thompson saw him, and drew a bead on him, with his finger resting on the trigger of his gun, when Ballard raised his tall form, and was recognized by Thompson, just in time to save his life, he having been mistaken for an Indian. He was once chased by an Indian, and escaped by jumping across a narrow ravine. He was twice married; first, to Mrs. Mires, and afterward to Mrs. Carson. He helped raise their children, but had none of his own. He was a justice of the peace in 1812. He became a prominent member of the Presbyterian church here.

William Ballard came to Ohio in 1800, and settled on Darby creek. In 1801 he came to Scioto, and bought one hundred acres of land, now owned by B. F. Walker, which he improved. He raised a family of seven children, none of whom are now living. Some died here, and some moved to the west, where they died. He raised William Swank, who was bound to him, and now lives at Commercial Point, aged sixty-seven years. A daughter married John Stinson, who became a school teacher, and taught on Ballard's place, in 1812.

William Seeds emigrated from Pennsylvania, in 1819, and settled on land west of and adjoining that belonging to Robert Seeds, in the north part of the township. The fall before he came he sent three of his children to Ohio, John, Robert, and Elizabeth, the oldest not more than sixteen years of age. They accomplished the long journey in safety, their only means of conveyance being a single horse, which each rode alternately. The children of William Seeds were: James, John, Woods, Robert, Elizabeth, Henry, Isabel, Harvey, Samuel, Mary Ann, and Cyrus. But two of them, Woods and Cyrus, now live in this State. One lives in Iowa; the rest are all deceased. William Seeds died in 1839, aged seventy-seven. At the time of his death he owned five hundred and ninety acres of land.

William Mires came about the same time as the Thompsons, in 1800, and settled on the Ballard place. He lived there but a short time, and died September 22, 1819. He was buried in the cemetery on Thompson's hill. None of the family live in this vicinity, and nearly all are dead.

Robert Seeds came from Pennsylvania, in 1803 or 1804. His father traded property in that State for eleven hundred acres in Ohio, a part lying in Franklin and a part in Pickaway county. His father came soon after, and died at his son's house. Robert Seeds had eight children, of whom five are now living in this township, viz.: Mrs. Isabel Beaver, Mrs. Martha Snyder, Moses Seeds, John Seeds, and Hannah Redmon. He built the first brick house in the township, about 1816 or 1818, burning the brick himself. This house was torn down a few years since. Moses Seeds lives a short distance from the site of the old house.

Edward Fitzgerald was born in 1761, and came to Ohio in 1804, and bought seven or eight hundred acres of land in Scioto, about a mile north of Commercial Point, a part of which is now owned by George Dennis and his brother. Mr. Fitzgerald was a Pennsylvanian. He had three sons: Thomas, John, and Abraham. At his death, in 1814, his sons inherited his property, which they afterwards sold, and moved to Iowa. None of the family now live here. George Dennis, and his brother, Elisha, bought two hundred and fifteen acres of this property, which they now occupy. George married Susan Miller, and Elisha married Elizabeth Haynes.

George West came from Virginia about 1804, and bought about nine hundred acres of the Butler survey, in the southeast part of the township, and on the Scioto river. He had eleven children, of whom nine came to maturity. They were: Daniel, Peter, Frederick, John, George, Elizabeth, Mary, Sarah, Barbara, Margaret, and Catharine. George died young; Frederick went into the army and served in the war of 1812, came home broken down in health, and died. On the death of Mr. West the property was divided between the children, each receiving one hundred acres. Seven made improvements, and two sold to the others. Daniel died in 1861, in Harrison township, and Margaret, in Jackson. The rest, with the exception of Peter, went west, where they died. George West died in 182–.

Peter West came from Virginia in 1804, at the same time as his father's family. He remained on the east side of the river about five years, and in 1809 settled on one hundred acres belonging to his father, in Scioto township. He married Elizabeth Bartley, and had seven children, of whom five are now living—Mary married John Seaburn; Sarah married Mason Cleveland; John married Elizabeth Howe, and lives a widower, in Iowa; Elizabeth married Luke Wilkins, and lives in the township; Margaret married J. W. Stiverson, and lives on the Peter West homestead. Mr. West died April 6, 1840, aged fifty-eight. His wife, Elizabeth, died June 1, 1850, aged seventy-two.

Edward and Isaac Williams came about 1806, and settled on the west bank of Scioto river, on a part of the Richard C. Anderson survey. Edward built a log cabin on land now owned by Philomel Gray, and which is still standing. He was twice married, and had seven children, all of whom lived to maturity. By his first wife he had three children, one of whom married John Young. The children by his second wife were Mary, Elizabeth, William, and Josephine. The latter married Dr. Jones, of Columbus, where she now lives. Mr. Williams died in 1831.
